

Dom. 1413

An. Regni. 1.

Henrie the fift, prince of Wales, sonne and heire to Henrie the fourth.

Henrie prince of Wales, son and heire to H. Henrie the fourth, boine in Wales at Spennymouth on the river of Wye, after his father was departed toke upon him the regiment of this realme of England, the twentieth of March, the morrow after proclaimed king, by the name of Henrie the fift, in the yeare of the world 5375, after the birth of our saviour, by our account 1413, the third of the emperor Sigismund: the thre and thirtieth of Charles the first French king, and in the seventh yeare of governance in Scotland under Robert brother to him that (before entrance into his kingdome 1390) had John to name, which by deuisse and order of the states was changed into Robert the third, who at Kotsaie (a towne in the Island of Got, 1406) deceased by occasion thus. As upon hope in this governo; to himselfe conceiued how to come to the crowne; he at the castell of Falkland, latelie had samisht his cosine Da-uid the kings elder sonne and heire (a dissolute yong prince) yet to his fathers exceeding sorrow, at whose deceasse the father verie carefull, and casting for the safegard of James his yonger son and heire, from Walle the rocke in a well appointed ship, under charge of Henrie Saintcleere earle of Wikenie, into France to his old friend king Charles for good education and safetie this yong prince he sent: who in the course, whether for tempest or tendernes of stomach, toke land in Poweshire at Flamborough; that after by wisdom and good consideration of the king and his counsell was thought verie necessarie here to be retained. But by the sudden newes of this state, the father (at supper as he sat) so stroken at hart that well nie straight had he fallen doونه dead, yet boine into his chamber, where for greafe and pine within thre daies next he deceased. The yong king James his sonne after an eightene peares state, in which time he had bene well trained in princehood, at last with right honorable marriage at saint Marie Queries unto Jane daughter to the earle of Summerset, cosine unto Henrie the first then king, and with manie other high gratuities here beside was sent and set in his rule and kingdome at home.

Such great hope, and god expectation was had of this mans fortunate successe to follow; that within thre daies after his fathers deceasse, diuerse noble men and honorable personages did to him homage, and swore to him due obedience, which had not bene sene done to any of his predecessors kings of this realme, till they had bene possessed of the crowne.
He was crowned the ninth of April being Passion sundae, which was a soze, rugged, and tempestuous day, with wind, snow and flet, that men greatlie maruelled thereat, making diuerse interpretations what the same might signifie. But this king euen at first appointing with himselfe, to shew that in his person princelie honours should change publike manners, he determined to put on him the shape of a new man. For whereas aforesaid he had made himselfe a companion unto maistrilie mates of dissolute order and life, he now banished them all from his presence (but not unrewarded, or else unpreferrd) in bi-tting them upon a great paine; not once to approach, lodge, or sojourne within ten miles of his court or presence: and in their places he chose men of gran-tie, wit, and high policie, by whose wise counsell he might at all times rule to his honour and dignitie, calling to mind how once to his offense of the king his father, he had with his fist striken the chiefe iustice for sending one of his minions (upon desert) to prison, when the iustice stoutlie commanded himselfe also streit to ward, & he (then prince) obeyed. The king after expelled him out of his princelie counsell, banisht him the court, and made the duke of Clarence (his yonger brother) president of counsell in his stead.

This reformation in the new king Christ. Okl. hath reported, fullie consenting with this. For saith he,

Ille inter iuuenes paulo lasciuior ante, Defuncto genitore grauis constansq; repente, Moribus ablegat corruptis regis ab aula Assuetos sacros, & nugatoribus acrem Panem (si quisquam sua tella reniserit) addit, Atq; ita militatus facit omnia principe digna, Ingenuo magno post consultoribus usus, &c.

But now that the king was once placed in the roall seat of the realme, he vertuously considering in his mind, that all godnesse cometh of God, determined to begin with some thing acceptable to his di-uine maiestie, and therefore commanded the cleargie sincerelie and trulie to preach the word of God, and to line accordingly, that they might be the lanternes of light to the temporallie, as their profession required.
The laie men he willed to serue God, and obeie their prince, prohibiting them about all things breach of matrimonte, custome in swearing; and namelie, wil-full perurie. Beside this, he elected the best learned men in the lawes of the realme, to the offices of iustice; and men of good liuing, he preferred to high degrees and authoritie. Immediatlie after Easter he called a parliament, in which diuerse good statutes, and wholesome ordinances, for the preservation and ad-uancement of the common wealth were deuised and established. On Trinitie sundae were the solemn reques done at Canturburie for his father, the king himselfe being present thereat.

About the same time, at the speciall instance of the king, in a conuocation of the cleargie holden at Wales in London, it was ordeined, that saint Georges daie should be celebrate and kept as a double feast. The archbishop of Canturburie meant to haue honored saint Dunstanes daie with like reue-rence, but it toke not effect. When the king had fet-led things much to his purpose, he caused the bodie of king Richard to be removed with all funerall dignitie convenient for his estate, from Langley to Westminster, where he was honorable interred with quene Anne his first wife, in a solempne tombe erected and set up at the charges of this king. ¶ Polychronicon saith, that after the bodie of the dead king was taken up out of the earth, this new king happily tendering the magnificence of a prince, and abhorring obscure buriall, caused the same to be conveyed to Westminster in a rotall seat (or chaire of estate) covered all over with blacke velvet, adorned with banners of divers armes round about. All the hostles likewise (saith this author) were appareled with blacke, and bare sundrie lutes of armes. Many other solemnities were had at his interment, according to the qualite of the age wherein he lived and died.

Also in this first yere of this kings reigne, sir John Blacwell, which by his wife was called lord Cobham, a valiant capteine and a hardie gentleman, was accused to the archbishop of Canturburie of certeine points of heresie, who knowing him to be highlie in the kings favour, declared to his highnesse the whole accusation. The king first having compassion of the noble man, requited the prelates, that if he were a strayed sheepe, rather by gentleness than by rigour to reduce him to the fold. And after this, he himselfe sent for him, and right earnestlie exhorted him, and lovinglie admonished him to reconcile himselfe to God and to his lawes. The lord Cobham not onelie thanked him for his most favourable clemencie, but also declared first to him by mouth, and afterwards by writing, the foundation of his faith, and the ground of his beleefe, affirming his grace to be his supream head and competent iudge, and none other person offering an hundred knights and squiers to come to his purgation, or else to fight in open lists in defense of his iust cause.

The king understanding and persuaded by his counsell, that by order of the lawes of his realme, such accusations touching matters of faith ought to be tried by his spirituall prelates, sent him to the Tower of London, there to abide the determination of the clergie, according to the statutes in that case provided, after which time a solempne session was appointed in the cathedra church of saint Paule, upon the thye and twentieth day of September, and another the five and twentieth daie of the same moneth, in the hall of the Blakke friers at London, in which places the said lord was examined, apposed, and finally heard, and in conclusion by the archbishop of Canturburie denounced an heretike, & remitted againe to the Tower of London, from which place, either by helpe of friends, or favour of keepers, he privilie escaped and came into Wales, where he remained for a season.

After this, the king keeping his Christmasse at his manor of Eltham, was advertised, that sir Roger Aston knight, a man of great wit and possessions, John Wotton esquier, John Weuerlie priest, and a great number of other were assembled in armour against the king, his brethren, the clergie and realme. These newes came to the king, on the twelfth daie, in Westminster, whereupon understanding that they were in a place called Ficket field beside London, on the backe side of saint Giles, he straight got him to his palace at Westminster, in as secret wise as he might, and there calling to him certeine bands of armed men, he repared into saint Giles fields, nere to the said place (where he understood they should fullie meet about midnight) and so handled the matter, that he took some, and slew some, such as stood with his pleasure. The captives of their aske mentioned, being apprehended, were brought to the kings presence, and to him declared the causes of their commotion

The king vied one policie, which much served to the discomfiting of the adversaries (as Thom. Walsingham saith) which was this: he gave order, that all the gates of London should be strictly kept and garded, so as none should come in or out, but such as were knownen to go to the king. Whereby came it to passe, that the chiefest succour appointed to come to the captives of the rebels, was by that meanes cut off, where otherwise suerlie (had it not bene thus prevented and staied) there had issued forth of London to have joined with them, to the number (as it was thought) of fiftie thousand persons, one and other, servants, prentises, and citizens, confederate with them that were thus assembled in Ficket field. Divers also that came from sundrie parts of the realme, hasting towards the place, to be there at their appointed time, chanced to light among the kings men, who being taken and demanded whether they went with such speed, answered, they came to meet with their capteine the lord Cobham.

But whether he came thither at all, or made shift for himselfe to get away, it doth not appeare; for he could not be heard of at that time (as Thomas Walsingham confesseth) although the king by proclamation promised a thousand marks to him that could bring him forth, with great liberties to the cities or townes that would discover where he was. By this it maie appeare, how greatlie he was beloved, that there could not one be found, that for so great a reward would bring him to light. Among other that were taken was one William Spurlie, who dwelt in Dunsfable, a man of great wealth, and by his occupation a brewer, an earnest maintainer of the lord Cobhams opinions, and (as the sayde ran) in hope to be highlie advanced by him if their purposed deule had taken place, apparant by this; that he had two horses trapped with guilt harness led after him, and in his bosome a paire of gilt spurs (as it was deemed) prepared for himselfe to weare, looking to be made knight by the lord Cobhams hands at that present time. But when he saw how their purpose quailed, he withdrew into the citie with great feare to hide himselfe, howbeit he was perceived, taken, and finally executed among others.

To conclude, so manie persons hereupon were apprehended, that all the prisons in and about London were full, the chiefes of them were condemned by the clergie of heresie, and attainted of high treason in the Guildhall of London, and adjudged for that offense to be hanged and hanged, and for heresie to be consumed with fire, gallowses and all, which judgement was executed the same moneth, on the said sir Roger Aston, and eight and twentieth others. ¶ Some saie, that the occasion of their death was onelie for the conveying of the lord Cobham out of prison. Others write, that it was both for treason and heresie, and so it appeareth by the record. Certeine affirme, that it was for feined causes furnished by the spiritualltie, more upon displeasure than truth, and that they were assembled to heare their preacher (the sayde Weuerlie) in that place there, out of the waie from resort of people, lest they might not come together openly about any such matter, without danger to be apprehended, as the manner is, and hath bene, ever of the persecuted flocke, when they are prohibited publickly the exercise of their religion. But howsoever the matter went with these men, apprehended they were, and divers of them executed (as before we have heard) whether for rebellion or heresie, or for both (as the sayde of the indictment importeth) I need not to spend manie words, with others have so largelie treated thereof; and therefore I refer those that wish to be more fullie satisfied herein unto their reports.

Le Rollet la
second partie.

Whilke in the Lent season the king laie at Willingworth, there came to him from Charles Dolphin of France certeine ambassadors, that brought with them a barrell of Paris balles, which from their maister they presented to him for a token that was taken in verie ill part, as sent in scozne, to signifie, that it was more meet for the king to passe the time with such childishe exercise, than to attempt any worthy exploit. Wherefore the k. wrote to him, that per-ought long, he would tolde him some London balles that perchance should shake the walles of the best court in France. This yeare, Thom. Arundell archbishop of Canturburie departed this life, a stout prelat, and an earnest mainteiner of the Romish religion: Henrie Chichele bishop of saint David succeeded the same Arundell in the see of Canturburie, and the kings confessor, Stephan Watrington a Carmelite frier was made bishop of S. David. Henrie Berle then but a child, sonne to the lord Henrie Berle surnamed Hotspur, after his fathers deceasse, that was slaine at Shrewesburie field, was conueied into Scotland, and there left by his grandfather, where ever since he had remained: the king therefore pitied his case, and so procured for him, that he came home, and was restozed to all his lands and earldome of Northumberland, which lands before had bene given to the lord John, the kings brother.

A case verie strange, and for manie causes alwaies right worthy of remembrance, in this yeare 1414, the second of this kings reigne did befall, which conteining in it so manie matters for knowledge of Gods great power and iustice, of wilfull breaking his diuine lawes, of the easie slip into ruine where his mercie both not staie vs, the busie bogging of the di-uell alwaies, our weakenesse in combat with him, into what outrage and confusion he haleth where he is not withstood, with what tyrannie he tormenteth where he vanquisheth, what the will and power of a soueraigne ouer a subiect may force in cases of iniquitie, where by vertue and grace he be not restrained: the zeale of a parent, the pangs of a child, but chastie the verie plague of Gods wrath and indignation vpon wilfull and obstinate offenders, all which at those daies though touched in paples, yet at all times and euerie where so well seruing for example and warning, it hath bene thought verie conuenient the same in our stories also here to be noted, which was thus. At this time newes were brought into France, how king Lancelot (the aduersarie to Lewes king of Sicill) was departed, and in manner thus. It hapned that he fell in loue with a yong damosell his owne physicians daughter (a puzell ve-rie beautifull) and he in hope to inioy hir the easlier, caused hir father for his consent to be talked withall in the matter, which he vtterlie refused to grant, and shewed forth manie reasons for him; but at last all causes & excuses reiected, sith (though constrained) he must needs assent, feigned himselfe willing and content. And forcing talke with his daughter vpon his mind in the matter, chaste how meet it were the used his counsell how best with the king to keepe hir still in grace, he gaue hir a little box of ointment, and instruction withall, that when the king should come to haue his will, the should asoze with that balme annoint all hir toombe; the damosell on gods obseruation did after (at oportunitie) as hir father taught hir. Whereupon so pittifullie came it to passe, that the verie same night the king laie with hir, his bellie and hers were by and by set as it were all on a smyging fier, with tormentes of such vnquench-able scorching and burning euen into the verie en-trailes, that he of his kingdome, his life, his loue; and the of hir princelie promotion, thus some both fogt, ther made a sorrowfull end. After the plaie of this lamentable tragedie, the physician fled for his safetie; and straight vpon the newes king Lewes gathered a great assemblie, wherewith to passe towards Naples, and sent before a good companie vnder the lord Longnie marshall of France.

In the second yeare of his reigne, king Henrie called his high court of parlement, the last daie of Aprill in the towne of Leicester, in which parlement manie profitable lawes were concluded, and manie petitions moued, were for that time deferred. Amongst which, one was, that a bill exhibited in the parlement holden at Westminster in the eleuenth yeare of king Henrie the fourth (which by reason the king was then troubled with ciuill discord, came to none effect) might now with good deliberation be pondered, and brought to some good conclusion. The effect of which supplication was, that the temporall lands deuoutlie giuen, and disordinatlie spent by religious, and other spirituall persons, should be seized into the kings hands, sith the same might suffice to mainteine, to the honoz of the king, and defense of the realme, sixtene earles, sixtene hundred knights, six thousand and two hundred squiers, and a hundred almshouses, for reliefe onelie of the poore, impotent, and needie persons, and the king to haue cleere-lie to his coffers twentie thousand pounds, with manie other prouisions and values of religious houses, which I passe over.

This bill was much noted, and more feared among the religious sort, whom suerlie it touched verie nere, and therefore to find remedie against it, they determined to assaie all waies to put by and ouertrow this bill: wherein they thought best to trie if they might moue the kings mood with some sharpe in-uention, that he should not regard the importunate petitions of the commons. Whereupon, on a daie in the parlement, Henrie Chichele archbishop of Canturburie made a pithe oration, wherein he declared, how not onelie the duchies of Normandie and Aquitaine, with the counties of Anion and Paine, and the countrie of Gascoigne, were by vndoubted title appertaining to the king, as to the lawfull and onelie heire of the same; but also the whole realme of France, as heire to his great grandfather king Edward the third.

Herein did he much inuete against the surmised and false sained lawe Salike, which the Frenchmen alledge euer against the kings of England in barre of their iust title to the crowne of France. The verie words of that supposed lawe are these, In terram Sali- cam mulieres ne succedant, that is to saie, Into the Sa-like land let not women succeed. Which the French glossers expound to be the realme of France, and that this lawe was made by king Pharamond, whereas yet their owne authozs affirme, that the lawe Sa-like is in Germanie, betwene the riuers of Elbe and Sala; and that when Charles the great had ouer-come the Saxons, he placed there certeine Frenchmen, which hauing in disbeine the dishonest maners of the Germane women, made a law, that the females should not succedd to any inheritance within that land, which at this daie is called Helsen, so that if this be true, this lawe was not made for the realme of France, nor the Frenchmen possessed the land Sa-like, till foure hundred and one and twentie yeares after the death of Pharamond, the supposed maker of this Salike law, for this Pharamond deceased in the yeare 426, and Charles the great subdued the Saxons, and placed the Frenchmen in those parts beyond the riuier of Sala, in the yeare 804.

Moreouer, it appeareth by their owne writers, that king Pepine, which deposed Childerike, claimed the crowne of France, as heire generall, for that he was descended of Blithild daughter to king Clogg. j. thair

The Salike
law.

Helsen,

haire the first: Hugh Capet also, who usurped the crowne upon Charles duke of Lozaine, the sole heire male of the line and stocke of Charles the great, to make his title seeme true, and appeare good, though in deed it was starke naught, conueied himselfe as heire to the ladie Aingard, daughter to king Charles maine, sonne to Lewis the emperour, that was son to Charles the great. King Lewis also the tenth or therwise called saint Lewis, being verie heire to the said usurper Hugh Capet, could neuer be satisfied in his conscience how he might iustlie keepe and possesse the crowne of France, till he was persuaded and fullie instructed, that quene Isabell his grandmother was lineallie descended of the ladie Ermengard daughter and heire to the aboue named Charles duke of Lozaine, by the which marriage, the blood and line of Charles the great was againe vnted and restored to the crowne & scepter of France, so that more cleere than the sunne it openlie appeareth, that the title of king Pepin, the claime of Hugh Capet, the possession of Lewis, yea and the French kings to this daie, are deriued and conueied from the heire female, though they would vnder the colour of such a fained law, barre the kings and princes of this realme of England of their right and lawfull inheritance.

The archbishop further alleaged out of the booke of Numbers this saying: When a man dieth without a sonne, let the inheritance descend to his daughter. At length, hauing said sufficientlie for the proufe of the kings iust and lawfull title to the crowne of France, he exhorted him to aduance forth his banner to fight for his right, to conquer his inheritance, to spare neither blood, sword, nor fire, with his warre was iust, his cause good, and his claime true. And to the intent his louing chaplains and obedient subiects of the spiritualtie might shew themselves willing and desirous to aid his maiestie, for the recouerie of his ancient right and true inheritance, the archbishop declared that in their spirituall conuocation, they had granted to his highnesse such a summe of monie, as neuer by no spirituall persons was to any prince before those daies giuen or aduanced.

When the archbishop had ended his prepared tale, Rafe Percill earle of Westmerland, and as then lord Warden of the marches against Scotland, vnderstanding that the king vpon a couragious desire to recouer his right in France, would surerlie take the wars in hand, thought good to moue the king to begin first with Scotland, and therevpon declared how easie a matter it should be to make a conquest there, and how greatlie the same should further his wished purpose for the subduing of the Frenchmen, concluding the summe of his tale with this old saying: That Who so will France win, must with Scotland first begin. For matters he touched, as well to shew how necessarie the conquest of Scotland should be, as also to proue how iust a cause the king had to attempt it, trusting to persuaide the king and all other to be of his opinion.

The duke of Excester his wise and pithie answer to the earle of westmerlands saying.

A true saying.

But after he had made an end, the duke of Excester, uncle to the king, a man well learned and wise, who had bene sent into Italie by his father, intending that he should haue ben a preest replied against the earle of Westmerlands oration, affirming rather that he which would Scotland win, he with France must first begin. For if the king might once compass the conquest of France, Scotland could not long resist; so that conquere France, and Scotland would soon obvie. For where should the Scots learne policie and skill to defend themselves, if they had not their bringing by and training in France? If the French pensions maintained not the Scottish nobilitie, in what case should they be? Then take awaie

France, and the Scots will soon be tamed; France being to Scotland the same that the sap is to the tree, which being taken awaie, the tree must needs die and wither.

To be brieue, the duke of Excester used such earnest and pithie persuations, to induce the king and the whole assemblie of the parlement to credit his words, that immediatlie after he had made an end, all the companie began to crie; Warre, warre; France, France. Whereby the bill for dissoluing of religious houses was cleerelie set aside, and nothing thought on but onelie the recouering of France, according as the archbishop had moued. And vpon this point, after a few acts besides for the wealth of the realme established, the parlement was proroged vnto Westminster. ¶ Some write, that in this parlement it was enacted, that Lollards and heretikes with their maintainers and fauourers should be ipso facto adiudged guiltie of high treason: but in the statute made in the same parlement against Lollards, we find no such words: albeit by force of that statute it was ordeined, that persons so conuicted & executed, should lose their lands holden in fee simple, and all other their goods and cattels, as in cases of felonye.

During this parlement, there came to the king ambassadores, as well from the French king that was then in the hands of the Malientiall faction, as also from the duke of Burgognie, for aid against that faction; promising more (as was said) than late well in his power to performe. The king shortly after sent ambassadores to them both, as the bishop of Durham, and Spozwich, with others. ¶ Moreover at this parlement, John the kings brother was created duke of Bedford, and his brother Humphrie duke of Glocester. Also, Thomas Beaufort, marquisse Dorset, was created duke of Excester. Immediatlie after, the king sent ouer into France his uncle the duke of Excester, the lord Greie admerall of England, the archbishop of Dublin, and the bishop of Spozwich, ambassadores vnto the French king, with five hundred horse, which were lodged in the temple house in Paris, keeping such triumphant chere in their lodging, and such a solempne estate in their riding through the citie, that the Parisiens and all the Frenchmen had no small meruell at their honorable port.

The French king receiued them verie honorable, and banketted them right sumptuouslie, shewing to them iusts and sportfull pastimes, by the space of three daies together, in the which iusts the king himselfe, to shew his courage and aduinitie to the Englishmen, manfullie brake speares and lusslie tourneyed. When the triumph was ended, the English ambassadores, hauing a time appointed them to declare their message, admitted to the French kings presence, required of him to deliuer vnto the king of England the realme and crowne of France, with the entier duchies of Aquitaine, Normandie and Anjou, with the countreies of Poitou and Maine. For other requests they made: and this offered with all, that if the French king would without warre and effusion of christian blood, render to the king their maister his verie right & lawfull inheritance, that he would be content to take in marriage the ladie Katharine, daughter to the French king, and to indow hir with all the duchies and countreies before rehearsed: and if he would not so do, then the king of England did expresse and signifie to him, that with the aid of God, and helpe of his people, he would recouer his right and inheritance wrongfullie withheld from him, with mostall warre, and dint of sword. ¶ This in effect doth our English poet compile in his report of the occasion, which Henrie the fit toke to arreare battell against the French king: putting into the mouthes of the said king of England ambassadors an imagined speech, the conclusion thereof he maketh to be either restitution of that which the French had taken and detained from the English, or else fier and sword. His words are these,

—raptum nobis aut redde Britannia, Aut ferrum expectes, ultrices in super ignes.

The Frenchmen being not a little abashed at these demands, thought not to make any absolute answer in so weightie a cause, till they had further breathed; and therefore prayed the English ambassadors to take to the king their maister, that they now having no opportunitie to conclude in so high a matter, would shortly send ambassadors into England, which should certifie & declare to the king their whole mind, purpose, and intent. The English ambassadors returned with this answer, making relation of every thing that was said or done. King Henrie after the returne of his ambassadors, determined fullie to make warre in France, conceiving a good and perfect hope to have fortunate successe, with victorie for the most part followeth where right leadeth, being advanced forward by iustice, and set forth by equitie.

And because manie Frenchmen were promoted to ecclesiasticall dignities, as some to benefices, and some to abbeies and priories within the realme, and sent daile innumerable summes of monie into France, for the relafe of their naturall countrymen and kinsfolke, he therefore in favour of the publike wealth of his realme and subjects, in a counsell called at London, about Michaelmas, caused to be ordained, that no stranger hereafter should be promoted to any spirituall dignitie or degree within this realme, without his especiall licence, and full consent; and all they that should be admitted, should find sufficient securities, not to disclose the secrets of this realme to any forren person, nor to minister aid or succour to any of them with monie, or by any other meanes. This was confirmed in a convocation called at the same time by the new archbishop of Cantuarie.

Howsoever, such as were to go unto the generall counsell holden at Constance, were named and appointed to make them readie: for the king having knowledge from the emperor Sigismund, of the assembling of that counsell, thought it not convenient to sit still as an hearer, and no partaker in so high a cause, which touched the whole state of the christian common-wealth, as then troubled by reason of the schisme that yet continued. Wherefore he sent thither Richard earle of Warwick, the bishopps of Bath and Exeter, the abbat of Westminster, and the prior of Worcester, with divers other doctors and learned men of the spiritualtie; besides knights and esquires. They were in number eight hundred horses, so well appointed and furnished, as well the men as horses, that all nations marvelled to see such an honorable companie come from a countrie so far distant.

Diverse other things were concluded at that present: for the king had caused not onelie the lords of the spiritualtie, but also of the temporaltie to assemble here at London the same time, to treat speciallie of his journey that he purposed to make thither into France: and hereupon meanes was made for the gathering of monie, which was granted with so good a will both of the spiritualtie and temporaltie; that there was levied the summe of three hundred thousand markes English: and herewith order was given to gather a great host of men, thorough all his dominions. And for the more increasing of his navie, he sent into Holland, Zealand, and Friesland, to conduct and hire ships for the transporting and conveying over of his men and munitions of war, and finally provided for armour, victuals, monie, artillery, carriage, boates to passe over rivers covered with leather, tents, and all other things requisite for so high an enterprise.

The Frenchmen having knowledge hereof, the Dolphin, who had the gouernance of the realme, because his father was fallen into his old disease of frensie, sent for the dukes of Berry and Alanson, and all the other lords of the counsell of France: by whose advise it was determined, that they should not onelie prepare a sufficient armie to resist the king of England, when so ever he arrived to invade France, but also to suffice and furnish the townes on the frontiers and sea coasts with convenient garri- sons of men: and further to send to the king of England a solemn ambassage, to make to him some offers according to the demands before rehearsed. The charge of this ambassage was committed to the earle of Wandosme, to maister William Bourcier archbishop of Burges, and to maister Peter Fremell bishop of Aiseur, to the lords of Berry and Beaumont, and to maister Gaultier Cole the kings secretaire, and diuerse others.

These ambassadors accompanied with 350 horses, passed the sea at Calis, and landed at Dover, before whose arrivall the king was departed from Windsor to Winchester, intending to have gone to Hampton, there to have surveied his navie: but hearing of the ambassadors approaching, he tarried still at Winchester, where the said French lords shewed themselves verie honorable before the king and his nobilitie. At time prest, before the kings presence, sitting in his throne imperiall, the archbishop of Burges made an eloquent and a long oration, dissuading warre, and praising peace; offering to the king of England a great summe of monie, with diuerse countries, being in verie deed but bare and poore, as a dowrie with the ladie Catharine in marriage, so that he would dissolve his armie, and dismis his soldiers, which he had gathered and put in a readinesse.

When his oration was ended, the king caused the ambassadors to be highlye feasted, and set them at his own table. And after a date assigned in the foresaid hall, the archbishop of Cantuarie to their oration made a notable answer, the effect whereof was, that if the French king would not glue with his daughter in marriage the duchesse of Aquitaine, Anjou, and all other feignories and dominions sometimes appertaining to the noble progenitors of the king of England, he would in no wise retire his armie, nor breake his journey; but would with all diligence enter into France, and deströie the people, waste the countrie, and subvert the townes with blood, sword, and fire, and never cease till he had recovered his ancient right and lawfull patrimonie. The king answered the archbishops saying, and in the word of a prince promised to performe it to the uttermost.

The archbishop of Burges much grieved, that his ambassage was no more regarded; after certefine brags blustered out with impatience, as more pressing upon his prelate, than respecting his dutie of consideration to whom he spake and what became him to saye; he prayed safe conduct to depart. Which the king gently granted, and added withall to this effect: A little esteeme your French brags, & lesse set by your powder and strength; I know perfectly my right to my region, which you usurpe; & except you denie the apparant truth, to do your selues also: if you neither do nor will know it, yet God and the world knoweth it. Great prepa-

French wars

Abr. F. out of
In Angl. Hist.
sub Henr. 5.

“ since ye haue not yet tasted, If he haue louing sub“ iects, I am (I thanke God) not distressed of the same:
 “ and I fate this vnto you, that before one yeare passe, “ I trust to make the highest crowne of your countrie “ to scape, and the proudest miter to learne his humi-“ liatedo. In the meane time tell this to the blurper “ your master, that within three moneths, I will enter “ into France, as into mine owne true and lawfull “ patrimonie, appointing to acquire the same, not with “ brag of words, but with deeds of men, and dint of “ sword, by the aid of God, in whome is my whole trust “ and confidence. Further matter at this present I “ impart not vnto you, sauing that with warrant “ you may depart suerlie and safelie into your coun-“ trie, where I trust sooner to visit you, than you shall “ haue cause to bid me welcome. With this answer “ the ambassadors were displeased in their minds (al“ though they were highly intertained and liberallie “ rewarded) departed into their countrie, reporting to “ the Dolphin how they had sped.

After the French ambassadors were departed, the king like a prouident prince, thought good to take order for the resisting of the Scots, if (according to their manner) they should attempt any thing against his subiects in his absence. For that point appointed he the earle of Westmerland, the lord Scrope, the baron of Greystocke, sir Robert Umfrevill, & diuerse other valiant capteins to keepe the frontiers & marches of Scotland, which sir Robert Umfrevill on the daie of Marie Magdalen fought with the Scots at the towne of Cederling, hauing in his companie onelie three hundred archers, and seven score spears, where he (after long conflict) due of his enemies sicke and odde, took three hundred and fiftie prisoners, discomfited and put to flight one thousand and more, whome he followed in chase aboute twelue miles, but their hands full of prizes and prisoners, retired homeward (not without) to the castell of Rocheforrough, of the which he was capteine.

When the king had all promissors readie, and ordered all things for the defense of his realme, he leauing behind him for gouernour of the realme, the queene his mother in law, departed to Southampton, to take ship into France. And first princelie appointing to aduertise the French king of his com-ming, therefore dispatched Antelope his purueuant at armes with letters to him for restitution of that which he wrongfully withheld contrary to the lawes of God and man; the king further declaring how lothe he was that he should be thus compelled for repeating of his right and iust title of inheritance, to make warre to the destruction of Christian people, but when he had offered peace which could not be received, now for fault of iustice, he was forced to take armes. Wherefore he exhorted the French king in the howels of Iesu Christ, to render him that which was his owne, whereby effusion of Christian blood might be auoided. These letters chertie to this effect and purpose, were written and dated from Hampton the fift of August. When the same were presented to the French king, and by his counsell well perused, answer was made, that he would take equite, and prouide therein as time and place should be conueni-ent, so the messenger licensed to depart at his pleasure.

When king Henrie had fully furnished his nauie with men, munition, & other provisions, perceiuing that his captiues, wished nothing so much as de-laie, determined his souldiours to go a ship-board and auaite. But for the hap, the night before the daie appointed for their departure, he was crediblie informed, that Richard earle of Cambridge brother to Edward duke of York, and Henrie lord Scrope of Wadhams lord treasurer, with Thomas Craie a knight of Northumberland, being confederat togther, had conspired his death: wherefore he caused them to be apprehended. The said lord Scrope was in such fauour with the king, that he admitted him sometime to be his bedfellow, in whose fidelitie the king reposed such trust, that when any priuat or pu-blike counsell was in hand, this lord had much in the determination of it. For he represented to great gra-uitie in his countenance, such modestie in behauiour, and so vertuous zeale to all godlinesse in his talke, that whatsoeuer he said was thought for the most part necessarie to be done and followed. Also the said sir Thomas Craie (as some write) was of the kings priuie counsell.

These prisoners vpon their examination, confessed, that for a great summe of monie which they had received of the French king, they intended herelie el-ther to haue deliuered the king aliue into the hands of his enemies, or else to haue murdered him before he should arrive in the duchie of Normandie. When king Henrie had heard all things opened, which he desired to know, he caused all his nobilitie to come before his presence, before whome he caused to be brought the offenders also, and to them said. Having thus conspired the death and destruction of me, which am the head of the realme and gouernour of the people, it maye be (no doubt) but that you likewise haue sworne the confusion of all that are here with me, and also the desolation of your owne countrie. To what honoz (I say) for any true English hart to consider, that such an erecable iniquitie should ener so betwax you, as for pleasing of a forren entinie to imbue your hands in your blood, and to ruine your owne native soile. Reuenge herein touching my person, though I seeke not; yet for the safegard of you my deere frends, & for due preservation of all sorts, I am by office to cause example to be shewed. Get ye hence therefore ye paye miserable wretches to the re-ceiuing of your iust reward, wherein Gods maiestie giue you grace of his merete and repentance of your heinous offenses. And so immediatlie they were had to execution.

This done, the king calling his lords againe afore him, said in words few and with god grace. Of his enterprises he recounted the honoz and gloie, whereof they with him were to be partakers, the great confidence he had in their noble minds, which could not but remember them of the famous feats that their ancestors sometime in France had atchieved, whereof the due report for ener recorded remained yet in register. The great merete of God that had so grationlie reuealed vnto him the treason at hand, whereby the true harts of those afore him made so eminent & apparant in his etc, as they might be right sure he would neuer forget it. The doubt of danger to be nothing in respect of the certaintie of honoz that they should acquite, wherein himselfe (as they said) in person would be lord and leader through Gods grace. To whose maiestie as chertie was knowne the equite of his demand: even so to his merete did he onclie recommend the successe of his traucels. When the king had said, all the noble men kneled doونه, & promised faithfullie to serue him, duilie to obey him, and rather to die than to suffer him to fall into the hands of his enemies.

This done, the king thought that suerlie all treason and conspiracie had bene utterlie extinct: not suspecting the fies which was netolie kindled, and ceased not to increase, till at length it burst out into such a flame, that catching the beames of his house and familie, his line and stocke was cleane consumed to ashes. Wherefore write that Richard earle of Cambridge did not conspire with the lord Scrope & Thomas Craie for the murdering of king Henrie to pleaseth the French king withall, but onelie to the intent to exalt to the crowne his brother in law Edmund earle of March as heire to Lionell duke of Clarence: after the death of which earle of March, for Clarence secret impediments, not able to haue issue, the earle of Cambridge was sure that the crowne should come to him by his wife, and to his children, of his begotten. And therefore (as was thought) he rather confessed himselfe for need of monie to be corrupted by the French king, than he would declare his inward mind, and open his verie intent and secret purpose, which if it were espied, he saw plainlie that the earle of March should haue tasted of the same cruelty that he had drunken, and what should haue come to his owne children he much doubted. Therefore destitute of comfort & in despaire of life to saue his children, he feined that tale, desiring rather to saue his succession than himselfe, which he did in deed: for his sonne Richard duke of Yorke not praislie but openlie claimed the crowne, and Edward his sonne both claimed it, & gained it, as after it shall appeare.

Which thing if king Henrie had at this time either doubted, or foreseene, had neuer bene like to haue come to passe, as Hall saith.

But whatsoeuer hath bene reported of the confession of the earle of Cambridge, certeine it is, that indicted he was by the name of Richard earle of Cambridge of Conneburgh in the countie of Yorke knight, and with him Thomas Craie of Heton in the countie of Northumberland knight; for that they the twentieth daie of Iulie, in the third peare of king Henrie the fifts reigne, at Southampton, and in di-uerse other places within this realme, had conspired together with a power of men to them associat, without the kings licence, to haue led auaite the lord Edmund earle of March into Wales, and then to haue procured him to take vpon him the supreme government of the realme, in case that king Richard the second were dead: and herewith had purposed to set forth a proclamation there in Wales, in name of the said earle of March, as heire of the crowne against king Henrie, by the name of Henrie of Lancaster the usurper, to the end that by such meanes they might draw the more number of the kings liege people vnto the said earle; and further to haue conueied a banner of the armes of England, and a certaine crowne of Spaine set vpon a pallet, and laid in gage to the said earle of Cambridge, by the king, together with the said earle of March into the parties of Wales aforesaid.

Further, that the said earle of Cambridge, and sir Thomas Craie had appointed certeine of the kings liege people to repaire into Scotland, and to bring from thence one Thomas Crumington; also an other resembling in shape, fauour, and countenance king Richard, and Henrie Perie, together with a great multitude of people to fight with the king, and him to destroe in open field. Beside this, that they had meant to twin certeine castles in Wales, and to keepe them against the king: and manie other treasons they had contriued, as by the indictment was specified, to the intent they might destroe the king and his children, the dukes of Bedford and Gloucester, and other the great lords & peers of the realme. And Henrie Scrope of Spalham, of Flardest, in the coun-tie of Yorke was likewise indicted, as consenting to the premises. So that it appeareth their purpose was well inough then perceiued, although hapilie not much bnted abroad, for considerations thought necessarie to haue it rather hysht and kept secret.

About the selfe same time the lord Cobham with his friends, whether as one of counsell in the conspi-racie with the earle of Cambridge or not, was determined to haue made some attempt against the lord of Aburgauennie, who being aduertised thereof, got for his defense from Worcester, Perforce, Tenke-burie, and other places thereabout, to the number of foue thousand archers, and other armed men, which came to him vnto his castell of Hancleie: whereof when the lord Cobham was aduertised, he withdrew again to such secret places about Saluerne, as he had prouided for his suertie, to resort vnto: but a priest that belonged vnto him, was taken, and di-uerse other, who disclosed to the lord Aburgauennie, one of the places where the said lord Cobham with his men dyed to keepe themselves close. Vnto that place the lord Aburgauennie went, where he found in deed monie and armor piled vp betwixt two wals; handsomelie conueied and framed for the purpose; but the lord Cobham with his folkes were withdrawn into some other place, after they once heard, that the earle of Cambridge and the lord Scrope were executed.

But now to proceed with king Henries doings.

After this, when the wind came about prosperous to his purpose, he caused the mariners to weie by anchors, and hoise vp sailes, and to set forthward with a thousand ships, on the vigill of our ladie daie the As-umption, and toke land at Caer, commonlie called Aldraur, where the riuer of Saine runneth into the sea, without resistance. At his first coming on land, he caused proclamation to be made, that no person should be so hardie on paine of death, either to take anie thing out of anie church that belonged to the same, or to hurt or do anie violence either to priests, women, or anie such as should be found without weapon or armor, and not readie to make resistance: also that no man should renew anie quarell or strife, whereby anie fraie might arise to the disquieting of the armie.

The next daie after his landing, he marched toward the towne of Harflue, standing on the riuer of Saine betwene two hills; he besieged it on euerie side, rat-sing bulwarks and a bastell, in which the two earles of Bent & Huntington were placed, with Cornwall, Craie, Steward, and Porter. On that side towards the sea, the king lodged with his field, and the duke of Clarence on the further side towards Rome. There were within the towne the lords de Monteuill and Gaucourt, with diuerse other that valiantlie defended the siege, doing what damage they could to their abusers; and damming by the riuer that hath his course through the towne, the water rose so high betwixt the kings campe, and the duke of Clarence campe (diuided by the same riuer) that the Englishmen were constrained to withdraw their ar-tillerie from one side, where they had planted the same.

The French king being aduertised, that king Henrie was arrived on that coast, sent in all hast the lord de la Bzeth constable of France, the seneshall of France, the lord Bouciquall marshal of France, the senehall of Penault, the lord Lignie with other, which fortified townes with men, victuals, and artillerie on all those frontiers towards the sea.
And hearing that Harflue was besieged, they came to the castell of Candebecke, being not farre from Harflue, to the intent they might succor their friends which were besieged, by some policie or meanes: but the Englishmen, notwithstanding all the damage that the Frenchmen could worke against them, for-rated the countrie, spoiled the villages, bringing manie a rich preie to the campe before Harflue. And da-lie was the towne assaulted: for the duke of Gloucester, to whome the order of the siege was committed, made three mines vnder the ground, and approching to the wals with his engins and ordinance, would not suffer them within to take anie rest.

they went no further forward with that worke; yet they were so inclosed on eche side, as well by water as for the king lieng with his battell on the hill side on the one partie, and the duke of Clarence beyond the riuier that passeth by the towne, and runneth into Saine on the other partie, beside other lordes and cap-teins that were lodged with their retinues for their most advantage: none could be suffered to go in, or come forth, without their licence; insomuch that such that watched the riuier.

The capitaine within the towne, perceiuing that they were not able long to resist the continuall assaits of the Englishmen, knowing that their walls were undermined, and like to be ouerthrowne (as one of their bulwarks was alreadie, where the earles of Huntington and Kent had set vp their banners) sent an officer at armes forth about midnight after the feast daie of saint Lambert, which fell that yeare vpon the tuesday, to beseech the king of England to appoint some certeine persons as commissioners from him, with whom they within might treat about some agreement. The duke of Clarence, to whome this messenger first declared his errand, aduertised the king of their request, who granting thereto, appointed the duke of Excester, with the lord Fitz Hugh, and sir Thomas Erpingham, to vnderstand their minds, who at the first requested a truce vntill sundae next following the feast of saint Michaell, in which meane time if no succour came to remoue the siege, they would undertake to deliuer the towne into the kings hands, their liues and goods saued.

3 fine dates respit.

The king aduertised herof, sent them word, that except they would surrender the towne to him the morow next ensuing, without any condition, they should spend no more time in talke about the matter. But yet at length through the earnest sute of the French lords, the king was contented to grant them truce vntill nine of the clocke the next saturday, being the two and twentieth of September; with condition, that if in the meane time no reliefe came, they should yeld the towne at that houre, with their bodies and goods to stand at the kings pleasure. And for assurance thereof, they deliuered into the kings hands thirtie of their best capitaine and merchants within that towne as pledges. But other wise, that it was covenanted, that they should deliuer but one lie to eue pledges, and that if the siege were not raised by the French kings power within six daies next following, then should they deliuer the towne into the king of England hands, and thirtie of the chiefe personages within the same, to stand for life or death at his will and pleasure: and as for the residue of the men of warre and totonemen, they should depart whether they would, without carieng forth either armour, weapon, or goods.

The king neuerthelesse was after content to grant a respit vpon certeine conditions, that the capitains within might haue time to send to the French king for succour (as before he haue heard) least he intending greater exploits, might lose time in such small matters. When this composition was agreed vpon, the lord Bacqueruill was sent vnto the French king, to declare in what point the towne stood. To whome the Dolphin answered, that the kings power was not yet assembled, in such number as was conuenient to raise so great a siege. This answer being brought vnto the capitaine within the towne, they rendered it vp to the king of England, after that the third daie was expired, which was on the daie of saint Maurice being the leuen and thirtieth daie after the siege was first laid: The souldiours were ransomed, and the towne sacked, to the great gaine of the Englishmen. Some writing of this yelding vp of Harflue, do in like sort make mention of the distresse whereto the people, then expelled out of their habitations, were giuen: insomuch as parents with their children, young maids and old folke went out of the towne gates with heauie hearts (God wot) as put to their present shifts to seeke them a new abode. Besides that, king Henrie caused proclamation to be made within his owne dominions of England, that whosoever (either handicraftsman, merchant, or gentleman, or plowman) would inhabit in Har-flue, should haue his dwelling giuen him gratis, and his heire after him also inioy the like grace and fa-uour: insomuch that great multitudes flocked to the sea coasts, waiting wind and weather for their trans-portage into Harflue, where being arrived, wonder-full it is to tell, within how short a time the towne was peopled. This doth Anglorum praelia report, saieing (not without good ground, I beleue) as followeth; tum flentes tenera cum prole parentes

Virgineisque choros veteres liquere penates

Tum populus cunctus de portu Gallicus exit

Machus, inarmatus, vacuus, miser, eger, indigens

Vtique nobis fides querat migrare coactus

Oppidulo belli potuerunt inire Britanni, &c.

All this done, the king ordeined capitaine to the towne his vncle the duke of Excester, who established his lieutenant there, one sir John Fastolfe, with fiftene hundred men, or (as some haue) two thousand and thirtie sir knights, whereof the baron of Carew, and sir Hugh Luttrell, were two counsellors. And because many of his nobles whilst this siege late before Harflue, fell sicke of the sir and other diseases, diuerse also dead, amongst whom the earle of Stafford, the bishop of Norwich, the lords Spolins and Burnell were foure (beside others) the king licensed his brother the duke of Clarence, John earle marshall, and John earle of Arundell, being infected with that disease, to returne into England.

King Henrie, after the winning of Harflue, determined to haue proceeded further in the winning of other townes and fortresses: but because the dead time of the winter approached, it was determined by advice of his counsell, that he should in all conueni-ent speed set forward, and march through the countie towards Calis by land, least his returne as then homewards should of standerons tongues be named a running away: and yet that tourne was aduised perillous, by reason that the number of his people was much diminished by the sir and other fevers, which fore vered and brought to death above fiftene hundred persons of the armie: and this was the cause that his returne was the sooner appointed and concluded.

But before his departing thence, he entred into the towne of Harflue, & went to the church of saint Martines, and there offered: All the men of warre which had not paid their ransoms; he swore them on the holie euangelists, to yeld themselves prisoners at Calis by the feast of saint Martine in November next. There were two strong towers standing on the hauen side at Harflue, which looking for aid, did not yeld, till ten daies after the towne was rendered.
When the king had repaired the walles, bulwarks and rampiers about the towne, and furnished it with bittels and artillerie, he remoued from Harflue toward Ponthoisse, intending to passe the riuier of Some with his armie, before the bridges were either withdrawen or broken. Such bittels and other necessaries as were to be carried with the armie, he appointed to be laid on horses, leauing the carts and wagons behind for lesse incombze.

The French king hearing that the towne of Har due was gotten, and that the king of England was marching forward into the bowels of the realme of France, sent out proclamations, and assembled peo ple on euerie side, committing the whole charge of his armie to his sonne the Dolphine and duke of Aquitaine, who incontinentlie caused the brydges to be broken, and the passages to be kept. Also they cau ed all the corne and vittels to be conueied awaite, or destroyed in all places, where it was conueied that the Englishmen would passe. The king of England nothing dismayed herewith, kept his iourne in spite of his enemies, constraining them within diuerse townes and holds to furnish him with vittels: but yet as he passed by the towne of Cw, the garrison of the towne issued forth, and gaue the Englishmen a skirmish, who beat them into the towne with losse, namelie of a right valiant man of armes, named Lancelot Piers. There were manie Englishmen hurt with quercels shot off from the lops and walls, as they pursued the enemies vnto the gates.
At length the king approached the riuier of Some, & finding all the brydges broken, he came to the passage of Blanchetake, where his great grandfather king Edward the thirde a little before had stricken the bat tell of Cressie: but the passage was now so impeached with stakes in the botome of the fozd, that he could not passe, his enemies besides there awaite so swar ming on all sides. He therefore marched forwards to Arames, marching with his armie, and passing with his carriage in so martiall a manner, that he ap peared so terrible to his enemies, as they durst not of fer him battell. And yet the lord Dalbryth constable of France, the marshall Boncequault, the earle of Wendome great master of France, the duke of A lancon, and the earle of Richmond, with all the puis sance of the Dolphin laie at Abulle, but euer kept the passages, and coasted aloofe, like a hauke though ea ger yet not hardie on hir prey. The king of England kept on his iourne till he came to the brydge of Saint Parence, where he found aboue thirtie thousand Frenchmen, and there pitched his field, looking suer lie to be fought withall.
Wherefore to incourage his capteins the more, he dubbed certeine of his hardie and valiant gentle men knyghts, as John lord Ferrers of Grobie, Re ginald of Greiffocke, Piers Tempess, Christopher Poissibe, Thomas Piskering, William Huddleston, John Holbalton, Henrie Portimer, Philip Hall, and William his brother, Jaques de Wyndon, and di uerse other: but the French making no semblance to fight, he departed in good order of battell by the towne of Amiens, to another towne nere to a ca stell called Bolwes, and there laie two daies looking for their bidding of battell euerie houre. From thence he came nere to Corbie, where he was staied that night, for that the common people and pezants mightie there assembled, hauing gotten them some head and bartening by means of their number that was great, and by trust of a strength (then ioined vn to them) made of men at armes (manie to fall and well appointed for fight) all of the garrison of Cor bie: a strong towne well walled and warded. Here upon at a streit (which they had preoccupied) they scoutle from our armie not onelie kept the passage, but also upon vs gaue a proud onset: wherein sir Hugh Stafford knight lord Bourghchier, chiefeine of a wing to the king vnder his standard of Guien, and as then next to the entrie, though far inferior in number, yet with readie and valiant encounter receiued them. The force and slaughter grew great both on the one side and the other, by the French in speciall at first sight fiercelie pursued, in so much as with an hardie charge vpon our men, they had both beat downe the standard, and also from vs quite waite it awaite, to their hie incouragement, and our incredible despite and dismaie. Whereat one John Bromley of Bromley in Staffordshire esquier, a nere kinsman vnto the lord Bourghchier, was euen streight so pearced at hart, as he could not contene him, but by and by ran eagerlie vpon the French, and with his souldiers (in whom wrath and teene had al readie inflamed fire and desire of reuenge) did so fiercelie set vpon them, that they were not onlie bea ten backe, but also forced to abandon the place. At this push the capteine cutting through the thickest, strake downe the champion that bare the standard, and so gloriouly recovered it againe, and after du ring the fight (where as manie of the French lost their liues) couragionlie ouer his souldiers auanted it himselfe. The rest that fled awaite our people pur sued in chaling & slaughter vnto Corbie vertie gates.

So in victorie, honor, and great ioy, with our small losse (in comparison) thanks vnto Gods maiestie, the cheefeine brought his host into his campe and order againe. The singular prowes of this worthie capteine the noble man highlie regarding, in an ample testi monie thereof and vpon his owne honorable confi deration, by a faire ancient deed yet extant at these daies did giue him reward of fortie pounds annuite for his life. The monument so plainelie declaring the truth of the matter, with the maner and dignitie of the feat, as it was done, hath bene thought vertie

It. Henries answer to the Defiance.

When he had thus answered the herald, he gaue him a princelie reward, and licence to depart. Upon whose returne, with this answer, it was incontinentlie to the French side proclaimed, that all men of warre should resort to the constable to fight with the king of England. Wherevpon, all men apt for armour and desirous of honour, dreyne them toward the field. The Dolphin soze desired to haue bene at the battell, but he was prohibited by his father: likewise Phillip earle of Charolois would glablie haue bene there.

They were lodged euen in the waite by the which the Englishmen must needs passe towards Calis, and all that night after their coming thither, made great cheare and were verie merie, pleasant, and full of game. The Englishmen also for their parts were of good comfort, and nothing abashed of the matter, and yet they were both hungrie, wearie, for trauel-led, and vbered with manie cold diseases. Holobert reconciling themselves with God by bowell and stiff, requiring allisiance at his hands that is the oneli giuer of victoize, they determined rather to die, than to yeld, or flee. The date following was the sixte

The number of the French army.

In the morning, the French capteins made thre battels, in the batward were eight thousand healmes of knights and equiers, foure thousand archers, and fiftene hundred crosbowes which were guided by the lord de la Bzeth, constable of France, hauing with him the dukes of Oyleance and Bourbon, the earles of Cleue and Richmond, the marshall Boucquart, and the maister of the crosbowes, the lord Dampier admerall of France, and other capteins. The earle of Wandosme with fiftene hundred men of armes were ordered for a wing to that battell. And the other wing was guided by sir Guichard Dolphin, sir Clugnet of Babant, and sir Letwes Bourdon, with eight hundred men of armes, of elect cholen persons. And to breake the shot of the Englishmen, were appointed sir Guilliam de Saueuses, with Hector and Philip his brethren, Ferrie de Maille, and Alen de Calpanes, with other eight hundred of armes.

In the middle ward, were assigned as manie persons, as were in the formost battell, and the charge thereof was committed to the dukes of Wat and Alanson, the earles of Fleuers, Wandemont, Blamont, Salinges, Grant Pie, & of Ruffie. And in the rereward were all the other men of armes guided by the earles of Parle, Dampmartine, Fauconberg, and the lord of Lourreie capteine of Arde, who had with him the men of the frontiers of Bolonois. Thus the Frenchmen being ordered vnder their standards and banners, made a great shew: for furtie they were esteemed in number sir times as manie or more, than was the whole compante of the Englishmen, with wagoners, pages and all. They rested themselves, waiting for the bloudie blast of the terrible trumpet, till the houre betwene nine and ten of the clocke of the same daie, during which season, the constable made vnto the capteins and other men of warre a pithie oration, exhorting and incouraging them to do valiantlie, with manie comfortable words and sensible reasons. King Henrie also like a leader, and not as one led; like a soueraigne, and not an inferiour, perceiving a plot of ground betwene strong & meet for his purpose, which on the backe halfe was fenced with the village, wherein he had lodged the night before, and on both sides defended with hedges and bushes, thought good there to imbattell his host; and so ordered his men in the same place, as he saw occasion, and as stood for his most aduantage.

The number of the English army and archers.

First, he sent priuillie two hundred archers into a lone medow, which was nere to the bauntgard of his enemies; but separated with a great ditch, commanding them there to keepe themselves close till they had a token to them giuen, to let drue at their aduersaries: beside this, he appointed a batward, of the which he made capteine Edward duke of York, who of an haillie courage had desired that office, and with him were the lords Beaumont, Willoughbie, and Franhope, and this battell was all of archers. The middle ward was gouerned by the king himselfe, with his brother the duke of Gloucester, and the earles of Marthall, Drenford, and Suffolke, in the which were all the strong bilmen. The duke of Gloucester uncle to the king led the rereward, which was mixed both with bilmen and archers: The hostlemen like things went on euerie side of the battell.

Thus the king hauing ordered his battels, feared not the puillance of his enemies, but yet to prouide that they should not with the multitude of hostlemen breake the order of his archers, in whome the force of his armie consisted. For in those daies the people had their lims at libertie, with their hosen were then fastened with one point, and their iackes long and easie to shot in; so that they might brate bowes of great strength, and shot arrowes of a yard long; beside the head he caused stakes bound with iron sharpe at both ends, of the length of fure or six foot to be pitched before the archers, and of ech side the footmen like an hedge, to the intent that if the harded horses ran rashlie vpon them, they might shortly be gozed and destroyed. Certaine persons also were appointed to remoue the stakes, as by the moueing of the archers occasion and time should require, so that the footmen were hedged about with stakes, and the hostlemen stood like a bulwarke betwene them and their enemies, without the stakes. This device of fortifying an armie, was at this time first inuented: but since that time they haue deuised caltraps, harrowes, and other new engins against the force of hostlemen; so that if the enemies run hazzlie vpon the same, either are their horses wounded with the stakes, or their feet hurt with the other engins, so as thereby the beasts are gozed, or else made vnable to mainteine their course.

King Henrie, by reason of his small number of people to fill vp his battels, placed his bauntgard so on the right hand of the maine battell, which himselfe led, that the distance betwixt them might scarce be perceiued, and so in like case was the rereward intened on the left hand, that the one might the more readily succour an other in time of need. When he had thus ordered his battels, he left a small compante to keepe his campe and carriage, which remained still in the village, and then calling his capteins and soldiers about him, he made to them a right graue oration, mouing them to plaie the men, whereby to obtaine a glorious victorie, as there was hope certefie they should, the rather if they would but remember the iust cause for which they fought, and whome they should encounter, such saint-harded people as their ancestors had so often ouercome. To conclude, manie words of courage he vttered, to stirre them to do manfullie, assuring them that England should neuer be charged with his ransome, nor anie Frenchman triumph ouer him as a captiue; for either by famous death or glorious victorie would he (by Gods grace) win honour and fame.

K. Henries oration to his men.

It is said, that as he heard one of the host utter his wish to another thus: I would to God there were with vs now so manie good soldiers as are at this houre within England! the king answered: I would not wish a man more here than I haue, we are intened in comparison to the enemies but a few, but if God of his clemencie doe fauour vs, and our just cause (as I trust he will) we shall speed well through. But let no man ascribe victorie to our owne strength and might, but onelie to Gods assistance, to whome I haue no doubt we shall worthilie haue cause to giue thanks therefore. And if so be that for our offences takes we shall be deliuered into the hands of our enemies, the lesse number we be, the lesse damage shall the realme of England susteine: but if we should fight in trust of multitude of men, and so get the victorie (our minds being prone to pride) we should thereby perauenture ascribe the victorie not so much to the gift of God, as to our owne puillance, and thereby prouoke his high indignation and displeasure against vs: and if the enemy get the vpper hand, then should our realme and countrie suffer more damage and stand in further danger. But be you of good comfort, and shew your selues valiant. God and our iust quarrell shall defend vs, and deliuer these our proud aduersaries with all the multitude of them which you see (or at the least the most of them) into our hands. Whilste the king was yet thus in speech, either armie so maligned the other, being as then in open fight, that euerie man cried, Forward, forward. The dukes of Clarence, Gloucester, and York, were of the same opinion, yet the king staid a while, least anie ieopardie were not foresene, or anie hazard not prevented. The Frenchmen in the meane while, as though they had bene sure of victorie, made great triumph, for the capitains had determined before, how to diuide the spoile, and the soldiers the night before had plaid the Englishmen at dice. The noble men had denised a chariot, wherein they might triumphantly conueie the king captiue to the citie of Paris, crying to their soldiers; Vasse you to the spoile, glorie and honoz; little wening (God wot) how some their bzags should be blowne awaie.

Here we may not forget how the French thus in their iollitie, sent an herald to king Henrie, to inquire what ranfome he would offer. Wherevnto he answered, that within two or thre houres he hoped it would so happen, that the Frenchmen should be glad to common rather with the Englishmen for their ranfoms, than the English to take thought for their deliuerance, promising for his owne part, that his dead carcasle should rather be a prize to the Frenchmen, than that his liuing bodie should paie anie ranfome. When the messenger was come backe to the French host, the men of warre put on their helmes, and caused their trumpets to blow to the battell. They thought themselues so sure of victorie, that diuerse of the noble men made such hast towards the battell, that they left manie of their seruants and men of warre behind them, and some of them would not once staie for their standards: as amongst other the duke of Bhabant, when his standard was not come, caused a baner to be taken from a trumpet and fastened to a speare, the which he commanded to be borne before him in stead of his standard.

But when both these armies comming with in danger either of other, set in full order of battell on both sides, they stood still at the first, beholding either others demeanoz, being not distant in sunder past thre bowshots. And when they had on both parts thus staid a good while without doing anie thing, (except that certeine of the French hoisemen aduancing forwards, betwixt both the hosts, were by the English archers constrained to returne backe) aduise was taken amongst the Englishmen, what was best for them to do. Wherevpon all things considered, it was determined, that with the Frenchmen would not come forward, the king with his armie imbatelled (as ye haue hard) should march towards them, and so leauing their trulle and baggage in the village where they lodged the night before, onlie with their weapons, armour, and stakes prepared for the purpose, as ye haue heard.

These made somewhat forward, before whome there went an old knight sir Thomas Erpingham (a man of great experience in the warre) with a warder in his hand; and when he cast by his warder, all the armie shouted, but that was a signe to the archers in the medow, which therewith shot wholie altogether at the banward of the Frenchmen, who when they perceived the archers in the medow, and saw they could not come at them for a ditch that was betwixt them, with all hast set vpon the foze ward of king Henrie, but yet they could iointe, the archers in the forefront, and the archers on that side which stood in the medow, so wounded the footmen, galled the hoisles, and combed the men of armes, that the footmen durst not go forward, the hoisemen ran together vpon plumps without order, some ouerthrew such as were next them, and the hoisles ouerthrew their masters, and so at the first iointing, the Frenchmen were foulely discomforted, and the Englishmen highly encouraged.

When the French banward was thus brought to confusion, the English archers cast awaie their bowes, & toke into their hands, ares, malls, swordes, bills, and other hand-weapons, and with the same due the Frenchmen, untill they came to the middle ward. When approached the king, and so encouraged his people, that hostlie the second battell of the Frenchmen was ouerthrowne, and dispersed, not without great slaughter of men: howbeit, diuerse were released by their barlets, and conueied out of the field. The Englishmen were so busied in fighting, and taking of the prisoners at hand, that they followed not in chase of their enemies, nor would once breake out of their arraie of battell. Yet sundrie of the Frenchmen stronglie withstood the fiercenesse of the English, when they came to handle strokes, so that the fight sometime was doubtfull and perillous. Yet as part of the French hoisemen set their course to haue entered vpon the kings battell, with the stakes ouerthrowne, they were either taken or slaine. Thus this battell continued thre long houres.

The king that daie shewed himselfe a valiant knight, albeit almost felled by the duke of Alancon; yet with plaine strength he due two of the dukes companie, and felled the duke himselfe; whome when he would haue yeldeb, the kings gard (contrarie to his mind) due out of hand. In conclusion, the king minding to make an end of that daies toznie, caused his hoisemen to fetch a compasse about, and to iointe with him against the rereward of the Frenchmen, in the which was the greatest number of people. When the Frenchmen perceived his intent, they were suddenlie amazed and ran awaie like shepe, without order or arraie. Which when the king perceived, he encouraged his men, and followed so quicklie vpon the enemies, that they ran hither and thither, casting awaie their armour: manie on their knees desired to haue their liues saued.

In the meane season, while the battell thus continued, and that the Englishmen had taken a great number of prisoners, certeine Frenchmen on horsebacke, whereof were capitains Robinet of Bozenuill, Riffart of Clamas, Flambert of Agincourt, and other men of armes, to the number of sir hundred hoisemen, which were the first that fled, hearing that the English tents & pavilions were a good waie distant from the armie, without anie sufficient gard to defend the same, either vpon a conetous meaning to gaine by the spoile, or vpon a desire to be reuenged, entered vpon the kings campe, and there spoiled the hails, robbed the tents, brake vp chests, and carried awaie caskets, and due such seruants as they found to make anie resistance. For which treason and harkardie in thus leauing their campe at the verie point of fight, for winning of spoile where none to defend it, verie manie were after committed to prison, and had lost their liues, if the Dolphin had longer liued.

But when the outcrie of the lackies and boies, which ran awaie for feare of the Frenchmen thus spoiling the campe, came to the kings eares, he doubting least his enemies should gather together againe, and begin a new field; and mistrusting further that the prisoners would be an aid to his enemies, or the verie enemies to their takers in deed if they were suffered to liue, contrarie to his accustomed gentleness, commanded by sound of trumpet, that euerie man (vpon paine of death) should incontinentlie slaine his prisoner. When this dolorous decrea, and pittifull proclamation was pronounced, pittie it was to see how some Frenchmen were suddenlie stiked with daggers, some were hained with pollaxes, some slaine with malls, other had their throats cut, and some their bellies panned, so that in effect, hauing respect to the great number, few prisoners were saued.

Englishmen disposed themselves in order of battell, ready to abide a new field, and also to invade, and newlie set on their enemies, with great force they assailed the earles of Harle and Fauconbridge, and the lords of Loraie, and of Thine, with six hundred men of armes, who had all that daie kept together, but now slaine and beaten downe out of hand. ¶ Some write, that the king perceiving his enemies in one part to assemble together, as though they meant to give a new battell for preservation of the prisoners, sent to them an herald, commanding them either to depart out of his sight, or else to come forward at once, and give battell: promising herewith, that if they did offer to fight againe, not onelie those prisoners which his people already had taken; but also so manie of them as in this new conflict, which they thus attempted should fall into his hands, should die the death without redemption.

The Frenchmen fearing the sentence of so terrible a decree, without further delay parted out of the field. And so about foure of the clocke in the after none, the king when he saw no apperance of enemies, caused the retreat to be blown; and gathering his armie together, gave thanks to almighty God for so happie a victorie, causing his prelates and chaplains to sing this psalme: In exitu Israel de Aegypto, and commanded everie man to kneele downe on the ground at this verse: Non nobis Domine, non nobis, sed nomini tuo da gloriam. Which done, he caused Te Deum, with certaine anthems to be sung, giving laud and praise to God, without boasting of his owne force or antic humane power. That night he and his people took rest, and refreshed themselves with such victuals as they found in the French campe, but lodged in the same village where he laye the night before.

In the morning, Montjoye king at armes and foure other French heralds came to the king to know the number of prisoners, and to desire buriall for the dead. Before he made them answer (to understand what they would saie) he demanded of them whie they made to him that request, considering that he knew not whether the victorie was his or theirs. When Montjoye by true and iust confession had cleared that doubt to the high praise of the king, he desired of Montjoye to understand the name of the castell nere adjoining: when they had told him that it was called Agincourt, he said, Then shall this conflict be called the battell of Agincourt. He feasted the French officers of armes that daie, and granted them their request, which busilie sought through the field for such as were slaine. But the Englishmen suffered them not to go alone, for they searched with them, and found manie hurt, but not in ieopardie of their lives, whom they took prisoners, and brought them to their tents. When the king of England had well refreshed himselfe, and his souldiers, that had taken the spoile of such as were slaine, he with his prisoners in good order returned to his towne of Calis.

When tidings of this great victorie, was blowne into England, solemne processions and other praises to almighty God with bounce-fires and toisfull triumphes, were ordeined in everie towne, citie, and burrow, and the maiors and citizens of London went from the church of saint Simon and Jude to the church of saint Paule to the church of saint Peter at Westminster in devout maner, rendering to God hartie thanks for such fortunate lucke sent to the king and his armie. The same sundae that the king removed from the campe at Agincourt towards Calis, diuerse Frenchmen came to the field to view againe the dead bodies; and the peasants of the countie spoiled the carcasses of all such apparell and other things as the Englishmen had left: who took nothing but gold and silver, jewels, rich apparell and costlie armour. But the plowmen and peasants left nothing behind, neither shirt nor clout: so that the bodies laye stark naked untill wednesday. On the which daie diuerse of the noble men were conveyed into their countries, and the remnant were by Philip earle Charolois (for lamenting the chance, and moved with pittie) at his costs & charges buried in a square plot of ground of sixtine hundred yards; in the which he caused to be made three pits, wherein were buried by account five thousand and eight hundred persons, beside them that were caried away by their friends and seruants, and others, which being wounded died in hospitals and other places.

After this their dolorous idurne & pittifull slaughter, diuerse clearks of Paris made manie a lamentable verse, complaining that the king reigned by will, and that counsellors were parciall, affirming that the noble men fled against nature, and that the commons were destroyed by their prodigallitie, declaring also that the cleargie were dumbe, and durst not saie the truth, and that the humble commons durst not obeyed, & yet ever suffered punishment, for which cause by diuine persecution the lesse number vanquished the greater: wherefore they concluded, that all things went out of order, and yet was there no man that studied to bring the unrulie to frame. It was no marvell though this battell was lamentable to the French nation, for in it were taken and slaine the flower of all the nobilitie of France.

There were taken prisoners, Charles duke of Orleans nephew to the French king, John duke of Bourbon, the lord Bouciquault one of the marshalls of France (he after died in England) with a number of other lords, knights, and esquires, at the least sixtine hundred, besides the common people. There were slaine in all of the French part to the number of ten thousand men, whereof were princes and noble men bearing banners one hundred twentie and six; to these, of knights, esquires, and gentlemen, so manie as made up the number of eight thousand and foure hundred (of the which five hundred were dubbed knights the night before the battell) so as of the meaner sort, not past sixtine hundred. Amongst those of the nobilitie that were slaine, these were the chiefe, Charles lord de la Brosse high constable of France, Jaques of Chatillon lord of Dampier admerall of France, the lord Rambures master of the crossbowes, sir Guiscard Dolphin great master of France, John duke of Alanson, Anthonie duke of Brabant brother to the duke of Burgonie, Edward duke of Bar, the earle of Heuers an other brother to the duke of Burgonie, with the earles of Harle, Audemont, Beaumont, Grandpre, Rouille, Fauconberge, Foies and Aestrike, beside a great number of lords and barons of name.

Of Englishmen, there died at this battell, Edward duke of Yorke, the earle of Suffolke, sir Richard Biskelie, and Davie Gamme esquier, and of all other not about five and twentie persons, as some do report; but other writers of greater credit affirme, that there were slaine about five or six hundred persons, Titus Linius saith, that there were slaine of Englishmen, beside the duke of Yorke, and the earle of Suffolke, an hundred persons at the first encounter. The duke of Glocester the kings brother was sore wounded about the hips, and borne downe to the ground, so that he fell backwards, with his feet towards his enemies, whom the king bestrode, and like a brother valiantlie rescued from his enemies, & so saving his life, caused him to be conveyed out of the fight, into a place of more safetie. ¶ The which order of this conflict which cost manie a mans life, and procured great bloodshed before it was ended, is liuelie described in Anglorum praelij; where also, besides the manner of disposing

After that the king of England had refreshed himselfe, and his people at Calis, and that such prisoners as he had left at Harflue (as ye haue heard) were come to Calis unto him, the first date of Nouember, he with all his prisoners took shipping, and the same date landed at Douer, hauing with him the dead bodies of the duke of Poike, and the earle of Suffolke, and caused the duke to be buried at his colledge of Fobringhey, and the earle at new Elme. In this passage, the seas were so rough and troublous, that two ships belonging to sir John Cornetwall, lord Fanhope, were duien into Zeland; howbeit, nothing was lost, nor any person perisht. The maior of London, and the aldermen, apparelled in orient grained scarlet, and foure hundred commoners clad in beautiful murrie, well mounted, and trimlie hoisted, with rich collars, & great chaines, met the king on Blackheath, reioicing at his returne: and the clergie of London, with rich crosses, sumptuous copes, and massie censers, receiued him at saint Thomas of Waterings with solempne procession.

The great modestie of the king.

The king like a graue and sober personage, and as one remembering from whom all viceries are sent, seemed little to regard such baue poms and shewes as were in triumphant sort deuised for his welcoming home from so prosperous a iournie, in so much that he would not suffer his helmet to be caried with him, whereby might haue appeared to the people the blowes and dints that were to be seene in the same; neither would he suffer any ditties to be made and song by minstrels of his glorious victorie, for that he would wholie haue the praise and thanks altogether giuen to God. The newes of this bloodie battell being reported to the French king as then sojourning at Rone, filled the court full of sorrow. But to remedie such danger as was like to insue, it was decreed by councell, to ordeine new officers in places of them that were slaine: and first, he elected his chiefe officer for the wars, called the constable, the earle of Arminacke, a wise and politike capitaine, and an ancient enimie to the Englishmen. Sir John de Cozie was made maister of the crosse-bowes. Shortly after, either for melancholie that he had for the losse at Agincourt, or by some sudden disease letwes Dolphim of Viennois, heire apparant to the French king, departed this life without issue, which happened well for Robinet of Bournenill, and his sekowes, as ye haue heard before, for his death was their life, & his life would haue bene their death.

The death of the Dolphim of France. Part of those that spoiled the English campe.

I 4 I 6

After the French king had created new officers, in hope to relieue the state of his realme and countrie, soe shaken by the late great ouerthrow, it chanced, that Thomas duke of Excester capitaine of Harflue, accompanied with three thousand Englishmen, made a great rode into Normandie, almost to the citie of Rone, in which iournie he got great abundance both of riches and prisoners: but in his returne, the earle of Arminacke newlie made constable of France, intending in his first enterprize to win the spurs, hauing with him aboute three thousand horsemen, incountred with the duke. The fight was handled on both parts verie hotlie, but because the Englishmen were not able to resist the force of the Frenchmen, the duke was constrained to retire with losse at the least of three hundred of his footmen.

Howbeit being withdrawen into an orchard, which was strongly fenced and hedged about with thornes, the Frenchmen were not able to enter vpon the Englishmen; but yet they took from them all their horses and spoile, & assaulted them till it was night, and then retired backe to the towne, not far distant from the place where they fought, called Wallenmont: this was vpon the 14 day of March. In the morning vpon the breake of the daie, the Englishmen issued forth of the orchard, where they had kept themselves all the night, & drew towards Harflue, whereof the Frenchmen being aduertised, followed them, & ouertooke them vpon the sands nere to Chiese de Caur, & there set on them: but in the end, the Frenchmen were discomfited, and a great number of them slaine by the Englishmen, which afterwards returned without more adu into Harflue. The French writers blame the constable for this losse, because he kept on the high ground with a number of men of war, and would not come downe to aid his fellows.

In this fourth yeare of king Henries reigne, the emperor Sigismund, cosine germane to king Henrie, came into England, to the intent that he might make an attonement betwene king Henrie and the French king: with whom he had bene before, bringing with him the archbishop of Remes, as ambassador for the French king. At Calis he was honorably receiued by the earle of Warwike lord deputy there, and diuerse other lords sent thither for purpose to attend him. Whereupon, the king sent thither thirtie great ships to bring him and his traine over. At Douer the duke of Gloucester, and diuerse other lords were ready to receiue him, who at his approaching to land, entered the water with their swords in their hands drawen; and by the mouth of the said duke declared to him, that if he intended to enter the land as the kings friend, and as a mediator to intreat for peace, he should be suffered to arrive: but if he would enter as an emperor into a land claimed to be vnder his empire, then were they ready to resist him. This was thought necessarie to be done for sauing of the kings prerogative, who hath full prebeminence within his owne realme, as an absolute emperor.

When the emperor hereupon answered that he was come as the kings friend, and as a mediator for peace, and not with any imperiall authoritie, he was of the duke and other his associates receiued with all such honors as might be deuised. The king with all his nobilitie receiued him on Blackheath, the seventh day of Aprill, and brought him through London to Westminster with great triumph. Shortly after there came also into England Albert duke of Holland, who was likewise friendly intertained. Both these princes, the emperor and the duke of Holland were conueied to Windsoze to saint Georges feast, and elected companions of the noble order of the garter, and had the collar and habit of the same to them deliuered, and sat in their thalls all the solemnitie of the feast. Shortly after that the feast was finished, the duke of Holland returned into his countrie; but the emperor tarried still, and assailed all manner of means to perswade the king to a peace with the Frenchmen.

But their euill hap, as they that were appointed by Gods providence to suffer more damage at the Englishmens hands, would not permit his persuasions to take place: for whereas peace was euen almost entering in at the gates, the king was suddenly stricken red to displeasure upon a new occasion, for he being advertised of the late of his men at the late conflict in the territory of Acone, as ye have heard, refused to be his own peace once named. The emperor thereupon passed over that time till another season, that some favourable aspect of the planets should serve to further his purpose. And when he thought the same was come, he landed againe the bell of concord and amitie, which he put in so faire a way, presented it with such effectious words, as that shortly the king had taken it, if word had not been brought about the same time, that Harling was besieged of the French both by water and land, as it was indeed, for the constable of France incouraged by his last conflict (though the same was not much to his profit) assembled an armie, and upon a sudden laid siege to the towne. At the same instant John vi-count of Harbott the vice-admirall of France, brought the whole navie to the rivage and there adjoining to the towne, in purpose to have entered by the water side; but the duke of Excester defeated his intent, and defended the towne verie manfully.

King Henrie advertised hereof, meant at the first to have gone with his navie in person to the succours of his men; but the emperor dissuaded him from that purpose, advising him rather to send some one of his captains. The king following his loving and reasonable advertisement, appointed his brother the duke of Bedford accompanied with the earles of March, Warshall, Driford, Huntington, Warwicke, Arunbell, Salisbury, Denonshire, and divers barons, with two hundred saile to passe into Normandie, for reliefe of the towne of Harfleur, which being great diligence shipped at Aie, and after some hinderance by contrarie winds, at length came to the mouth of the river of Seine on the daie of the Assumption of our ladie. When the vicount of Harbott perceived the English navie to approach, he courageously set forward, and gat the possession of the mouth of the ha-wen. The duke of Bedford seeing his enemies thus determined to come forward, set before certaine strong ships, which at the first encounter vanquished and tooke two french ships, the captains whereof were to-rally and forward.

The duke followed with all his puissance, and set on his enemies. The fight was long, but not so long as perilous, nor so perilous as terrible (for battels on the sea are desperate) till at length the victorie fell to the Englishmen, so that almost all the whole navie of France, in the which were manie ships, hulkes, carries, and other small vessels to the number of five hundred was taken. Amongst other vessels that were taken, the great carries of Genoa a citie in Italie, were sent into England. In the same conflict were killed of the Frenchmen no small number, as appeared by the dead bodies, which were seen euerie daie swimming about the English ships. After this, the duke of Bedford sailed up to Harfleur, & refreshed the towne both with vittels and monie; notwithstanding certaine other french galleies did what they could to hinder that enterprise. When the erle of Arminacke heard that the puissant name of France was vanquished, he raised his siege & returned to Paris.

After this discomfiture and losse, the puissance of the Frenchmen began to decaye, for now the princes and nobles of the realme fell into division and discord among themselves, studying how to revenge their old priuat injuries, & refused to take paine for succour of the publike weale and safegard of their countrie: whereupon their power began to war-render, their state brought into imminent panger of perpetuall bondage; which thing no doubt had fallen upon them if king Henrie had longer lived. For as upon one inconuenience suffered, manie do follow, so was it in France at that time; for the king was not of sound memorie, the warre that was to be both doubtfull and perillous: the princes distrustful and at discord with a hundred things more (which might bring a realme to ruine) out of frame and order in France in those daies. After that, the duke of Bedford was returned backe againe into England with great triumph and glorie, he was not so much thankes of the king his brother, as praised of the em-perour Sigismund, being to him a stranger, which said openlie, that hapie are those subjects which haue such a king, but more hapie is the king that hath such subjects.

When the emperor perceived that it was in vaine to moue further for peace, he left off that treatie, and entered himselfe into a league with king Henrie, the contents of which league consisted chiefly in these articles, that both the said emperor and king, their heires, and successors, should be friends each to other, as allies and confederats against all manner of persons, of what estate or degree so euer they were (the church of Rome, and the pope for that time being excepted) and that neither they, nor their heires, nor successors should be present in counsell or other place, where either of them, or his heires or successors might susteine damage, in lands, goods, honours, states, or persons; and that if any of them should understand of losse or hinderance to be like to fall, or happen to the others, they should impeach the same, or if that late not in their powers, they should advertise the others thereof with all conuenient speed; and that either of them, and their heires and successors should aduance the others hono: and commoditie without fraud or deceit. Moreover, that neither of them, nor their heires and successors should permit their subjects to leaue warres against the others; and that if should be lawfull and free for any of their subjects, to passe into the others countrie, and there to remaine and make merchandise, either by sea or land, paying the customes, gabels, and duties due and accustomed, according to the lawes and ordinances of the places and countries where they chanced to traffike.

Furthermore, that neither of the said princes, nor their heires nor successors should receiue any rebell, banished man, or traitor of the others wittinglie, but should cause euerie such person to auoid out of their countries, realmes, dominions, and iurisdicti-ons. Again, that neither of the said princes, their heires, nor successors should begin any wars against any other person, other than such as they had warres with at that present, without consent of the other his confederate, except in defense of themselves, their countries and subjects, in case of inuasion made by on them. Also, that it should be lawfull for the king of England, to prosecute his warres against the Frenchmen for recouerie of his right, as should seeme to him expedient; and likewise to the emperor, for recouerie of any part of his right in France, so that neither of them did preiudice the others right in that behalfe. Lastly, that either of them should assist other, in recouerie & conquest of their rights, lands, and dominions, occupied, with holden, and kept from them, by him that called himselfe king of France, and other the princes and barons of France. This aliance, with other conditions, agreements, and articles, was concluded & established on the nineteenth daie of October, in the yeare of our Lord 1416. This done, the emperor returned homewards, to passe in to Germanie; and the king partied to them him honor, and partied because of his owne affaires, associated him to his towne of Calis.

During the time of their abode there, the duke of Burgonie offered to come to Calis, to speake with the emperor and the king, because he had knowledge wind and weather to his desire, the first daie of August he landed in Normandie, nere to a castell called Touque, where he consulted with his capitaine, what waie was best for him to take concerning his high enterprise.

The number of the armie of Henrie the fift.

Tit. Lilius.

His armie contained the number of sixteen thousand and foure hundred soldiers and men of warre of his owne purueiance, beside others. The duke of Clarence had in his retinue a hundred lances, and three hundred archers: and beside him, there were three earles, which had two hundred and forty lances, and seauentene hundred and twenty archers. The duke of Gloucester foure hundred and seauentie lances, and foureteene hundred and ten archers. The earles of March, Marthall, Warwicke, and Salisburie, each of them one hundred lances, and three hundred archers a peece. The earle of Huntingdon forty lances, and six score archers. The earle of Suffolke thirty lances, and foure score and ten archers. Beside these, there were thirtene lords, as Aburgauennie, Gatreuere, Fitz Hugh, Clifford, Graie, Willoughbie, Calbot, Courtenie, Burghier, Ros, Louell, Ferrers of Chartleie, and Harington, the which had in their retinue the number of five hundred and six lances, and fiftene hundred and fourescore archers. Also, there were in this armie threescore and seauentene knights, which had vnder them nine hundred and forty five lances, and two thousand eight hundred and fiftie two archers; so that in all, there were five and twenty thousand, five hundred, and eight and twenty fighting men: of which number euerie fourth man was a lance. Beside the soldiers and men of warre, there were a thousand masons, carpenters, and other labourers.

The Normans hearing of the kings arrivall, were suddenlye stricken with such feare, that they fled out of their houses, leaving the towne and villages, and with their wives and children, bag and baggage, got them into the walled towne, preparing there to defend themselves, & with all speed sent to the French king, requiring him to prouide for the defense and preservation of his louing subiects. Whereupon, the men of war were appointed to resort into the strong towne, to lie within the same in garrisons, to resist the power of the Englishmen, so that all the walled towne and castles in Normandie were furnished with meyn, munition, and vittels.

The king of England, when he had consulted with his counsell for his proceeding in his enterprises, laid siege vnto the castell of Touque. The duke of Gloucester that led the fore ward, had the charge of that siege, the which by force of assaults, and other warlike meanes, brought to that point, that they within yielded the place into his hands, the ninth daie of August. The earle of Salisbury, who led the battell, took the castell of Ambernilliers, the which was giuen to him by the king, and so this earle was the first that had anie territorie giuen him of the king in this new conquest. The king made at the winning of Touque eight and twenty knights, and left sir Robert Kirkellie capitaine there.

After this, on deliberate aduise taken how to proceed; he let forward toward the towne of Caen in most warlike order, waiking the countrie on euerie side as he passed. Which towne standeth in a plaine fertile countrie, no stronger walled, than deepe ditched, and as then well vittelled and replenished with people: for the citizens fearing the kings coming, had there prouided all things necessarie and defensible. But his maiestie doubting least the Frenchmen, vpon their vnderstanding of his approach to the towne, would haue burned the suburbs and buildings without the walles, sent the duke of Clarence with a thousand men before him, to prevent that mischance. The duke coming thither, found the suburbs already set on fire, but used such diligence to quench the same, that the most part was saved. He also won the abbey church of saint Stephan, which the Frenchmen were in hand to haue overthrown, by vndermining the pillars; but the duke obtaining the place, filled by the mines, and so preferred the church. He also won a cell of nunnies, verie stronglie fenced, after the manner of warre.

Then came the king before the towne, who caused forthwith to be cast a deepe trench, with an high mount, to keepe them within from issuing forth, and that done, began fiercelie to assault the towne: but they within stood manfullie to their defense, so that there was sore and cruell fight betwixt them, and their enimies. But when king Henrie perceived that he lost more than he won by his daile assaults, he left off anie more to assault it, and determined to ouerthrow the wals, with vndermining. Wherefore with all diligence, the pioners cast trenches, made mines, & brought timber, so that within a few daies, the wals stood onelie vpon posts, ready to fall, when fire should be put to them. The king meaning now to giue a generall assault, caused all the capitaine to assemble before him in counsell, vnto whom he declared his purpose, commanding them not before the next daie to utter it; till by sound of trumpet they should haue warning to set forward towards the wals, least his determination being disclosed to the enimies, might cause them to prouide the better for their owne defense. He also prescribed vnto them, what order he would haue them to keepe, in giuing the assault, and that was this, that euerie capitaine diuiding his band into three severall portions, they might be ready one to succede in an others place, as those which fought should happlie be driuen backe and repelled.

Caen besieged

Tit. Lilius.

The order of the assault.

In the morning next following, being the fourth of September, somewhat before the break of the daie, he caused his people to approach the wals, and to shew countenance, as though they would giue a generall assault; and whilst they were busied in assailing and defending on both sides, the Englishmen pearled and brake thorough the wals by diuerse holes and ouertures made by the pioners, vnder the foundation: yet the king vpon diuerse respects, offered them within pardon of life, if they would yield themselves and the towne to his mercie; but they refusing that to do, the assault was newlie begun, and after sore fight continued for the space of an houre, the Englishmen prevailed, and due so mane as they found with weapon in hand, ready to resist them.

Titus Lilius.

The duke of Clarence was the first that entred with his people, and hauing got the one part of the towne, assailed them that kept the bridge, & by force beating them backe, passed the same, and so came to the wals on the other side of the towne, where the fight was sharpe and fierce betwixt the assailants and defendants; but the duke with his people setting on the Frenchmen behind, as they stood at defense on the wals, easilie vanquished them, so that the Englishmen entred at their pleasure. Thus when the king was possessed of the towne, he incontinentlie commanded all armour & weapons of the vanquished, to be brought into one place, which was immediately done.

Caen taken by the Englishmen.

Then the miserable people came before the kings presence, and kneeling on their knees, held vp their hands, and cried; Mercie, mercie: to whom the king gaue certaine comfortable words, & had them stand vp. All the night following, he caused his armie to keepe themselves in order of battell within the towne, and on the next morning called all the magistrats & gouernors of the towne to the senat house, where some for their willfull stubbornesse were adjudged to die, other were soze fined and ransomed.

Then he calling together his souldiers and men of warre, not onelie gaue them great praises and high commendations for their manlie doings, but also distributed to euerie man, according to his desert, the spoile and gaine gotten in the towne, chiefe because at the assault they had shewed good proofe of their manhood and ballant courages.

After that the towne was thus towne, the lord Montaigne, capteine of the castell, would not yeld, but made semblance, as though he meant to defend the place, to the vtterance: but after that he was sharpe called vpon by king Henrie, either to yeld it, or else that he should be assured to haue all mercie and fauour requested from him, he toke better ad-uise, and thereupon being in despair of rescue, made this composition, that if he were not rescued of the French power by a certeine date, he should render the fortesse into the kings hands, with condition, that he and his souldiers should be suffered to depart with all their goods, the habiliments of warre onelie excepted. Hereupon twelue hostages were deliuered to the king, and when the date came, being the twentith of September, they within rendred the castell into the kings hands; and thus, both the towne and castell of Caen became English.

Whilste the king was thus occupied about his warres in Normandie, the Scots in great number, entering England, wasted the countrie with fire and sword whersoeuer they came. The English lords that were left in trust with the keeping of those parties of the realme, raised the whole power of the countries, so that there came together the number of an hundred thousand men vpon Watmore, where the generall assemble was made, and as it chanced, the duke of Brecester, vncle to the king, who had latelie before mustered a certeine number of men to conuene them ouer to the king as a new supplie to his armie there, was the same time in the north parts on pilgrimage at Widdington; and hearing of this invasion made by the Scots, toke vpon him to be general of the armie prepared against them, and to giue them battell. Also, the archbishop of Yorke, although he was not able to sit on horsebacke by reason of his great age, caused himselfe to be carried forth in a chariot in that tourne, the better to incourage other. But the Scots hearing that the Englishmen approached toward them with such a puissance, withdrew backe into their countrie, and durst not abide the bickering; either because they mistrusted an insolent enent on their side, by reason of the English prowesse; or else for that they had learned by others ouerthrowes to auoid the like, wherein standeth a profitable point of wisdome, as the poet verie sententiouslie saith,

Felicitat sapit qui in alieno periculo sapit.

The same time, the lord Cobham, sir John Dibcastell, whilste he shifted from place to place to escape the hands of them, who he knew would be glad to late hold on him, had conuened himselfe in secret wise into an husbandmans house, not farre from S.
Albans, within the precinct of a lordship belonging to the abbat of that towne. The abbats seruants getting knowledge hereof, came thither by night, but they missed their purpose, for he was gone; but they caught diuerse of his men, whome they carried streit to prison. The lord Cobham herewith was soze dismaied, for that some of them that were taken were such as he trusted most, being of counsell in all his deuises. In the same place, were found books written in English, and some of those books in times past had beene trimlie gilt, lined, and beautified with images, the heads whereof had beene scraped off, and in the Letanie they had blotted forth the name of our ladie, and of other saints, till they came to the verie Parce nobis Domine. Diuerse writings were found there also, in derogation of each honour as then was thought due to our ladie. The abbat of saint Albons sent the booke so disfigured with scrapings & blottings out, with other such writings as there were found, vnto the king; who sent the booke againe to the archbishop, to shew the same in his sermons at Pauls crosse in London, to the end that the citizens and other people of the realme might vnderstand the purposes of those that then were called Lollards, to bring them further in discredit with the people.

In this meane time that the king of England was occupied about Caen, the Frenchmen had neither anie sufficient power to resist him, nor were able to assemble an host together in their necessitie, by reason of the dissention among themselves: for their king was so simple, that he was spoiled both of treasure and kingdome, so that euerie man spent and wasted he cared not what. Charles the Dolphin being of the age of sixtene or seauentene yeares, beheld the ruine and decaye of his countrie, he onlie studied the reliefe of the common-wealth, and deuised how to resist his enemies; but hauing neither men nor mo-nie, was greatly troubled and disquieted in mind.
In conclusion, by the aduise and counsell of the earle of Arminacke the constable of France, he found a meane to get all the treasure & riches which his mother quene Isabell had gotten and hoarded in diuerse secret places; and for the common defense and profit of his countrie he wisely bestowed it in buying souldiers, and preparing of things necessarie for the warre.

The quene forgetting the great perill that the realme then stood in, reuincing onelie the displeasure to hir by this act done, vpon a womanish malice, set hir husband John duke of Burgogne in the highest authoritie about the king, giuing him the reg-ment and direction of the king and his realme; with all prebeminence & soueraintie. The duke of Burgogne hauing the sword in his hand, in reuenge of old injuries, began to make warre on the Dolphin, determining, that when he had tamed this yong unbridled gentleman, then would he go about to withstand, and beat backe the common enemies of the realme. The like reason moued the Dolphin, for he minded first to repress the authors of ciuill discord, before he would set vpon foreine enemies, and therefore prepared to subdue and bestroie the duke of Burgogne, as the cheefe head of that mischefe, whereby the realme was vniquieted, decayed, and in manner brought to vtter ruine. Thus was France afflicted, and in euerie part troubled with warre and dissension, and no man to prouide remedie, nor once put forth his finger for helpe or succour.

King Henrie in the meane time following victo-rie and his good successe, sent the duke of Clarence to the sea coast, where (with great difficultie) he got the towne of Bateur, whereof the lord Patreurs was appointed capteine. The duke of Gloucester also finding small resistance, toke the citie of Alesour, of which citie sir John Durbelle was ordeined capteine.
King Henrie himselfe tarried still at Caen; fortifying the towne and castell, and put out sixtene hundred women and impotent persons, replenishing the towne with English people. Where while the king sojourned, he kept a solemne feast, and made manie knights; beside that, he shewed there an example of great pittie and clemencie: for in fear-ching the castell, he found innumerable substance of plate and monie belonging to the citizens; whereof he would not suffer one pence to be touched; but restored the same to the owners; bestowing to euerie man that which was his owne.

An. Reg. 5.

When the same of his mercifull dealing herein, of his bountie to captiues, and of his fauourable vifiting of thole that fubmitted themfelues to his grace, was fped abroad, all the capteins of the townes adioining, came willinglie to his prefence, offering to him themfelues, their townes, and their goods, whereupon he made proclamation, that all men, which had, or would become his fubiects, and fweare to him allegiance, fhould inioy their goods, and liberties, in as large or more ample maner, than they did befor: which gentle interteining of the fubborne fozmans, was the verie caufe, why they were not onlie content, but alfo glad to remoue and turne from the french part, and become fubiects to the crowne of England.

When the king had fet Caen in good order, he left there for capteins, the one of the towne, the other of the caftell, fir Gilbert Umfreuill earle of Raine or Angus, & fir Gilbert Talbot, and made bailiffe there fir John Popham, and fo departed from Caen the firft of October, and comming to the caftell of Courfay, within three daies had it rendred to him. From whence, the fourth of October, he came vnto Argenton; they within that towne and caftell offered, that if no refcue came by a daie limited, they would deliuer both the towne and caftell into the kings hands, fo that fuch as would abide and become the kings faithfull fubiects fhould be receiued, the other to depart with their goods and liues faued whether they would: the king accepted their offer. When the daie limited came, and no fuccours appeared, they yelued according to the covenants, and the king performed all that on his behalfe was promifed. The lord Grate of Codroz was appointed capteine there. After this, reforted daile to the king, of the fozmans, people of all forts and degrees, to fweare to him fealtie and homage. The citie of Sees which was well inhabited, and wherein were two abbeyes of great ftrength, one of them yelued to the king, and fo likewife did diuerfe other townes in thole parties, without ftrike taken.

The towne of Alanson abode a ftege for the fpace of eight daies, they within defending it right balliantlie at the firft; but in the end, confidering with themfelues, what fmall hope there was for anie fuccours to come to remoue the ftege, they grew to a compofition, that if within a certeine daie they were not releued, they fhould yeld both the towne and caftell into the kings hands, which was done: for no fuccours could be heard of. The king appointed capteine of this towne, the duke of Glocefter, and his lieutenant fir Rafle Lentall. The duke of Biffaine vnder fafe conduct came to the king, as he was thus buile in the conquest of Normandie, and after fundry points treated of betwixt them, a truce was taken, to indure from the feuenth daie of Nouember, vnto the laft of September, in the yeare next following, betwixt them, their fouldiers, men of warre, and fubiects. The like truce was granted vnto the queene of Ierufalem and Sicill, & to hir fonne Lewis, for the duchie of Aniou, and the countie of Epaine, the duke of Biffaine being their deputie for concluding of the fame truce.

About the fame time alfo, at the fute of Charles the Dolphin, a treatie was in hand at Torque, for a fmall peace, but it came to none effect. From Alanson the king fet fozward towards the towne and caftell of Faleis, meaning to befiege the fame, where the frenchmen appointed to the keeping of it, had fortified the towne by all meanes poffible, and prepared themfelues to defende it to the uttermoft. The earle of Saintburie was firft fent thither before with certeine bands of fouldiers to inclofe the enemies within the towne, & to view the ftrength thereof. After him came the king with his whole armie, about the firft of December, and then was the towne befieged on eche fide. The king lodged before the gate that leadeth to Caen, the duke of Clarence before the caftell that ftandeth on a rocke, and the duke of Glocefter laie on the kings right hand, and other lords & noble men were assigned to their places as was thought expedient. And to be fure from taking damage by anie fudden inuafion of the enemies, there were great trenches and rampiers caft and made about their feuerall campes, for defence of the fame.

The frenchmen notwithstanding this ftege, balliantlie defended their wals, and fometimes made iffues forth, but fmall to their gaine: and kill the Englifhmen with their guns and great ordinance made batterie to the wals and bulwarks. The winter feafon was verie cold, with fharp frofts, & hard weather; but the Englifhmen made fuch shift for prouifion of all things neceffarie to ferue their turns, that they were fufficientlie prouided, both againft hunger and cold: fo that in the end, the frenchmen perceiuing they could not long indure againft them, offered to talke, and agreed to giue over the towne, if no refcue came by a certeine daie appointed. About the fame feafon was fir John Mdocaftell, lord Cobham taken, in the countie of Poles land, in the borders of Wales, within a lordship belonging to the lord Poles, not without danger and hurts of fome that were at the taking of him: for they could not take him, till he was wounded himfelfe.

At the fame time, the ftates of the realme were afsembled at London, for the leuieng of monie, to furnifh the kings great charges, which he was at about the maintenance of his wars in France: it was therefore determined, that the laid fir John Mdocaftell fhould be brought, and put to his trial, yer the afsemble brake vp. The lord Poles therfore was fent to fetch him, who brought him to London in a litter, wounded as he was: herewith being firft laid falk in the Tower, fhortlie after he was brought before the duke of Bedford, regent of the realme, and the other eftates, where in the end he was condemned; and finally was drawn from the Tower vnto faine Giles field, and there hanged in a chaine by the middle, and after consumed with fire, the gallowes and all.

When the daie was come, on the which it was covenanted that the towne of Faleis fhould be deliuered, to wit, the fecond of Ianuarie, becaufe no fuccours appeared, the towne was yelued to the king: but the caftell held out ftill, into the which the capteine and gouernour both of the towne and caftell had withdrawne themfelues, with all the fouldiers; and being ftreftlie befieged, the capteine defended himfelfe and the place right fountlie, although he was foze laid to, vntill at length, perceiuing his people wearied with continuall affaults, and fuch approaches as were made to and within the verie wals, he was dzuen to compound with the king, that if he were not fuccoured by the firft of Februarie, then fhould he yeld himfelfe prifoner, and deliuer the caftell; fo that the fouldiers fhould haue licence to depart, with their liues onellie faued. When the daie came, the covenants were performed, and the caftell rendered to the kings hands, for no aid came to the refcue of them within. The capteine named Oliuer de Spannie was kept as prifoner, till the caftell was repaired at his cofts and charges, becaufe the fame, though his obftinat wilfulneffe, was foze beater and defaced, with underminings and batterie. Capteine there, by the king, was appointed fir Henrie Fitt; Hugh.

After this, king Henrie returned to Caen, and by reafon of a proclamation which he had caufed to be made for the people of Normandie, that had with-aliqua contradictione mei predicti Iohannis, aut heredum meorum aliquali. Reddendo inde mihi ipsi Gualtero annuatim in festo sancti Georgii martyris, si tunc fuerim infra regnum Anglia, vnum par calcarum deauratorum, pro omnibus. Et etiam volo & concedo quod predictus Gualterus liber sit, durante tota vita sua, ad volandum, venandum, piscandum, & alias commoditates percipiendum, tam infra manerium meum de Bromley quam in omnibus alijs manerij, terris, & teneamentis meis infra regnum Anglia, sine aliqua contradictione vel impedimento mei prefati Iohannis de Bromley militis, heredum, aut assignatorum meorum aliquali. Et ut fidele testimonium presentibus habeatur, sigillum meum apposui: hijs testibus, Roberto de Bruyn milite, Iohanne de Holland, Gulielmo de Brereton, Richardo le Grenill, Iohanne de Egerton, Richardo le Beston, Thoma le Creu, & alijs. Datum apud Dampfront predicto, 12 die mensis Augusti, anno regni regis Henrici quinti post conquestum sexto.

The old armes of the house of Bromley being quarterlie goles and oze per fesse indented, had in the feale to this daie, an inscutchen charged with a griffin surgiant; his creast, out of a crowne, a demilion supporting a standard charged with a lion passant gardant: about the shield was ingrauen, sigillum Iohannis de Bromley militis. That inscutchen and creast (as like is) given him in laudable remembrance for his valiant recouerie of the standard at the Harpe and bloodie skirmish by Cozbie. The earle of Warwick, and the lord Talbot, after the winning of this fortreffe, made speed to come vnto the siege of Rone, where they were imploied, as after shall appeare. And in like manner, the duke of Gloucester, having once got the possession of Chierburgh, halsted towards the same siege: for the better furnishing of which enterpryse, he had first caused an armie of fiftene thousand men to be brought ouer to him, vnder the leading of his vncle the duke of Excester, who imbarcking with the same, about the feast of the holye Trinitie, was appointed by the king to besiege the citie of Curen, as the earle of Angus, otherwise called earle of Rame, was sent to win the castell of Millie Leuesche. These towne being deliuered to the kings vse, the duke ordeined captaine of Curen sir Gilbert Hallsall knight.

The king now determining with all speed to besiege Rone, prepared all things necessarie for his purpose. Into this citie the Normans had conueied out of euerie part their monie, iewels, and household stuffe, as into the most sure and strongest place of the whole duchie. For since his arrivall, they had not onlie walled that citie, and fortified it with rampiers and strong bulwarks, but also furnished it with valiant captains, and hardie soldiers, to the number of foure thousand, beside such of the citizens as were appointed for the warre, according to their estates, of the which there were at the least fiftene thousand readie to serue in defense of the citie, as soldiers, and men of warre in all places where they should be assigned. King Henrie, to haue the countrie free, before he would besiege this citie, thought good first to win such towne as lay in his waie, and therefore departing from Caen (where he had kept the feast of saint George) the ninth daie of June, he marched straight vnto the towne of Louiers, and laid his siege about the same.

They within the towne, being well furnished of all things necessarie for the defending of a siege, manfully resisted the Englishmens inforcements, which spared not to deuise all waies and means how to appoach the walles, and to batter the same with their great artillerie, till at length they brought the Frenchmen to that extremitie, that they were contented to yeeld the towne on these conditions; that if by the thre and twentieth of June there came no succour from the French king to raise the siege, the towne should be deliuered into the kings hands, the soldiers of the garrison should serue vnder the king for a time, and the townemen should remaine in their dwellings as they did before, as subiects to the king: but the gunners that had discharged anie peece against the Englishmen should suffer death. When the date came, and no aid appeared, the counnants were performed accordinglie. From thence went the king with all speed vnto Pont de Arch, standing vpon the riuer of Seine, eight miles about Rone towards Paris: he came thither about the seauen and twentieth of June.

When the Frenchmen which kept the passage there heard of the kings approach, they gathered together a great number of men of warre, minding to defend the passage against him, appointing an other band of men (if they failed) to keepe the further side of the bidge; and to watch, that neither by boate nor vessel he should come ouer the riuer by anie manner of meanes. At his comming nere to the towne, he perceived that it was not possible to passe by the bidge without great losse of his people, and therefore he retired almost a mile backward, where, in a pleasant and commodious place by the riuer side he pitched his campe, and in the night season, that with boates and barges, and that with hogheads and pipes, he conueied ouer the broad riuer of Seine a great companie of his soldiers, without anie resistance made by his enemies. For they which were on the hither side of Seine, thinking that the Englishmen had gone to winne some other place, followed them not, but studied how to defend their towne, which was enough for them to do.

And to put the French men in doubt, least the Englishmen should seeke passage somewhere else, the king appointed certeine of the soldiers which had skill in swimming, to go to a place thre miles from the siege by the riuer side, and there to enter into the water, making great clamor and noise, as though they had meant to haue passed; but they had in commandement not to trauesse past halfe the riuer, so to procure the Frenchmen to make thitherwards, whilst the king in one place, and his brother the duke of Clarence in another, got ouer their men, and that in such number, before the Frenchmen had anie vnderstanding thereof, that when they made towards them, and perceived that they were not able to encounter them, they fled backe, and durst not abide the English footmen, which would faine haue bene doing with them.

When the king saw that his men were on the other side of the water, he (the next daie earlie) returned to the towne, & assaulted it on both sides. When the inhabitants therefore saw themselves compassed on both sides, contrarie to their expectation, with humble heart and small ioy they rendered up the towne vnto the kings hands. After this, the king having no let nor impediment, determined forthwith to besiege the citie of Rone, and first sent before him his vncle the duke of Excester, with a great companie of horsemen & archers to besiege the place, & set vpon both banner displayed came before the citie, and sent Andrew an herald at armes to the captains within, willing them to deliuer the citie vnto the king his master, or else he would pursue them with fire and sword. To whom they proudly answered, that none they received of him; nor anie they would would deliuer him, except by fine force they were thereunto compelled: and herewith they issued out of the towne a great band of men of armes, and encountered fiercelie with the Englishmen, the which receiuing them with like manhood, and great force, drave the Frenchmen into the towne againe to their losse, for they left thirtie of their fellows behind prisoners and dead in the field.

The duke returned with this good speed and proud answer of the Frenchmen vnto the king, who remained yet at Pont de Larch, and had giuen the towne of Louiers to his brother the duke of Clarence, which made there his deputie sir John Godard knight. After that the duke of Gloucester was returned to Pont Larch, the French captaine within Rone set fire on the suburbs, beat downe churches, cut downe trees, shed the bulhes, destroyed the vines round about the citie, to the intent that the Englishmen should haue no relafe nor comfort either of lodging or felwell. When the king heard of these despitefull doings, he with his whole armie removed from Pont Larch, and the last daie of Iulie came before the citie of Rone, and compassed it round about with a strong siege. This citie was verie rich in gold, silver, and other precious things, in so much that when the same was taken and seized vpon by the English, the spoile was verie great and exceeding aduantageable: which the compiler of Anglorum prelia hath verie well noted, in a few lines, but pitthie, saieing:

Prima Rothomagus restat, qua mercibus, auro, Argento, vasis pretiosis diues abundat: Rothomagus capitur, iamq. Anglus adeptus opimas Prædas, in patriam perpulchra trophæa remittit.

The king laie with a great puissance at the Charterhouse, on the east side of the citie, and the duke of Clarence lodged at S. Geruasis before the port of Caen on the west part. The duke of Gloucester toke his place on the north side: at port S. Denis, betwene the dukes of Gloucester and Clarence, was appointed the earle marshall, euen before the gate of the castle, to whome were ioined the earle of Desmond, and the lords Harington and Talbot, vpon his coming from Dampfront: and from the duke of Gloucester toward the king, were incamped the lords Kils, Willoughbie, Fitz Hugh, and sir William Porter, with a great band of northerne men, euen before the port of saint Hilarie. The earles of Poitouaigne and Salisbury were assigned to lodge about the abbie of saint Batharine. Sir John Greie was lodged direclie against the chappell called mount S. Michael: sir Philip Lech treasurer of the warres kept the hill next the abbete, and the baron of Carew kept the passage on the riller of Seine, and to him was ioined that ballant esquier Ienico Dartois.

On the further side of the riuer were lodged the earles of Warren and Huntington, the lords Penk and Ferrers, sir Gilbert Umfreuile with a well furnished companie of warlike soliters: direclie before the gate called Pont de Pont. And to the intent that no aduantage might be had by the riuer toward the citie, there was a great chaine of iron deuised at Pont Larch, set on piles from the one side of the water to the other: and beside that chaine, there was set by a new forced bridge, sufficient both for cariage and passage, to passe the riuer from one campe to another. The earle of Warwick that had latelye wone Dampfront was sent to besiege Catwodebecke, a towne standing on the riuer side, betwene the sea and the citie of Rone. A memorable feat in seruice here to that place was done at that time by a well minded man then noted some after in writing: which matter unable to be better reported than by him that had so well marked it, noz like to be moze trulie expressed than by the ancient simplicitie (and yet effectuell) of the selfe same words wherein they were written, therefore thought meetest to haue them rehearsed as they were in order, thus.

The truth of the said memorable feat as it was reported in writing.

Memorandum, that my lord the earle of Warwike did send out my colin sir John Bromley and my colin George Umfreuile with an hundred archers, and about two hundred soldiers a frett, to keepe at a little castell called the Stron nere to Catwodebecke where they wearen met with about eight hundred frenchmen & the fraie betwene them long pfought, and the Englishmen in great dread and perill: till at length by the might of God and saint George, the feild did fall to our Englishmen, & the frenchmen wearen put to flit, and thear wearen yslaine about two hundred frenchmen, and as manie ytaken prisoners, and their capteine who was ycalled the lord of Estriles was thear also yslaine, and thear wearen yslaine of our Englishmen my said colin George Umfreuile and about twentie mo: on whose folles Iesus haue mercie, and thear wearen hurt in the face my said colin sir John Bromley & my colin Walter Audeley soze wounded and maimed in the right arme of his bodie, he then being but of the age of eightene yeares. But thanks be giuen to the blessed Trinitie, thear wearen manie noble victories ywon by the said noble erle of Warwike and his folke, as in his officiall booke (written by Maister John le Tucke then present with the said noble earle) is ampie recorded. My said colin Walter Audeley died at Warwike the seauententh daie of Iulie anno Domini one thoulaud foure hundred and twentie, and was buried at Acton in Cheshire, nere the bodie of my said colin sir John Bromley: on whose folles Iesus haue mercie. By me sir Richard Baie, chapleine to my ladie the old countesse of Warwike, Iesus Maria, Amen, Pater noster, Ave Maria.

After this conflict, this towne was so hardlie handled with fierce and continuall assaults, that the captaine within offered to suffer the English name to passe by their towne without impeachment, vpon the citie of Rone. And also if Rone yeelded, they promised to render the towne without delaie. Herevpon the English name, to the number of an hundred sailles, passed by Catwodebecke, and came to Rone, and so besieged it on the water side. There came also to this siege the duke of Gloucester, with the earle of Suffolke, and the lord Aburgauennie, which had taken (as before we haue heard) the towne of Gierburgh, & lodged before the port of S. Hilarie, nearer to their enemies by soztye rodes than any other person of the armie.

During this siege also, there arrived at Harflue the lord of Bilmaine in Ireland, with a band of fiftene hundred Irishmen, in maile, with darts and skains after the maner of their countrie, all of them being tall, quicke, and nimble persons, which came and presented themselves before the king lieng still at the siege, of whom the y were not onelie gentlie received & welcomed; but also because it was thought that the French king and the duke of Burgonie would shortly come, and either attempt to raise the siege, or bittell and man the towne by the north gate, they were appointed to keepe the north side of the armie, and speciallie the waite that cometh from the forest of Mions. Which charge the lord of Bailmaine and his companie sofullie accepted, and did so their deuoir therein, that no men were more praised, nor did more damage to their enemies than they did: for suerlie their quickenelle & swiftnesse of foot did more preiudice to their enemies, than their barded horses did hurt or damage to the nimble Irishmen. Also the kings cosine germane and alie (the king of Portugal) sent a great nauie of well appointed ships vnto the mouth of the riuer of Seine, to stop that no French vessels should enter the riuer, and passe by the same, to the aid of them within Rone.

The good service of the Irishmen at this siege.

Titus Livius. The king of Portugal sendeth aid to king Henrie.

Thus was the faire citie of Rone compassed about with enemies, both by water and land, hauing neither comfort nor aid of king, Dolphin, or Duke. And yet although the armie was strong without, there lacked not within both hardie capteins and manfull souldiers. And as for people, they had more than enough: for as it is written by some that had good cause to know the truth, and no occasion to erre from the same, there were in the citie at the time of the siege, two hundred and ten thousand persons. Dailie were issues made out of the citie at diuerse gates, sometime to the losse of the one partie, and sometime of the other, as chances of warre in such adventures happen. The Frenchmen in deed preferring fame before worldly riches, and despising pleasure (the enemy to warlike prowesse) swore ech to other neuer to render or deliuer the citie, while they might either hold sword in hand or speare in rest.

The number within Rone.

The king of England aduertised of their haughty courages, determined to conquer them by famine, which would not be tamed with weapon. Therefore he stopped all the passages, both by water and land, that no vittels could be conueied to the citie: he cast trenches round about the walls, and set them full of stakes, and defended them with archers, so that there was left neither waie for them within to issue out, nor for any that were abroad to enter in without his licence. To rehearse the great paines, trauell and diligence, which the king took vpon him in his owne person at this siege, a man might wonder. And because diuerse of the souldiers had lodged themselves for their more ease, in places so farre distant one from an other, that they might easilie haue bene surprised by their enemies, per ante of their fellowes could haue come to their succors; he caused proclamation to be made, that no man vpon paine of death should lodge without the precinct appointed them, nor go further abroad from the campe than such bounds as were assigned.

Titus Livius.

Now as it chanced, the king in going about the campe, to surueile and biew the warders, he espied two souldiers that were walking abroad without the limits assigned, whom he caused straightwaies to be apprehended and hanged vpon a tree of great height, for a terror to others, that none should be so hardie to breake such orders as he commanded them to obserue. Whilest the king late thus with his power about the mightie citie of Rone, the Frenchmen sought to indamage as well those that were at that siege, as other of the Englishmen that laie in garisons within the townes that were already in the king of Englands possession, inasmuch that (as some haue written) within the octaues of the Assumption, three notable victories chanced to the Englishmen in three seuerall places. First an hundred Englishmen at Millbuert took three great loads of the Frenchmen, besides fourescore other persons, and put three hundred to flight.

Also vpon the thursdaie within the same octaues, foure hundred Frenchmen that were entered within the suburbs of Cutenr were repelled by eleven Englishmen, that took foure of those Frenchmen prisoners, sure twelue of them, and took forty horses. On the saturday following, the Frenchmen took in hand to scale vpon them that laie in garison within Louiers, in hope to surprize the towne earlie in the morning: but the capteine perceiuing their purpose, sallied forth with a hundred of his men, and putting the Frenchmen to flight, being a thousand, took an hundred and fourescore of them being all gentlemen. But to returne to them before Rone. The siege thus continuing from Lammias, almost to Christmas, diuerse enterprises were attempted, and diuerse policies practised, how euery part might indamage his aduersaries: no parte greatly reioiced of their gaine. But in the meane time vittels began soze to faile them within, that onelie vineger and water serued for drinke.

If I should rehearse (according to the report of diuerse writers) how deuelie dogs, rats, mice, and cats were sold within the towne, and how greedilie they were by the poore people eaten and deuoured, and how the people dailie died for fault of food, and young infants laie sucking in the streets on their mothers breasts, lieng dead, starued for hunger; the reader might lament their extreme miseries. A great number of poore sillie creatures were put out at the gates, which were by the Englishmen that kept the trenches beaten and driuen backe againe to the same gates, which they found closed and shut against them. And so they laie betwene the walls of the citie and the trenches of the enemies, still crieng for helpe and reliefe, for lacke whereof great numbers of them dailie died.

Howbeit, king Henrie moued with pittie, vpon Christmasse daie, in the honoz of Christes Natiuitie, refreshed all the poore people with vittels, to their great comfort and his high praise: yet if the duke of Burgonies letters had not bene conueied into the citie, it was thought they within would neuer haue made resistance so long time as they did; for by those letters they were assured of rescue to come. Diuerse lords of France hauing written to them to the like effect, they were put in such comfort herewith, that immediatlie, to expresse their great reioicing, all the bells in the citie were rung forth cherefullie, which during all the time of the siege till that present had kept silence. And by reason of a saint kind of agreement procured betwixt the Dolphin and the duke of Burgonie, it was thought herelie that a power should haue bene raised for preservation of that noble citie, the losing or sauing thereof being a matter of such importance.

The king of England, to prevent the enemies purpose, caused a large trench to be cast without his campe, which was pight full of sharpe stakes, with a great rampire fenced with bulwarks, and turnepikes, in as defensible wise as might be deuised. Sir Robert Bapthorpe, knight, was appointed comptroller, to see this worke performed, which he did with all diligence accomplish; in like case as he had done, when the other trench and rampire stronglie staked and hedged was made at the first betwixt the campe and the citie, to refreshme such as in the beginning of the siege rested not to picke forth of the gates on horse backe. And so by this meanes was the armie defended both behind and before.

king: and further, that they should paie to the said king three hundred thousand scutes of gold, whereof alwaies two should be worth an English noble, or in stead of euerie scute thirtie great blankes white, or siffene grotes.

Howeuer it was accorded, that euerie soldier and stranger, being in the said citie and castell, should sweare on the euangelists before their departure, not to beare armour against the king of England, before the first daie of Januarie next to come. Also they within the towne should suffer all the poore people lying in ditches, or about the ditches of the citie, which for penurie were chased out, to enter the citie againe; and to find them sufficient food till the said nineteenth daie of Januarie. There were diuerse other articles, in all to the number of two and twentie agreed as well on the behalfe of the citizens, as of king Henrie, who granted, that all the souldiers, strangers, and other within the said citie and castell at that time, being not willing to become his lieges, should depart, after that the citie and castell was once yielded, free lie without let, leaving to the said king all their armors, horses, harnesse, & goods, except the poymans, which if they should refuse to become lieges to him, were appointed to remaine as his prisoners, together with one Luca Italico, and certeine others.

When the date of appointment came, which was the daie of saint Wolstane, sir Guie de Buttler, and the burgeses, deliuered the keies of the citie and castell vnto the king of England, beseeching him of fauour and compassion. The king incontinentlie appointed the duke of Excester, with a great companie to take possession of the citie, who like a valiant capteine mounted on a goodlie courser first entered into the citie, and after into the castell. The next daie being first daie, the king in great triumph like a conquerour, accompanied with foure dukes, ten earles, eight bishops, sixtene barons, and a great multitude of knights, esquieres, and men of warre entered into Rome, where he was receiued by the cleargie, with two and fourtie crosses; and then met him the senat, and the burgeses of the towne, offering to him diuerse faire and costlie presents.

In this manner he passed through the citie to our ladie church, and there hauing said his orisons, he caused his chapleins to sing this anthem: Qui est tam magnus dominus: Who is so great a lord as our God. This done, he came to the castell, where he continued a good space after, receiuing homages and fealties of the burgeses and townesmen, and setting orders amongst them. He also redified diuerse fortresses, and townes, during which time he made proclamation, that all men which would become his subjects, should inioy their goods, lands & offices, which proclamation made manie townes to yield, and manie men to become English the same season.

The duke of Britaine, vnderstanding that if the king of England should continue in possession of poymandie, his countrie could not but be in great danger, if he provided not to haue him his friend, upon safe conduct obtained for him & his retinue, came to Rome with five hundred horses, and being honourable receiued of the king, after conference had betwixt them of diuerse things, at length they agreed upon a league on this wise, that neither of them should make warre vnto the other, nor to any of the others people or subjects, except he that meant to make war denounced the same six moneths before. Thus this league being concluded, the duke toke leaue of the king, and so returned into Britaine.

About the same time, at the sute of certeine bishops and abbats of poymandie, the king confirmed vnto them their ancient priuileges, granted by the former dukes of poymandie and kings of France, except such as were granted by those whome he repented for, usurpers, and no lawfull kings or dukes. He also established at Caen the chamber of accounts of the reuenues of his dukedome of poymandie. In Rome he began the foundation of a strong tower behind the castell, that from the castell to the tower, and from the tower to his palace, the way of warre appointed there in garison might passe in secretie without danger of the citie; if perhaps the citizens should attempt any rebellion.

In this first yeare, which the things were aduancing in poymandie, quene Katherine late wife of king Henrie the fourth, and mother in law to this king, was arrested by the duke of Bedford the kings lieutenant in his absence, and by him committed to safe keeping in the castell of Leeds in Kent, there to abide the kings pleasure. About the same time, one frier Randall of the order of Franciscanes that professed continencie, and had bene confessor to the same quene, was taken in the Isle of Cernesey, and being first brought ouer into poymandie, was by the kings commandement sent hither into England, and committed to the Tower, where he remained till the parson of the Tower quarelling with him, by chance slew him there within the Tower ward. It was reported that he had conspired with the quene by sorcerie and necromancie to destroye the king.

Whilist the king remained in Rome, to set things in order for the establishment of good policie in that citie, he sent abroad diuerse of his capteins, with conuenient forces to subdue certeine townes & castles in those parties, as his brother the duke of Clarence, who wan the strong towne of Wernon and Spante. In Wernon was sir William Porter made capteine, and in Spant the earle of March. The earle of Salisburie wan Hundloe, after he had besieged it from the fourth of february vntill the twelfth of March. This towne was giuen afterwards vnto the duke of Clarence. Also the said earle of Salisburie wan the townes of Spontey de Williers, &c. &c. &c. castell, and finally all the places in that quarter, which till that present were not vnder the English obediensance. At Petocastell sir Philip Aech was made capteine.

After Candlemasse, the king departed from Rome to go to Curreur, whither he promised to come in like case, as the Dolphin promised to be at Wyer, to the end that they might aduise vpon a conuenient place where to meet, to treat of peace to be concluded betwixt the two realmes. But the Dolphin by sinister perswasion of some enemies to concord, brake promise, and came not. When the king saw that the rough default of his aduersarie, no treatie would be had, he remoued to Wernon, and there a while remained. Soth from Curreur the king had dispatched the earle of Warwick vnto the siege of la Roch Union, which fortresse he so constrained, that it was yielded into his hands, the first of Aprill, in the beginning of this seventh yeare of king Henries reigne, and giuen to sir Guie Buttler late capteine of Rome, of the kings free and liberall grant.

About the same time, the duke of Excester laid siege vnto Chateau Caliard, which siege continued from the last of March, vnto the latter end of September, or as some write vnto the twentieth of December, as after shall appeare. The duke of Glocester being sent to win the towne and castell of Part, toke the towne by assault, and the castell was deliuered by composition after fortie daies siege. After this the Englishmen ouerran the countrie about Chartres, and did much hurt to their enemies in all places where they came. The hearts of the Frenchmen were sore discouraged with the losse of Rome, and the other townes which yielded one after another thus to the English.

Englishmen, so that such as loved the wealth of their countrey sore lamented the imminent mischances, which they saw by the division of the nobilitie, like thortlie to fall on their heads, namely because they saw no remedie prepared.

But who ever else was disquieted with this matter, John duke of Burgognie raged and swelled, yea and so much created therewith, that he wist not what to saie, and lesse to do: for he knew well that he was neither free from disdaine, nor yet deliuered from the scope of malice, because that he onelie ruled the king, and had the whole doings in all matters about him. And therefore he considered, that all such mishaps as chanced to the state of the common-wealth would be imputed to his negligence and disordered government. To find some remedie against such dangers at hand, he thought first to assaie, if he might by any reasonable means conclude a peace betwixt the two mightie kings of England and France, which if he might bring to passe, he doubted not to renenge his quarell caslie inough against the Dolphin Charles, and to repress all causes of grudge and disdaine.

Wherewith intending to build upon this fraile foundation, he sent letters and ambassadoys to the king of England, aduertising him, that if he would personallie come to a communication to be had betwene him and Charles the French king, he doubted not but by his onlie meanes, peace should be brought in place, and bloudie battell clerelie eriled. King Henrie giuing courteous eare to these ambassadoys, sent with them the earle of Marlowe as his ambassado, accompanied with two hundred gentlemen to talke with the duke, as then remaining in the French court at the towne of Bourgne. The earle was assailed by the waite as he iourned, by a great number of rebellious persons, gotten into armour of purpose to haue spoiled him of such monie and things as he and his companie had about them. But by the high ballancie of the English people, with the aid of their bowes, the Frenchmen were discomfited and chased.

The earle at his comming to Bourgne was honorablie receiued, and hauing done the effect of his message, returned; and with him the earle of saint Paule, and the sonne and heire of the duke of Bourbon were also sent as ambassadoys from the French king, to conclude upon the time and place of the meeting, with all the circumstances. Whereupon the king of England agreed to come to the towne of Pante, with condition that the duke of Burgognie, and other for the French king should come to Pontoise, that either part might meet other in a conuenient place betwixt those two townes nere to Melun. According to this appointment, K. Henrie came to Pante, where in the feast of Pentecost he kept a liberal house to all commers, and late himselfe in great estate. Upon the which daie, either for good seruice already by them done, or for the good expectation of things to come, he created Gascoigne de Fots, or therwise called the captain or captall de Buef a ballant Gascoigne, earle of Longueuille; and sir John Greie earle of Tankerville, and the lord Bourchier earle of Ebu.

After this solemne feast ended, the place of entertainment and meeting was appointed to be beside Melun on the riuer of Seine, where in a faire place euerie part was by commissioners appointed to their ground. When the daie of appointment approached, which was the last daie of Maie, the king of England accompanied with the dukes of Clarence, and Gloucester, his brethren, the duke of Exeter his vncle, and Henrie Beauford clerke his other vncle, which after was bishop of Winchester and cardinal, with the earles of March, Salisburie, and others, to the number of a thousand men of warre, entered into his ground, which was barred about and ported, where in his tents were pight in a princelie maner.

Likewise for the French part came Isabell the French quene, because hir husband was fallen into his old frantike disease, hauing in hir companie the duke of Burgognie, and the earle of saint Paule, and she had attending upon hir the faire ladie Katharine hir daughter, with sir and twentie ladies and damoels; and had also for hir furniture a thousand men of warre. The said ladie Katharine was brought by hir mother, onelie to the intent that the king of England beholding hir excellent beautie, should be so inflamed and rapt in hir loue, that he to obtaine hir to his wife, should the sooner agree to a gentle peace and louing concord. But though manie words were spent in this treatie, and that they met at eight several times, yet no effect ensued, nor any conclusion was taken by this frendlie consultation, so that both parties after a princelie fashion toke leaue each of other, and departed; the Englishmen to Pante, and the Frenchmen to Pontoise.

Some authors write that the Dolphin to state that no agreement should passe, sent sir Taneguide de Chastell to the duke of Burgognie, declaring that if he would breake off the treatie with the Englishmen, he would then common with him; and take such order, that not onelie they but the whole realme of France should thereof be glad and reioise. Whosoever it came to passe, truth it is, that where it was agreed, that they should estones haue met in the same place on the third of Iulie; the king according to that appointment came: but there was none for the French part, neither quene nor duke that once appeared; so that it was manifest inough how the fault rested not in the Englishmen, but in the Frenchmen. By reason whereof no conclusion sorted to effect of all this communication, saue onelie that a certeine sparke of burning loue was kindled in the kings heart by the sight of the ladie Katharine.

The king without doubt was highlie displeased in his mind, that this communication came to no better passe. Wherefore he mistrusting that the duke of Burgognie was the verie let and stop of his desires, said vnto him before his departure: Comme, we will haue your kings daughter, and all things that we demand with hir, or we will dye your king and you out of his realme. Well (said the duke of Burgognie) before you dye the king and me out of his realme, you shall be well wearied, and therof we doubt little. Shortlie after, the duke of Burgognie and the Dolphin met in the plaine fields besides Melun, and there comming together, concluded apparantlie an open peace and amitie, which was proclaimed in Paris, Amiens, and Pontoise.

This agreement was made the first of Iulie in the yeare 1419. It was ingrossed by notaries, signed with their hands, and sealed with their great seales of armes; but as the sequele shewed, hart thought not what long spake, nor mind meant not that hard wrote. Whiles these things were a doing, diuerse of the Frenchmen in Rone went about a conspiracie against the Englishmen, whereof the king being well aduertised, sent thither certeine of his nobles, which tried out these conspiratoys, caused them to be apprehended, had them in examination, and such as they found gulltie were put to death; and so setting the citie in quietnes, returned to the king, who counted it great honor to keepe the countreies which he wonne by conquest in obedience and awe; with such victories are not obtained without sore labour and toyle, both of prince and people, as the poet rightlis saith:

The king of England, perceiuing by this new alliance, that nothing was lesse to be looked for, than peace at the hands of the Frenchmen, deuised still how to win towncs and fortresses, which were kept against him: and now that the truce was expired, on the thirtieth daie of Iulie, he being as then within the towne of Hante, appointed certaine bands of souldiers in the after none to passe out of the gates, giuing onelic knowledge to the capteins what he would haue them to doe. And to the intent that no inking of the enterprise should come to the enimies eare, he kept the gates himselfe as porter. These that were thus sent forth being guided by the earle of Longueuile, otherwile called the captaun de Buef, were commanded in a secret maner as they could to draw toward the towne of Pontosse, and to keepe themselves in couert till the darke of the night, and then approach the walles of that towne, and upon espieng their aduantage to enter it by scaling, hauing ladders and all things necessarie with them for the purpose.

 Whereouer, about the closing of the daie and night in the evening, he sent forth the erle of Huntington with other bands of soldiers, to succor and assist the other, if they chanced to enter the towne according to the order taken. Those that were first sent forth (according to their instructions) conueiled themselves so closelie to their appointed places, that the enimies heard nothing of their doings. Wherevpon when the night was come, they came in secret wise vnder the walles, and there watched their time till the morning began to draw on. In the meane time, whilst the watch was departed, and before other were come in to their places to relieue it, the Englishmen setting vp their ladders, entered and brake open one of the gates to receiue the other that followed.

The Frenchmen perceiuing that the walles were taken, and their enemies entered into the towne, at the first were loze amazed: but after perceiuing the small number of the Englishmen, they assembled together and fiercely assailed them, so that they were constrained to retire to the walles and turrets which they had taken, and with much adoe defended the same; some leaping downe into the ditches, and hiding them in the vines, till at length the earle of Huntington, with his companies came to their succours, and entering by the gate which was open, easilie did beat backe the enemies, & got the market place. Which when the lord Lisle Adam capitaine of the towne perceiued, he opened the gate towards Paris, by the which he with all his retinue, and diuerse of the townefmen to the number of ten thousand in all, (as Enguerant de Monfr. recounteth) fled towards Paris, taking awaie with them their coine, Jewels, and plate. Some of them fleeing towards Beauuois were met with, and stripp'd of that they had, by Jehan de Gulgni, and Jehan de Clau, two capitaines that serued the Politiaall faction.

There were within the towne of Pontoise at that time when it was thus taken by the Englishmen, a thousand lances, and two thousand arcuballisters, as Thomas Walsingham affirmeth, and of Englishmen and Gascoignes that went first forth of Pante with the captayn de Bueil, not past fiftene hundred, as Hall reporteth; although Enguerand de Monstrelet saith, they were about three thousand. But how manye soeuer they were, they durst not at the first, by reason of their small number (as may be thought) once to vnder themselves, or deale with booties, fill about the houre of pygne, that the duke of Clarence came to their aid with five thousand men, who much praising the valiantnesse of the earle and his retinue that had thus wonne the towne, gave to them the same spoile of the which there was great plentie.

Then went the duke forth towards Paris, and comming thither, lodged before it two daies and two nights, without perceiuing anye proffer of issue to be made forth against him by his enemies, and there, for seeing they durst not once lake upon him, he returned to Montoisie, for the taking of which towne the whole countrie of France, and speciallie the Parisians were sore dismaied: sith now there was no fortresse able to withstand the English puissance; for that the Frenchmen ouerran all the Ile of France, did to the Frenchmen damages innumerable (as their writers affirme) brought daillie prizes to the English armie, burnt by houses, laid beds on the backs of the kine, rid upon them, carried yong children before them, and sold them to the Englishmen for slaues. These strange doings so feared the Frenchmen within the territorie of Paris, and the countrie about, that the sorie people fled out of the villages with all their stuffe into the citie.

The French king, and the duke of Burgognie being at faint Denys, in this season, departed from thence with the queene and his daughter, and went to Trois in Champagne, there to consult of their businesse, hauing left at Paris the earle of S. Paule, and the lord Lisle Adam, with a great puissance to defend the citie. The king of England immediatlie after that Montoile was wonne (as befoze ye haue heard) came thither in person, as well to giue order for the placing of a sufficient garrison there for defence thereof; as to proceed further into the countrie for the getting of other towncs and places: and so after he had well prouided for the good gouernment, & safe keeping thereof, the eighteenth daie of August, he departed out of the same with his maine armie.

And because they of the garrison that laie in the castell of Blancon Willers had done, & dōile did di-uerse and sundrie displeasures to the Englishmen, he pight downe his field nere to the same, the better to restrain them from their hostile attempts, and withall sent part of his armie to besiege the castell, which put them in such feare, that they despairing of all reliefe or succour, and perceiving they should not be able long to defend the place against the kings puissance, yielded the place, with all their coine and other goods into the kings hands. The soldiers of that garrison, and the inhabitants, at the contemplation of a certaine labie there amongst them, were licenced by the king to depart without armor or weapon, onelie with their liues saued. John of Burgh that was after bailiffe of Glouours, was appointed captaine of this castell.

After this, all the towines and castels within a great circuit offered to yeld themselves unto the English obedience; the strong towine and castell of Cisors onlie excepted, which still held out, & would shew no token of will to yeld. Whereupon the king the last of August began to approach the same, but at the first he could not come nere, by reason of the marishes and fennes; but yet such was the diligence of the Englishmen, advanced by the presence of the king, ready in all places to commend them that were forward in their businesse, and to chastise such as slacked their duettie, that daileie they came nearer and nearer although the Frenchmen issued forth battlie to encounter them, giving them manie sharpe skirmishes. For the towine being double walled and fenced with those broad marishes, so encouraged them within, that they thought no force had bene able to have subdued them.

But at length calling to remembrance, that the king of England came before no towne nor fortreffe, from which he would depart before he had brought it under his subiection, they offered to come to a parley, and in the end compounded to render the towne to come into the kings hands the eight daie of September next ensuing, and the castell (because it was the stronger peece) they covenanted to deliuer the fource and twentieth of the same, if in the meane time no rescue came to raise the siege. Hereupon when no such rescue could be heard of, at the daies limited, the soldiers of the garrison, & the more part of the towne men also submitted themselves, and received an oth to be true subiects to the king, and so remained still in their romes. The earle of Worcester was made capteine there.

About the same time, to wit, the thre and twentieth of September (as some write) was castell Galiard surrendered to the hands of the duke of Excester, which had bene besieged euer since the last daie of March (as before ye haue heard.) But others write that it held out seauen moneths, and was not deliuered vp till the twentieth of December. This castell was not onlie strong by situation, standing vpon the top of a steep hill, but also closed with mightie thicke walles, and furnished with men, and all maner of munition and things necessarie. The king appointed the lord Ros capteine of it. After that Gisors and castell Galiard were thus yelded to the English obedience, all the other townes and castels thereabout, and in the countrie of Menquessin, shortly after yelded to the king, as Courneie, Chaumount, Beaulde, Dangu, and other small fortresses. Of Courneie, was sir Gilbert Amfresville made capteine; at Beaulde, the earle of Worcester; and at Dangu, Richard Woodville. Shortly after was the castell Daumall yelded to the earle of Warwike, to whome it was giuen.
And thus was the whole duchie of Normandie (vnto saint Michael onlie excepted) reduced to the possession of the right heire, which had bene wrongfullie detained from the kings of England euer since the daies of king John, who lost it about the yeare one thousand two hundred and seauen.

To satisfie those that be desirous to know what captains were appointed by the king in diuerse townes that were yelded to him (of which we haue made no mention heretofore but in generall) here their names doe follow, and of the townes, as we find them in the chronicles of maister Hall. At Creu-le, sir Henrie Lanclos an Almaine; at Loxignie, sir John Dopham, to whome it was giuen; at Cham-bote, the lord Fitz Hugh; at Merneuil in Berch, sir John Penill; at Elate, sir William Huddleston bailiffe of Alanson; at Crutle sir Lots Robert; at Conde Rozean sir John Fastolfe; at Catwodebecke, sir Lots Robert; at Deepe, William lord Bourchier earle of Eu; at Aubemarle, the earle of War-wike, and his deputie thereof William Pontfort; at Wellincombe, sir Thomas Ramston lord thereof by gift; at Longueuille, the capitall de Beuf or But, earle thereof by gift; at Danville, sir Christopher Burden; at Couches, sir Robert Sparburie; at Chierburg, sir John Gedding; at Bacqueuille, the lord Ros; at Arques sir James Fines, bailiffe of Caur; at Honceaur, sir Philip Lach; at Offrie Dagnie, Richard Abraham; at Sentler Surget, William Ballet; at Betueuil, sir Henrie Spoxtmer bailiffe of Hundew.

But now to returne where we left. The wise and grauie personages of the realme of France, soze lamenting & bewailing the miserie of their countrie, saw they had puissance inough to defend their enimies, if they were of perfect concord amongst themselves. And therefore to remove all rancor and displeasure betwixt the Dolphin, and the duke of Burgognie, they procured a new meeting, which was appointed to be at Pontrean ou fault Ponne, where the two princes at the daie assigned met. But such was the fortune of France, that the duke of Burgognie was there murdered, as he kneeled before the Dolphin: whereupon ensued greater debate than before. For Philip earle of Charolois, the sonne and heire of the said duke, took the matter verie grauoulie, as he had no lesse cause, and determined to be reuenged on the Dolphin, and other that were guiltie of the murder: so that now there was great expectation of slaughter and bloodshed, but no hope for the most part of tranquillitie & peace. France therefore, what with overthowles giuen by the English, & diuis-sion among themselves, was verie soze afflicted; inso much that one miserie riding on anothers necke, the whole land was in danger of desolation by ciuill dissention & mutuall mutinies; as the poet noteth:

lia sub Henr. 5.

When he had well considered of the matter, and taken aduise with his counsell, he first sent ambassa-dours to the king of England, then lieng at Gisors to treat and conclude a truce betwene them both for a certaine space, that they might talke of some conclusion of agreement. King Henrie receiued the ambassadors verie courteously, and granted that communication might be had of peace, but bitterlie denied any abstinence from warre, because he would not lose time, if the treatie sorted not to good effect. Hereupon hauing his armie assembled at Spaunt, he diuided the same into thre parts, appointing the duke of Glocester with one part to go vnto the castell of S. Germane in Laie, and to laie siege therevnto. The duke according to his commission, comming before that castell, within a while constrained them within by continuall skirmishes and assaults to deliuer vp the place into his hands. An other part of the armie was sent vnto the castell of Pontioie, which likewise by such fierce assaults and manfull approches, as the Englishmen made thereto, was shortly giuen ouer and yelded. The third part of the host went to Oeu-lanc, a verie strong towne compassed about with the riuer of Seine.

But the king denied to fasten botes and barges together, and to reere vp certaine frames of timber a-by that meanes approach the walles, wherewith those that had the towne in keeping were so put in feare, that their capteine was glad to come to a communication, & agreed to deliuer the towne into the kings hands, if no rescue came before the thirtieth daie of October next ensuing. On which daie, for that no succours appeared, the towne (according to the coue-nants) was giuen vp into the kings hands. Sir Thomas Ramston was made capteine there, and after him sir John Fastolfe. The king, whilst these places were besieged, and thus brought vnder his subiection, continued for the most part at Spaunt; but yet oftentimes he went forth to visit his campes, and to see that nothing should be wanting, that might further the speedie dispatch of his enterprises.

About the same time, there came againe ambassa-dours to him from Charles the French king, & from the young duke of Burgognie to treat with him of some good conclusion of peace to be had; who had no such trust in their sute, but that he doubted their meaning, and therefore ceased not to proceed in the winning of townes and castels, as he was in hand. Now when Christmasse approached, the king withdrew to Rone, and there kept the solemnization of that feast, appointing in the meane time his men of warre to be occupied as occasion serued. The earle of Salisburie was sent to besiege the towne of Fresneie, the which after stout resistance made at the first, shortly after was deliuered to him to the kings vse. The earles Chronicle of Burgundie

warre.

A great victorie on the English side.

Wall, sir Philip Leech, and diuerse other, were sent into the countrie of Haine, where, not farre from the citie of Spens they were incountered by a power of Frenchmen, which the Dolphin had sent against them. There was at the first a sharpe bickering betwixt them, but in the end the victorie remained with the Englishmen; so that manie of the Frenchmen were slaine, and taken, and the residue chased out of the field. There were slaine (as Thomas Walsingham saith) at the point of fise thousand, and two hundred taken prisoners, among whome was the marshall de Rouss, and diuerse other of good account. The two English earles remained there as victors, in the countrie which was by the king to them assigned.

Whilist these victorious exploits were thus happily achieved by the Englishmen, and that the king late still at Rone, in giuing thanks to almighty God for the same, there came to him embassadours from the French king and the duke of Burgognie to moue him to peace. The king minding not to be reputed for a destroyer of the countrie, which he coveted to preserve, or for a causer of christian blood still to be spilt in his quarrell, began so to incline and giue care vnto their sute and humble request, that at length (after often sending to and fro) and that the bishop of Arras, and other men of honor had bene with him, and likewise the earle of Warwicke, and the bishop of Rochester had bene with the duke of Burgognie, they both finally agreed vpon certaine articles, so that the French king and his commons would thereto assent.

A truce tripartite.

Now was the French king and the quene with their daughter Katharine at Trois in Champaigne gouerned and ordered by them, which so much fauoured the duke of Burgognie, that they would not for any earthly good, once hinder or pull backe one lot of such articles as the same duke should seeke to preferre. And therefore what needeth manie words, a truce tripartite was accorded betwixt the two kings and the duke, and their countries, and order taken that the king of England should send in the companie of the duke of Burgognie his embassadours vnto Trois in Champaigne sufficientlie authorized to treat and conclude of so great matter. The king of England, being in good hope that all his affaires should take good successe as he could wish or desire, sent to the duke of Burgognie his uncle, the duke of Gloucester, the earle of Salisburie, the bishop of Elye, the lord Stanhope, the lord Fitz Hugh, sir John Robert, and sir Philip Hall, with diuerse doctors, to the number of fise hundred horse, which in the companie of the duke of Burgognie came to the citie of Trois the eleuenth of March. The king, the quene, and the ladie Katharine them receiued, and hartlie welcomed, shewing great signes and tokens of loue and amitie.

The articles of the peace concluded betwixt king Henrie and the French king.

After a few daies they fell to counsell, in which at length it was concluded, that king Henrie of England should come to Trois, and marie the ladie Katharine; and the king his father after his death should make him heire of his realme, crowne and dignitie. It was also agreed, that king Henrie, during his father in lawes life, should in his stead haue the whole gouernement of the realme of France, as regent thereof, with manie other covenants and articles, as after shall appere. As to the performance whereof, it was accorded, that all the nobles and estates of the realme of France, as well spirituall as temporall, and also the citie and commonalties, citizens and burgesses of towne, that were obasant at that time to the French king, should take a corporall oth. These articles were not at the first in all points brought to a perfect conclusion. But after the effect and meaning of them was agreed vpon by the commisso-ners, the Englishmen departed towards the king their master, and left sir John Robert behind, to giue his attendance on the ladie Katharine.

King Henrie being informed by them of that which they had done, was well content with the agreement and with all diligence prepared to go vnto Trois, and thereupon having all things in a readinesse, he being accompanied with his brethren the dukes of Clarence and Gloucester, the earles of Warwicke, Salisburie, Huntingdon, Cambridge, and Longueville, fiftene thousand men of warre, went from Rone to Pontoise, departing from thence the eight daie of Maie, came to saint Denis two leagues from Paris, and after to Pontcharanton, where he left a strong garrison of men, with sir William Colcoigne, to keepe the passage; and so then entering into Brize, he tooke by the waie a castell which was kept against him, causing them that so kept it, some to be hanged, and the residue to be led forth with him as prisoners. And after this keeping on his iournie by Bourges, and Joigny, at length he came to Trois.

The duke of Burgognie accompanied with manie noble men, receiued him two leagues without the towne, and conueied him to his lodging. All his armie was lodged in small villages thereabout. And after that he had reposed himselfe a little, he went to visit the French king, the quene, and the ladie Katharine, whome he found in saint Peters church, where was a verie iolous meeting betwixt them (and this was on the twentieth daie of Maie) and there the king of England, and the ladie Katharine were affianced. After this, the two kings and their counsell assembled together diuerse daies, wherein the first concluded agreement was in diuerse points altered and brought to a certeinettie, according to the effect aboue mentioned. When this great matter was finished, the kings swore for their parts to obserue all the covenants of this league and agreement. Likewise the duke of Burgognie and a great number of other princes and nobles which were present, receiued an oth, the tenor whereof (as the duke of Burgognie uttered it in solemne words) thus insueth, accordinglie as the same is exemplified by Titus Lilius De Foro Luuifis in Latine.

England, and regent of France for king Charles, that we shall humble and faithfully obey the said Henrie in all things which concerne the common-wealth and crowne of France. And immediatlie after the deceasse of our soueraigne lord king Charles, we shall be faithful liegemen unto the said king Henrie, and to his successors for ever. Neither shall we take or suffer any other soueraigne lord and supreme king of France, but the same Henrie and his heires: neither shall we be of counsell or consent of any hurt towards the said king Henrie or his successors, whereby they may suffer losse & detriment of life or lim, but that the same so farre as in us may lie, we shall signifie to them with all speed, by letters or messengers, that they may the better provide for themselves in such cases.

The like off a great number of the princes and nobles both spirituall and temporall, which were present, received at the same time. This done, the morrow after Trinitie Sundaye, being the third of June, the marriage was solemnized and solite consummate betwixt the king of England, and the said ladie Katharine. Herewith was the king of England named and proclaimed heire and regent of France. And as the French king sent the copie of this treatie to everie towne in France: so the king of England sent the same in English unto everie cite and market towne within his realme, to be proclaimed and published. The true copie whereof, as we find it in the chronicles of maister Hall, we have thought good here to set downe, for the more full satisfieng of those that shall desire to peruse everie clause and article thereof, as followeth.

The articles & appointments of peace betweene the realmes of England and France.

Henrie by the grace of God king of England, heire and regent of France, lord of Ireland, to perpetuall mind of christian people, and all those that be under our obediace, we notifie and declare, that though there hath bene here before diverse treaties betweene the most excellent prince Charles our father of France and his progenitors, for the peace to be had betwixt the two realmes of France and England, the which heretofore have borne no fruit: we considering the great harmes, the which have not onelie fallen betwixt those two realmes, for the great division of that hath bene betwixt them, but to all holy church; we have taken a treatie with our said father, in which treatie betwixt our said father and us, it is concluded & accorded in the forme after the manner that followeth.

1 First, it is accorded betwixt our father and us, that forsomuch as by the bond of matrimonie made for the good of the peace betwixt us and our most deere beloved Katharine, daughter of our said father, & of our most deere mother Isabell his wife; the same Charles and Isabell bene made our father and mother: therefore them as our father and mother we shall have and worship, as it sitteth and seemeth so worship a prince and princesse to be worshipped, principallie before all other temporall persons of the world.

2 Also we shall not disfraunce, diseason or let our father aforesaid, but that he hold and possede as long as he liueth, as he holdeth and possedeth at this time, the crowne and dignitie of all of France, with rents and profits for the same, of the sustenance of his estate and charges of the realme. And our foresaid mother also hold as long as she liueth, the state and dignitie of quene, after the manner of the same realme, with convenient part of the said rents and profits.

3 Also that the foresaid ladie Katharine shall take and have dowter in our realme of England as quenes of England here tofore were wont for to take and have, that is to saie, to the summe of fortie thousand scutes, of the which twa algate shall be a noble English.

4 And that by the waies, manners, and meanes that we without transgression or offense of other made by us, for to speake the lawes, customes, franchises and rights of our said realme of England, shall done our labour and pursuit, that the said Katharine, all so soon as it may be done, be made sure to take, and for to have in our said realme of England, from the time of our death, the said dowter of fortie thousand scutes yereleie, of the which twa algate be worth a noble English.

5 Also if it happe the said Katharine to overlive us, we shall take and have the realme of France immediatlie, from the time of our death, dowter to the summe of twenty thousand franks yereleie, of and upon the lands, places and lordships that held and had Blanch sometime wife of Philip Deasail to our said father.

6 Also that after the death of our said father aforesaid, and from thence forward, the crowne and the realme of France, with all the rights and appurtenances, shall remaine and abide to us, and bene of us and of our heires for evermore.

7 And forsomuch as our said father is witholden with diverse sicknesse, in such manner as he maie not intend in his owne person for to dispose for the needs of the foresaid realme of France: therefore during the life of our foresaid father, the faculties and exercise of the gouernance and disposition of the publicke & common profit of the said realme of France, with counsell, and nobles, and wise men of the same realme of France, shall be and abide to us: so that from thenceforth we maie gouerne the same realme by us. And also to admit to our counsell and assistance of the said nobles, such as we shall thinke meet. The which faculties and exercise of gouernance thus being toward us, we shall labour and purpose us speedfullie, diligentlie, and truelie, to that that maie be and ought for to be unto the worship of God, and our said father and mother, and also to the common good of the said realme, and that realme with the counsell & helpe of the worshipie and great nobles of the same realme for to be defended, peaced and gouerned after right and equitie.

8 Also that we of our owne power shall do the court of parlement in France to be kept and observed in his authoritie and souerainetie, and in all that is done to it in all manner of places that now or in time comming is or shall be subject to our said father,

9 Also we to our power shall defend and helpe all and everie of the piers, nobles, cities, townes, communalities, and singular persons, now or in time comming, subjects to our father in their rights, customes, priuileges, freedoms, and franchises, longing or due to them in all manner of places now or in time comming subject to our father.

10 Also we diligentlie and truelie shall trauell to our power, and do that iustice be administered and done in the same realme of France after the lawes, customes, and rights of the same realme, without personall exception. And that we shall kepe and hold the subjects of the same realme in tranquillitie and peace, and to our power we shall defend them against all manner of violence and oppression.

11 Also we to our power shall provide, and do to our power, that able persons and profitable bene taken to the offices as well of iustices and other offices belonging to the governance of the demaines; and of other offices of the said realme of France, for the good right and peaceable iustice of the same, and for the administration that shall be committed unto them; and that they be such persons, that after the lawes and rights of the same realme, and for the benefit and profit of our said father, shall minister, and that the foresaid realme shall be taken and departed to the same offices.

12 Also that we of our power, so farre as it may commodiously be done, shall travel to put into the obedience of our said father, all manner of cities, townes, and castels, places, countries, and persons within the realme of France, disobedient, and rebels to our said father, holding with them which bene called the Dolphin or Arminache.

13 Also that we might the more commodiously, suerly and frailer done, exercise, & fulfill these things aforesaid, it is accorded that all worthie nobles and estates of the same realme of France, as well spirituals as temporals, and also cities notable and communalities, and citizens, burghesses of townes of the realme of France, that bene obedient at this time to our said father, shall make these othes that followen.

15 Also that the worthie, great, and noble estates of the said realme, as well spirituals as temporals, and also cities and notable communalities, and citizens and burghesses of the same realme, in all manner of things well and truly shall keepe and to their power shall do to be kept of so much as to them belongeth, or to any of them, all those things that bene appointed and accorded betwene our foresaid father and mother and us, with the counsell of them whome us lieth to call to us.

16 And that continually from the death, and after the death of our said father Charles, they shall be our true liegemen, and our heirs; and they shall receive and admit us for their liege and sovereigne and verie king of France, and for such to obeie us without opposition, contradiction, or difficultie, as they bene to our foresaid father during his life, never after this realme of France shall obey to man as king or regent of France, but to us and our heirs. Also they shall not be in counsell, helpe, or assent that we lese life or limme, or be take with evill taking, or that we suffer harme, or diminution in person, estate, worship, or goods; but if they knowe any such thing for to be cast or imagined against us, they shall let it to their power, & they shall done us to werten thereof, as hastily as they may by themselves, by message, or by letters.

17 Also that all manner of conquests that should be made by us in France upon the said inobedients, out of the duchie of Normandie, shall be done to the profit of our said father; and that to our power we shall do, that all manner of lands and lordships that bene in the places so for to be conquered, longeing to persons obedieng to our foresaid father, which shall sweare for to keepe this present accord, shall be restored to the same persons to whom they long to.

18 Also that all manner of persons of the holie church, beneficed in the duchie of Normandie, or any other places in the realme of France, subiect to our father, and favouring the partie of the dukes of Burgonie, which shall sweare to keepe this present accord, shall enjoy peaceable their benefices of holie church in the duchie of Normandie, or in other places next aforesaid.

19 Also likewise, all manner of persons of holie church, obedient to us, and beneficed in the realme of France, and places subiect to our father, that shall sweare to keepe this present accord, shall enjoy peaceable their benefices of holie church in places next aforesaid.

20 Also that all manner of churches, universites, and studies generall, and all colleges of studies, and other colleges of holie church, being in places now or in time coming subiect to our father, or in the duchie of Normandie, or other places in the realme of France subiect to us, shall enjoy their rights and possessions, rents, prerogatives, liberties, & franchises, longeing or due to them in any manner of wise in the said realme of France, saving the right of the crowne of France, and everie other person.

21 Also by Gods helpe, when it happeneth us to come to the crowne of France, the duchie of Normandie, and all other places conquered by us in the realme of France, shall bow under the commandement, obeisance, and monarchie of the crowne of France.

22 Also that we shall force us, & do to our power, that recompense be made by our said father without diminution of the crowne of France to persons obedieng to him, and favouring to that partie that is said Burgonie, to whom longeth lands, lordships, rents, or possessions in the said duchie of Normandie, or other places in the realme of France, conquered by us hither towarde, given by us in places and lands gotten or to be gotten, and overcome, in the name of our said father upon rebels and inobedients to him. And if so be that such manner of recompense be not made to the said persons, by the life of our said father, we shall make that recompense in such manner and places, of goods, when it happeneth by Gods grace to the crowne of France. And if so be that the lands, lordships, rents, or possessions, the which longeth to such manner of persons in the said duchie and places be not given by us, the same persons shall be restored to them without any delate.

23 And during the life of our father, in all places now or in time coming subiect to him, letters of common iustice, and also grants of offices and gifts, pardons or remissions, and privileges shall be written and proceed under the name and seale of our said father. And for so much as some singular case may fall, that may not be foreseen by mans wit, in the which it might be necessarie and behouefull, that we do write our letters, in such manner case, if any hap for the good and suertie of our father, and for the governance that longeth to us, as is before said; and for to eschewen perils that otherwise might fall, to the presence of our said father, to write our letters, by the which we shall command, charge, and defend after the nature and qualitie of the need, in our fathers behalf and ours as regent of France.

24 Also, that during our fathers life, we shall not call nor write us king of France; but verelie we shall absteine us from that name, as long as our father liueth.

25 Also that our said father, during his life, shall name, call, and write us in French in this manner: Nostre treschier filz Henry roy d'Engleterre heretere de France. And in Latine in this manner: Præclarissimus filius noster Henricus rex Anglie & heres Francia.

26 Also that we shall put none impositions or exactions, exactions, or do charge the subiects of our said father without cause reasonable and necessarie, ne otherwise than for common good of the realme of France, and after the saies and asking of the lawes and customes reasonable approued of the same realme.

27 Also that we shall traueil to our power to the effect and intent, that by the assent of the three estates of either of the realmes of France and England, that all maner of obstacles maie be done awaie, and that all maner of obstackes maie be done awaie, and that in this partie, that it be ordeined and prouided; that from the time that we or any of our heires come to the crowne of France, both the crownes, that is to the crowne of France and England perpetuallie be togither in one & in the same person, that is to saie, from our fathers life to vs, and from the tearme of our life thenceforward in the persons of our heires, that shall be one after an other, and that both realmes shall be gouerned from that we or any of our heires come to the same, not seuerallie vnder diuerse kings in one time, but vnder the same person which for the time shall be king of both realmes, and our soueraigne lord (as it is before said) keeping neuertheless in all maner of other things to either of the same realmes, their rights, liberties, customes, vlags, and lawes, not making subiect in any maner of wise one of the same realmes, to the rights, lawes, or vlags of that other.

28 Also that thenceforward, perpetuallie, shall be still rest, and that in all maner of wise, dissensions, hates, rancors, enuies and wars, betwene the same realmes of France and England, and the people of the same realmes, drawing to accord of the same peace, may cease and be broken.

29 Also that there shall be from henceforward for evermore, peace and tranquillitie, & good accord, and common affection, and stable friendship betwene the said realmes, and their subiects before said. And the same realmes shall keepe themselves with their counsell, helps, and common assistance against all maner of men that inforce them for to doen or to imagine wrongs, harmes, displeasures, or grieuances to them or either of them. And they shall be conuersant and merchandizen frelie and suerlie togither, paieing the custome due and accustomed. And they shall be conuersant also, that all the confederats and allies of our said father and the realme of France aforesaid, and also our confederats of the realme of England aforesaid, shall in eight moneths from the time of this accord of peace, as it is notified to them, declare by their letters, that they will draw to this accord, and will be comprehended vnder the treaties and accord of this peace, sauing neuertheless either of the same crownes, and also all maner actions, rights and reuenues, that longen to our said father and his subiects, and to vs and our subiects, against all maner of such allies and confederats.

30 Also neither our father, neither our brother the duke of Burgognie shall begin, ne make with Charles, cleping himselfe the Dolphin of Wiennes, any treatie, or peace, or accord, but by counsell and assent of all and ech of vs three, or of other the three estates of either of the said realmes aboue named.

31 Also that we with assent of our said brother of Burgognie, and other of the nobles of the realme of France, the which there to owen to be called, shall ordeine for the gouernance of our said father schertlie, louinglie, & honestlie, after the asking of his roiall estate and dignitie, by the maner that shall be to the worship of God, and of our father, and of the realme of France.

32 Also all maner of persons, that shall be about our father to do him personall seruice, not onelie in office, but in all other seruices, aswell the nobles and gentles as other, shall be such as hath bene bozne in the realme of France, or in places longing to France, good, wise, true, and able to that foresaid seruice. And our said father shall dwell in places notable of his obedience, and no where else. Wherefore we charge and command our said liege subiects, and other being vnder our obedience, that they keepe and do to be kept in all that longeth to them, this accord and peace, after the forme and maner as it is accorded; and that they attempt in no maner wise, any thing that may be preiudiciall or contrarie to the same accord and peace, vpon paine of life and lim, and all that they may forfeit against vs. Given at Troes, the thirtieth day of Maie, 1420, & proclaimed in London the twentieth day of June.

33 Also that we for the things aforesaid, and euerie one of them, shall giue our assent by our letters patents, sealed with our seale vnto our said father, with all approbation and confirmation of vs, and all other of our blood roiall, and all other of the cities and townes to vs obedient. Sealed with our seales accustomed. And further our said father, besides his letters patents sealed with our great seale, shall make or cause to be made letters approbatorie, and confirmations of the pæres of his realme, and of the lords, citizens, and burgesses of the same, vnder his obedience. All which articles we haue sworne to keepe vpon the holic euangelists.

On the fourteenth of June being fridaie, there was a solemn procession at London, and a sermon at Pauls crosse, in which the preacher openly declared the effect of the kings marriage, and the articles concluded vpon the same, by reason wherof (he said) there must be a new great seale deuised, and the old broken, and in the new the kings name with a new addition of his title as regent of France, and heire apparent of that kingdome was to be ingrauen. Beside the league thus concluded by king Henrie with the French king, and the whole bodie of the realme of France, there was a priuat league accorded betwixt him and the duke of Burgognie, the effect wherof was comprehended in articles as followeth.

First, that the duke of Burgognie should procure this peace latelie before concluded, to be obserued firme and stable in all covenants and points therof, so far as he by any meanes might further the same: in consideration wherof, one of the brethren of king Henrie should take to wife one of the said duke of Burgognies sisters. That king Henrie should euer haue in singular fauour the said duke of Burgognie, as his most deere brother, and support him in all his rights. That the said duke, after the deceasse of king Charles, should take an oth of fealtie to be true to B. Henrie & his heires, according to the forme & tenor therof before expressed, & should in all things be friend to king Henrie and his heires for ever. That king Henrie should do his uttermost indeuour, that due punishment might be had for the murder of duke John, father to the said duke of Burgognie, aswell vpon Charles that named himselfe Dolphin, as vpon others that were guiltie and priuie to that murder.

If the said Dolphin chanced to be taken, either in battell or to wone besieged, or if anie other chanced so to be taken, that should be proued guiltie or priuie to the murder of the said duke John, he should not be deliuered without iust punishment for his dedes, nor without the consent of the two kings Charles and Henrie, & of the three estates of both the realmes. In consideration of the great diligence, and painfull traueil sustained by the duke of Burgognie, it was also agreed, that he should haue by patent granted of king Charles and queene Isabell a fee of twentie thousand pounds Parisien, of pærelle reuenues, assigned forth nere to the confines of his countrie, to inioy the same to him and to his wife the duchess Michaele, and to the heires males betwixt them two, lawfullie begotten, to the obtaining thereof, king Henrie should shew all his furtherance; & if it might not be brought to passe till king Henrie had obtained the crowne of France, then should he see the same performed, upon the receiving of his homage.

The king of England, after all the articles of the said treaties and agreements were concluded, passed and swozne unto, made to the French king, the duke of Burgognie, and other the French lords, a sumptuous banquet; and before they departed from the same, he said with great grauitie made to them a right pithie and sententious oration, declaring to them both how profitable the ioining of the two kingdomes should be to the subjects of the same, and also the right that he had thereto, being by lineall descent of the womans side (which is the surest) rather a Frenchman than an Englishman. And though he was an Englishman borne, yet he assured them to tender the wealth of the realme of France, as much as he would the advancement of his owne native countrie of England.

Herewith, he inuited against Charles the Dolphin, being the head and onelie maintainer of all the ciuill discord, whose wicked nature, and cruell disposition, did well appeare in the murder of the late duke of Burgognie. He therefore willed them, according to their dutie, oath, and agreement, to stand with him, and helpe to reduce such a stubborn and disloyall sonne unto the obedience of his father king Charles, that he might shew himselfe conformable unto such orders and decrees, as they had taken, appointed, and agreed vpon; and for his part, he promised to worship, loue, and honor his father in law the said Charles, in place of his owne father, according to the true meaning of this concord and agreement, trusting the same to be a peace finall.

And to conclude, he promised, that if they shewed themselves true and loiall to him, according to the same agreement, the Ocean sea should sooner cease to flow, and the bright sunne lose his light, than he would desist from doing that which became a prince to do to his subject, or a father to his naturall child. When he had thus perswaded the nobilitie, and dispatched his businesse at Troies, he with all his armie, hauing with him the French king, and the duke of Burgognie, departed from thence the fourth of June; and vpon the seauenth daie of the same month, came before the towne of Sens in Burgognie, which held on the Dolphins part: but after foure daies siege, it was yielded vnto the king, and there he made captaine, the lord Genuille. From thence, he remoued to Pontreueu ou fault Ponne, which towne was taken on the thre and twentieth daie of June, by assault, so that manie of the Dolphins part were apprehended, before they could get to the castell.

Whilist the siege laie there, and before the towne was entred, the duke of Bedford came thither vnto the king, bringing with him a faire retinue of soldiers out of England. After the getting of the towne, the castell being well bittelled and manned, denied to render, and therefore was it assaulted with a strong siege. During the which, the duke of Burgognie was informed, in what place of the towne the duke his father was buried, who was slaine there (as before you haue heard) and now his corpes was taken by a gainie by his sonnes appointment, and seared, and so conueied vnto Digeon in high Burgognie, and there buried by his father Philip; to the end that the remembrance of him should remaine to posterities, by the reseruatiō of some monument abiding in the place of his interment, after that his boote was consumed, and his naturall countenance forgotten, which is the last point of reuerend dutie (as we may well thinke) which pietie of children towards their parents both require; namely, that they be decentlie buried when they be departed; and that their graues or some stones may put vs that are alie in mind of going the same waie, and to let no more by this fitting life, than standeth with the vncerteintie and shortnesse of the same; as one right well saith:

Cum tumulum cernis, cur non mortalia spernis?

Est memor mortis, quo vixit tempore fortis.

Because they within the castell of Pontreueu, gaue opprobrious words vnto the kings herald that was sent to them, the king caused a gibet to be set up before the castle, on the which were hanged twelue of those spitefull offenders, all gentlemen & friends to the captaine named monsieur de Cuitrie, who at length, perceiuing that by no means he could be succoured; and fearing to be taken by force, began to treat with the king of England, who for the space of eight daies would hearken to none of his offers; but in conclusion, he and his rendered themselves simple, their liues onelie saued, six weekes after they had bene besieged. The earle of Marlowe was made captaine, both of the towne and castell, who fortified it with men, munition, and bittels.

About this time Robert the gouernour of Scotland, the sixteenth yeare after his brothers reigne, and in the thirtieth yeare of his owne regiment deceased, in whose stead and office his sonne Moris duke of Albanie was by and by chosen, who had sonnes thre, Walter, Alexander, and James, whereof the two eldest beginning betimes to be obstinate, grew some after verie graceles and wicked: that in one flagitious feat among the rest by this Walter verie impiouslie against his parents was uttered. The gouernour had a faire, a gentle, and well lieng falcon, whereby he set great store. The sonne verie desirous of the same, made manie meanes and motions to haue hir, not without note of malapert importunitie and lacke of reuerence toward his parents pleasure, which the father dissembling to see, would not yet in anie wise forgo his hawk. Whereat this child reiecting regard of dutie, and receiuing an vnaturall hate and heat by broth of iniquitie set a boiling in his brest, came in on a time, where standing a while at a sudden he laid, pluckt awaie the bird from his fathers fist, and straight before his face wounding of his necke. The gouernour hereat fore astonished, for verie griefe gaue a great grone; Well sonne (quod he) since ye cannot abide your hunte for dutie and reuerence toward me your parent and soueraigne, I will bring in one that shall abide vs both. Wherevpon some after, he with one Calen Campbell, a noble man & of much authoritie (vnto whom this Walter had done a great despight) and with other of the nobilitie fell straight in consultation about the calling home of their king. Which all with one assent they did right well allow, whereby some after (as is touched afore, and followeth more at large) he was by them in his kingdom right roiallie placed. But this came of it. These mischievous children Walter and Alexander, the verie cause of their fathers confusion and their owne, within few yeares after condemned by law, vpon a bill by Sterling castell, had their heads chopt off at once. Walters wife with hir two sonnes, Andrew and Alexander, ran for refuge awaie into Ireland; thus for their long iniquities their hires iustlie paid all in a daie.]

Now to proceed in our proceesse of France. After the thus winning of the towne and castell of Pontreueu; the king departing from thence, came to Melun vpon Seine, the thirteenth daie of Iulie, and besieged it round about, hauing then in companie with him the French king, and the yong king of Scots, the dukes of Burgognie, Clarence, Bedford, Gloucester, and Bar, the prince of Dainge, and one and thertie earles, besides lords, barons, & knights, equall to lords in degree, to the number of seauen and fiftie, what of England and France; and beside also fiftiene maister soldiers. This siege continued the space almost of seuen moneths, or (as Thomas Walsingham saith) foureteene weekes, and foure daies, with skirmishing, scaling, assaulting, and defending, to the losse (no doubt) of both parts. Capteine of this towne was one monsieur de Barbafon, a Gasconne of such experience and approued valiance in wars, that his renowne and fame was spred through the world.

At the first laing of the siege, he called all the soldiers there in garrison, and likewise the townesmen afore him, and warned them all on paine of death, that none of them should be so hardie, as to treat, or once to motion anie word of surrendering the towne, or of coming to anie composition or agreement with the two kings; except they made him being their capteine pynne thereto, before they attempted anie such thing. ¶ In the meane season, the French queene, the queene of England, and the duchesse of Burgognie, lieng at Corbeill, came diuerse times to visit their husbands, and to see their frends; whome the king of England highlie feasted, and longlie intertained, that euery creature reported great honour of him. This towne of Melun seemed verie strong, both by reason of the river of Seine, which compassed part thereof, and also by strong walles, turrets, ditches, and bulwarks made about it.

The king therefore, to take awaie all the issues and entrees from them within, made a bridge ouer the river, able to beare hoxses and carriage; and againe, appointed diuerse hoxes furnished with men of warre, to kepe the streame; so that they within should haue no waie to come abroad, either by water or land; yet on a daie, the Frenchmen sailed forth, and assailed the English lodgings, where the earle of Warwick was incamped on the east side of the towne, not farre from the duke of Burgognie; but by the valiant prowesse and manlie courage of the Englishmen, the enemies were easilie beaten backe and constrained to retire into the towne againe, with their losse. There is to be remembred, that during this siege before Melun, there came to the king the duke of Bourgne, the kings brother in law (but the kings sister that had bene married to him, was not then liuing) and brought with him seauen hundred well appointed hoxsmen, which were retained to serue the king, and right worthilie they bare themselves, and therefore most liberallie recompensed at the kings hand, for the time they continued in his seruice.

The king enforced this siege by all waies and meanes possible, to bring the towne into subiection, as well by mines as otherwise, but they within the towne so valiantlie behaued themselves, as well by countermines (whereby at length they entered into the kings mines) as by other waies of resistance, that by force of assaults it was not thought anie easie matter to win the same. It fortuned on a daie, that whilst there rose a contention betwixt two lords of the kings host, who should haue the hono: to go first into the mine, to incounter with the Frenchmen, that now had brought their mine through into the English mines, and made barriers betwixt, that they might safelie come and fight with the Englishmen: the king (to auoid the strife) entered the mine himselfe first of all other, and by chance came to fight hand to hand with the lord Barbafon, who was likewise entered the mine before all other of them within the towne.

After they had fought a good season together, at length they agreed to discover either to other their names; so as the lord Barbafon, first declaring what he was, the king likewise told him, that he was the king of England. Whereupon, Barbafon perceiving with whome he had fought, caused the barriers forthwith to be closed, and withdrew into the citie, and the king returned backe to his campe. At length, vittels within the towne began to faile, and the patience began to wax hot, so that the lord Barbafon began to treat; and in conclusion, about the middes of Nouember (as Fabian saith) the towne was yielded vpon certeine conditions, wherof one was, that all that were consenting to the death of the duke of Burgognie, should be deliuered to the king of England, of whome the lord Barbafon was suspected to be one. The king sent them vnder the conduct of his brother the duke of Clarence, to the citie of Paris, whereof the French king made him capteine, and so at his coming thither, he toke possession of the Bastill of S. Anthoine, the Loure, the house of Melun, and the place of Bois de Vincennes.

Monsieur de Barbafon was accused by the duke of Burgognie, and his sisters as guiltie to their fathers death; but he in open court defended himselfe as not guiltie of that crime, granting indeed and confessing, that he was one of the familiar seruants to the Dolphin, but that he was pynne or consenting to the death of the duke of Burgognie, he vtterlie denied. Whereupon he was not condemned, neither yet acquitted, by reason of such presumptions and conjectures as were alledged and brought against him, so that he remained in prison at Paris and else where, the space of nine yeares, till at length, being brought vnto castell Galliard, it chanced that the same castell was twome by those of the Dolphins part, and he being as then prisoner there, escaped out of danger, and so by that means was set at libertie, as after shall appeare.

Some write, that he had bene put to death, if he had not appealed from king Henries sentence, vnto the iudgement of the officers at armes; alledging, that by the lawe of armes, no man hauing his brother in armes within his danger, afterwards ought to put him to death for any cause or quarrell. And that he was the kings brother in armes he proued it, for that he had fought with him hand to hand within the mines (as before ye haue heard) which combat was thought of equall force by the heralds, as if he had fought with the king bodie to bodie, within solemn lists. The credit of this matter we leaue to the consideration of the readers. The earle of Huntingford was made capteine of Melun. In defense of this towne and castell, the French had gotten vnto them manie Scots. At the siege here the king kept with him yong James of Scotland, who sent to those Scots, that they should come out and yeld them to him, and not to stand in armes against their liege lord and king; but they gaue word backe againe, they could not take him for king, that was in the power of another, and so kept them in hold and in their armor still. King Henrie vpon winning of these forts, for their rebellion against their prince, which they would haue to be counted constancie, and for their contemptuous answer vnto him, thertie of the proudest, in example of the rest, caused he there to be hanged at once.

From thence the king departed with his armie vnto Corbeill, where the French king and the two queenes then sojourned; and after, both the kings, accompanied with the dukes of Bedford, Burgognie, Gloucester, and Excester, and the earls of Warwick and Salisburie, with a great number of noble men and knights, set forth towards Paris, whome the citizens in good order met without the gates, and the cleargie also with solemne procession. All the streets were hang'd with rich clothes, the two kings rode together (the king of England giuing the upper hand to his father in law) through the great citie of Paris, to our ladie church, where after they had said their deuotions, they departed vnto their lodgings; the French king to the house of S. Paule, and the king of England to the castell of Louer.

The duches
his appeale.

The next daie, the two queenes made their entrie and were receiued with like solemnities, as their husbands were the day before. During all the season that these two kings late in Paris, there was a great assemble called, as well of the spiritualtie, as of the nobles of the tempozaltie, in the which the kings sat as iudges, before whom the duches of Burgonie by his proctor, appealed the Dolphin, and seauen other, for the murder of duke John his husband. To the which appeale, the counsell of the other part made diuerse offers of amends, as well of foundati- ons of chantries for priests, to praise for the soule; as recompense of monie to the widows and children: for the finall determination whereof, the kings, to take further aduise and counsell therein, appointed another daie.

The oth of the three estates of France.

At this same time, the three estates of the realme of France assembled at Paris, and there euerie person seuerallie sware vpon the holie euangelists, to keepe, support, mainteine and defend the treatie and finall accoyd, which was concluded betwene the two kings, and the reto euerie noble man, spiritual gouernour and tempozall ruler, set to their seals, which instruments were sent to the kings treasure of his eschequer at Westminster safelie to be kept, where they yet remaine. The French king at the same time being in good and perfect state of health, openlie there in parlement declared, that peace was concluded, accorded, and made by his free assent, and with the aduise of all the counsell of France, and that he would for his owne part, and that his successors ought for their parts, obserue and keepe the same, with all the articles therein contained. And likewise, that all his subiects were bound for ever, to obserue and keepe the same, without breaking or doing anie thing preiudiciall therevnto.

King Henrie

salute.

During the time that the two kings thus sojour- ned in Paris, the French king kept a small port, be- rie fet, and those of the meaner sort resorting vnto his court: but the king of England kept such a so- lemne state, with so plentifull an house, and shewed himselfe so bountifull in gifts, and setting forth of warlike shewes and princelie pastimes, that all the noble men and other resorted to his palace, to see his estate, and to do him honoz. He took vpon him as re- gent of France, to redresse causes, remoue officers, reforme things that were amisse, and caused a new coine to be made, called a salute, wherein were the armes of France, and the armes of England and France quarterlie stamped. Also, to set all things in quiet, he constituted sir Gilbert Amfremile capteine of Melun, with a good number of valiant soldiers, to remaine there in garrison, and the earle of Hun- tington (whose germane to the king) was deputed capteine at Blois de Vincennes; and the duke of Ex- cester, with five hundred men of warre, was assigned to keepe Paris. Thus had king Henrie (when he was constituted gouernour of the land) the disposing of prouinces, towne, and castels at his pleasure; and the making of lawes and ordinances, standing with the drift of his policie to keepe both people in due obe- dience; as Anglorum praelia presicilie notet; saieni:

Relectorem patriam postquam rex Gallus & omnes

Unanimes proceres Henricum constituerunt; Plantageneta dabat princeps iam uera duabus Gentibus, effrantes ductu cobilibat habens.

The duke of Bantier about the same time, with the kings licence, departed into his countrie, both he and his retinue, receiuing large gifts of the kings great liberalitie, and amongst other things, the king gaue him a cup of gold, garnished and set with precious stones of great price and value. Moreover, he had a pension giuen him of a thousand markes by yeare, under the kings letters patents, to be had and recei- ued of the kings free and liberall grant, during the life of the said duke. A right roiall reward & worthie the maiestie of a king, bestowed vpon the said duke; and his retinue, partlie in respect of the alliance be- twixt the king and him (for he had married the kings sister) but speciallie for the notable seruice which they did him at the siege before Melun. So that hereby is commended vnto vs an example of gratitude and beneficence; teaching vs, that to such as haue bene god and gracious vnto vs, we should be alwaies for- ward with a right hand and readie mind to make a- mends in some proportion and measure.

When the king had thus ordered his businesse, he with the queene his wife, the princes, & nobles of the realme departed from Paris, the first of Januarie, and came to Rone, but first before his departing, he caused processe to be made and awarded forth a- gainst Charles the Dolphin, commanding him to ap- peare at the marble table at Paris; where for lacke of appearance, he was with all solemnitie in such case requisite, denounced guiltie of the murder and homicide of John duke of Burgonie, and by the sentence of parlement banished the realme: but the Dolphin withdrew into Languedoc, and after to Poitiers, getting to him such friends as he could; and namelie, he found the earle of Arminacke verie faithfull to him, not onelie aiding him with men, but also with his owne person he continuallie serued him against all his aduersaries.

The king of England comming to Rone, sojour- ned there a certeine time, and receiued the homage of all the nobles of Normandie, amongst whom, the earle of Stafford did homage for the countie of Berch, and Arthur of Britaine likewise for the coun- tie of Purie. He also ordeined his lieutenant gene- rall, both of France and Normandie, his brother Thomas duke of Clarence; and his depute in Nor- mandie was the earle of Salisburie. When the feast of Christmasse was passed, he departed from Rone, with the queene his wife, and by Amiens came to Calis, where he took ship the morow after Candle- masse daie, and landed at Douer, and came to Can- turburie, and from thence to Citham, and so through London to Westminster. I passe ouer to write what joy and triumph was shewed by the citizens of Lon- don, and of all other his subiects in euerie place where he came.

The king himselfe, to render vnto God his most humble & hartie thanks, caused solemne processions to be obserued and kept five daies together in euerie citie and towne. After that done, he made great purueiance for the coronation of his queene & spouse, the late ladie Katharine: which was done the daie of S. Mattheu, being the twentieth fourth of Febru- arie, with all such ceremonies and princelie solemn- tie as appertained. Which because it was full of total- tie and honour (the qualitie of the principall perso- nages requiring no lesse) and recorded by writers of former ages, it seemeth necessarie and convenient in this place to report it, in such sort as it is found at large in some, though others glancinglie passe by it, as a matter of no great obseruation. But it is worth the noting, to consider and take a view of the goodlie order to the new quene; of whome Anglorum praelia saith, More coronatur maiorum regia coniux, Ingemians rex o'vinat, reginaque vulgus, Altiſon ſuprema ferit clamoribus astra.

After the great ſolemnization at the foresaid coronation in the church of ſaint Peters at Weſtminſter was ended, the quene was conueied into the great hall of Weſtminſter, and there ſet to dinner. Upon whoſe right hand ſat at the end of the table the archbiſhop of Canturburie, & Henrie ſurnamed the Rich cardinal of Wincheſter. Upon the left hand of the quene ſat the king of Scots in his eſtate, who was ſerued with covered meſſe, as were the ſozenamed biſhops; but yet after them. Upon the ſame hand and ſide, nere the howds end, ſat the ducheſſe of Yorke and the counteſſe of Huntingdon.
The earle of March, holding a ſcepter in his hand, kneled upon the right ſide: the earle marſhall in like manner on the left of the quene. The counteſſe of Kent ſat under the table at the right foot, and the counteſſe marſhall at the left. The duke of Gloceſter ſir Humfrie was that daie ouerſeer, and ſtood before the quene bareheaded. Sir Richard Percill was that daie carrier to the quene, the earles brother of Suffolke cupbearer, ſir John Steward ſewar, the lord Clifford panſler in the earle of Marwickes ſtand, the lord Willoughbie butler in ſteed of the erle of Arundell, the lord Graie Kitchin or Kitchin nape-rer, the lord Audlete almoner in ſteed of the earle of Cambridge, the earle of Worceſter was that daie earle marſhall in the earle marſhalls abſence; who rode about the hall upon a great courſer with a multitude of tipped ſtaues about him, to make and keepe roume in the ſaid hall. Of the which hall the barons of the cinque ports began the table upon the right hand, toward ſaint Stephens chappell; and beneath them at the table ſat the bolochers of the chancerie.
Upon the left hand next to the cupbord ſat the maior and his brethren the aldermen of London. The biſhops began the table againſt the barons of the cinque ports; and the ladies againſt the maſor. Of which two tables, for the biſhops, began the biſhop of London and the biſhop of Durham; and for the ladies, the counteſſe of Stafford, and the counteſſe of March.

The feaſt was all of fiſh: for the ordering of the ſervice whereof were diuerſe lords appointed head officers, as ſteward, controller, ſurgeo, and other honourable officers. For the which were appointed the earles of Northumberland and Weſtmerland, the lord Fitz Hugh, the lord Furneſhall, the lord Graie of Wilton, the lord Ferres of Grobie, the lord Pol-nings, the lord Harrington, the lord Darcie, the lord Dacres, and the lord de la Wate. Theſe with others ordered the ſervice of the feaſt as followeth; and thus for the fiſt courſe. Brawn and muſtard, eſes in burneur, frument with balſen, pike in herbage, lampre powdered, trotot, cooling, plaice fried, inat-fine fried, creabs, lech lumbard flouriſhed, tartes; and a deuſe called a pellican, ſitting on his neſt with his birds, and an image of ſaint Katharine holding a booke, and diſputing with doctors. Holding this poeſie in his right hand, written in ſaite and legible letters, Madame le Roine; and the pellican anſwering, C'eſt la ſigne Cr. du roy, pour ſeul ſoy.
Et a tout ſa gent, elle metre ſa entent.

The ſecond courſe was: gellie coloured with columbine flowers, white porage or cream of almonds, breame of the ſea, conger, ſoles, chetien, bar-bill and coth, freſh ſalmon, halibut, gutnard, roſbet boiled, ſmelts fried, creuis or lobster, lech dainard, with the kings poeſie flouriſhed thereupon. Plus plus lampre freſh baked, ſampane flouriſhed with a ſcutcheon roſall, and therein three crownes of gold planted with flourdeluces and flour of camomill brought of confections: with a deuſe of a panther, and an image of ſaint Katharine with a whele in one hand, & a ſcroll with a poeſie in the other, to wit, La roynema ſile, in ceſſaile, Per bon reſoun, aies renoun.

The third courſe was, dates in compoſt, creamie moſle, carpe deore, turbut, tend, pearch with goton, freſh ſurgion with welks, porperous coſſed, mcnnes fried, creuiſſe de cau doure, prants, eſes roſſed with lampre, a lech called the white lech flouriſhed with hawthorne leaues & red hawes; a marchpane garniſhed with diuerſe figures of angels, among which was ſet an image of ſaint Katharine, holding this poeſie, Neſteſcrit, par voir & eir, Per mariage pure, ceſt guerre ne dure.

And laſtly a deuſe of a tiger looking in a mirroz, and a man ſitting on horſe-backe all armed, holding in his armes a tigers whelpe with this poeſie; Per ſorte ſans reſounie ay priſe ceſte beſt; and with his owne hand making a countenance of thowling of mirroz at the great tiger, which held this poeſie; Gile che mirroz ma ſiſſe deſſour. Thus with all honour was finiſhed the ſolemne coronation, after which the quene ſoiourned in the palace of Weſtminſter till Palmſun-daie following; and on the morow ſhe toke her iour-nie towards Windſor; where the king and ſhe held their Caſter.]

After the ſolemne feaſt of the coronation was ended, the king as well to viſit certeine places for deuotion by waie of pilgrimage, as alſo to ſee in what ſtate and order diuerſe parts of his realme ſtood, departed from the quene, appointing daie and place where ſhe ſhould meet him; and ſo iournied forth from place to place, thorough ſundry countreies, as well of Wales as England, and in euerie quarter where he came, he heard with diligent eare the complaints of ſutors, and toke order for the adminiſtration of juſtice both to high and low, cauſing manie mildemeanours to be reformed. At length he came to the towne of Leiceſter, where he found the quene according to the appointment before taken. Here at Leiceſter, he held the feaſt of Caſter. How then ſtandeth this with the report of Fabian, who ſaith, that the king and quene kept their Caſter at Windſor; and that when the ſaid feſtiual time was expired, the king made prouiſion for his warres in France, dering the tearme of Richard Whittinghams meraltie of London, which was in the eight yeare of this king Henries reigne: Suerlie there muſt needs be an errout, either in miſtaking the yeare or the place; or leſſe we will grant the king and quene (with their court of attendants) to haue bene hic ibi ſunt, which privilege is granted to none but Abiquaries.

But while theſe things were thus aduoying in England, the duke of Clarence, the kings lieutenant in France and Normandie, aſſembled together all the garrifons of Normandie, at the towne of Bernate, and from thence departed to the countrie of Maine, and at Pont le Gene he paſſed the river of Ronne, and rode through all the countrie to Lucie, where he paſſed the river of Loire and entered into Anjou, and came before the citie of Angiers, where he made manie knights, that is to ſaie, ſir William Bos, ſir Henrie Copoart, ſir Rowland Alder, ſir Thomas Beaufort, called the baſſard of Clarence and diuerſe other; and after that he had ſcattered, burnt, and ſpoiled the countrie, he returned with preie and pillage to the towne of Beaufort in the baillie, where he was aduerſified, that a great number of his enemies, Frenchmen, Scots, Spaniards, and other were aſſembled together, at a place called Aſſel Baugie, that is, Old Baugie, with the duke of Alenſon, calling

The duke of Clarence had a Lombard restoring unto him, retrained with the part aduerse (his name was Andreu Forzusa) of whom the duke inquired the number of his enemies, to whom he reported, that their number was but small, & not of puissance to match with halfe the power of his strong armie, intising him with assurance of victorie, to set on the Frenchmen. The duke like a couragious prince, assembled together all the horsemen of the armie, and left the archers vnder the guiding of the bastard of Clarence, and two Portingales, capitains of Frenchie vicount, saying, that he onlie and the nobles would haue the honor of that tourney. When the duke was passed a certeine streit and narrow passage, he espied his enemies ranged in good order of battell, by the monition of the Lombard, which had sold him to his enemies, & his aduerfaries had laid such ambushments at the streits, that the duke by no waie with out battell could either retire or flee.

The Englishmen seeing this, ballantlie set on their enemies, who were fourte to one, by reason whereof at length the Englishmen were oppressed with multitude, and brought to confusion. There were saine, the duke of Clarence, the earle of Tankerville, the lord Roos, sir Gilbert Amfrenle earle of Angus, and sir John Lomlie, sir Robert Merend, and almost two thousand Englishmen: & the earles of Summerfet, Suffolke, and Berch, the lord Fitz Water, sir John Berkelie, sir Rafe Penile, sir Henrie Inglis, sir William Bowes, sir William Longton, sir Thomas Worrough, and diuerse other taken prisoners. And of the Frenchmen were saine about twelue hundred of the best men of warre they had, so that they gained not much.

The bastard of Clarence which tarried at Beaufort, being informed of the great number of the Frenchmen, made forward with all the archers, to come to the succor of the duke, but they came too late. For the Frenchmen hearing of the approaching of the archers, fled with their prisoners, and left the bodie of the duke, and other the dead carcases behind them. The archers buried them all saving the dukes corpse, which with great solemnitie was sent to England, and buried at Canturburie beside his father. After this the Englishmen burnt and spoiled the countrie of spaine, and so returned to Alanson, and after departed euerie man to his garrison. This battell was fought on Easter euen, in the yeare 1421. But now to returne to the king.

After he had kept his Easter at Leicester, he with the gouerne removed and went northward, till they came to Poike, where they were receiued with great toy of the citizens, and other the nobles and gentlemen of the countrie. The king went vnto Beuerlie, to visit the shrine of saint John, and (stinted at) by on his departure from thence, the sorrowfull newes of his brother the duke of Clarences death, came to him, for which he was right penfise. But with mourning would not auaille, he called to remembrance what he had to doe, and thereupon without delay, sent Edmund earle of Mortaigne, brother to the earle of Summerfet into Normandie, giuing to him like authority and prehemience, as his brother the late deceased duke of Clarence had before enioied.

The earle of Mortaigne was lieutenant of Normandie.

A parliament.

After this, he called his high court of parliament, in the which he declared with such great wisdom & grauitie, the aas which had bene done in France, the state of the time present, and what was necessarie to be provided for the time to come (if they would looke to haue that wel and high kingdome, for the which they had so long laboured and sought) that the communalitie gladly granted a fifteenth, & the clergie benenolentlie offered a double disme. And because no delate should be in the kings affaires for lacke of paiement, the bishop of Winchester the kings uncle lent vnto him twentie thousand pounds, to be paid him againe of the same dismes. When all things necessarie for this tourney were ready and prepared, he sent his brother the duke of Bedford before him to Calis with all his armie, being (as some write) foure thousand men of armes, and twentie thousand archers and others, though some haue written, that the whole armie passed not twelue thousand of ony and other.

The king himselfe shortly after, about the middle of Aprill, passed the seas to Calis, and so from thence he marched through the countrie vnto Boies de Winrennes, where the French king and the gouerne then sojourned. The duke of Burgognie also that had receiued him at Pontreuell, attended him to Douai in Pontreuel, and there hauing taken leaue of him for six daies, returned now againe to him, according to his promise. Then did they consult together about their affaires, and appointed in all hast to fight with the Dolphin, and to raise the siege of Chartres which he had there planted. Hereupon, the king of England with all his puissance, came to the towne of Pante, and thither repaired the duke of Burgognie, but yer they departed from thence, they had knowledge, that the Dolphin hearing of the puissant armie of the king of England approaching towards him, was recoiled with his people towards Towlers in Touraine.

Hereupon the king of England incontinentlie, did not onlie send backe the duke of Burgognie into Picardie, to resist the attempts of sir Jacques de Harecourt, which made war in that countrie for the Dolphin, but also appointed the king of Scots, with the duke of Gloucester, to besiege the towne of Drem. They continuing thither about the eighteenth of Iulie, planted siege on euerie side, both of the towne and castell, and that with power of battie, and other forcible meanes, so constrained them within, that on the eight date of August they compounded, that if no sufficient rescue came to raise the siege, before the end of twelue daies next ensuing, both the towne and castell should be deliuered to the king of Englands vse, so as the soldiers might depart with their goods whither they would, except one Englishman, which was knownen to be amongst them, being fled for treason out of the kings dominions.

On the thirtieth date of August, which was the day of the appointment, the king of Scots receiued the towne and castell to the behoofe of his soueraigne lord the king of England, who during all the time of the siege late at Mortuall. The townsmen that would remaine still in their houses, were faine to be true subiects to the king; and the other which refused, departed with the soldiers. The Englishman that was excepted, was deliuered according to the covenants; and after executed, as he had deserved. The earle of Gloucester was made capitaine of Drem, and sir Henrie Mortimer balliue there. This done, the king hearing that the Dolphin should be at Wangencie, assembling his power, hastied thitherwards: but at his coming into those parties, he found no appearance of enemies in the field, and so he remained there fiftene daies.

In which meane while, the earle of Suffolke was sent forth to discover the countrie, and the king went by assault the towne of Wangencie, and after when hisseles began to faile, he marched forward, meaning to pursue the Dolphin. But the Dolphin doubting the English puissance, conueied all the vittels forth of those quarters, and retired himselfe to Wargies in Berrie, choosing that place as his first refuge, & therefoze determined there to remaine, till fortune turning ning his whele, should looke on them with a moze fauorable countenance, herof in scoyne was he com-monlie called king of Berrie. The king of England followed, till vittels and forage began fore to faile on all sides, and then returning, passed towards Dyleance, taking the castell of Rouge Spont by assault.

He staied three daies before Dyleance, and from thence, for want of vittels, marched through Calnois, till he came to Wignie sur Ponne, where he remained for a season, to restreth his people that were fore trauelled, in that painefull passed iournie: in which the king lost not onelie manie of his men for lacke of vittels, but also a great number of horses and carriages. Some haue witten, that about the same time, he should win the citie of Sens, othe-wise called the kings new towne by surrender; but after he had remained for a time at Wignie, we find that he remoued to Paris, where he was honorable receiued. For he came among them as one having empire and dominion in his hand, so that to him they were no lesse forward in submission for feare of his indignation, than readie to giue him all the intertainment that they could deuise for the keeping of his fauour: the lacke whereof they knew stood with the hazard of their safetie, as the contrarie tended to their wellfare.

Shortly after, considering with himselfe that the towne of Meaur in Brit, being replenished with e-nimies, was not to be suffered to remaine in that state, in the middes of his new gotten subjects; he determined to take awaie the open scruple that might poison and infect the members, dwelling hard by:
wherefore with a great number of earles and barons in his companie, he came to besiege it. This towne was no lesse well vittelled than manned, and no better manned than fortified; so that the king could neither haue it to him deliuered at his pleasure, nor gaine it by assault, without the great losse of his people: yet neuertheless, he determined not to depart, till he had got it by one meane or other. The river of Spaine diuided this towne into two parts, so that there was no enterie from the one into the other, but by a bridge, raised by, and made ouer the river, sustained with manie arches. The one part is called the ci-tie, and the other la March, being the strongest and best fortified. The king first lodged a mile off in a castell, and sent the duke of Excester to begin the siege, which he did, according to his instructions, vpon the first of October.

Shortly after, the king himselfe came, and lodged in the abbey of Baron, the duke of Excester in the abbey de Chage, the earle of March at the greie friers, and the earle of Warwick directed against that part that is called la March. They within defended themselves right balliantlie, so that the Englishmen were not all at their ease, but specialie through lacke of vittels manie died, and manie fell sicke, by reason whereof, no small number returned home into England; where in the meane time, on the first of December, a parlement was called and holden at Westminster, by the duke of Bedford, gouernour of the realme in the kings absence. In this parlement, a sixteenth was granted to the king towards the maintenance of the warres, the one moiety to be paid at Candlemasse, and the other at Martinmasse, of such monie as at the time of the grant was current.

This yeare at Windsoze on the daie of saint Micholas in December, the queene was deliuered of a sonne named Henrie, whose godfathers were John duke of Bedford, and Henrie bishop of Winchester, and Jaquet, (as the Frenchmen called him) Jaqueline of Bauier, countesse of Holland was his godmother. The king being certified hereof, as he late at siege before Meaur, gaue God thanks, in that it had pleased his diuine prouidence to send him a sonne, which might succeed in his crowne and scepter. But when he heard reported the place of his natiuitie; where it that he warned by some prophesie, or had some foreknowledge, or else iudged himselfe of his sonnes fortune, he said vnto the lord Fitz Hugh his trustie chamberleine these wordes: My lord, I Henrie bozne at Spommouth, shall small time reigne, & much get;

and Henrie bozne at Windsoze, shall long reigne, and all lose: but as God will, so be it.

The king held his Christmasse at the siege before Meaur, for he would not giue ouer that siege, although his armie was greatlie diminished, by reason of lacke of vittels, extreame cold, foule weather, and other discommodities that bled great store of diseases and sickenesse among his people; notwithstanding, all the helps and means that might be, he deuised to remedie the same: so that besides such as died, as well of sickenesse as by the enimies hand, manie returned home into their countries. But yet he ceased not to continue the siege, beating the walles with his ordinance, and casting downe bulwokes and rampiers on eche side the towne, made approches as well by water as land, with mightie engines deuised of woodes to defend the Englishmen, as they ap-proched the walles, and gaue assaults. The walles also were in diuerse places undermined.

After this, the Englishmen found meanes, by bridges made of boats, to passe the riuier; but yet the souldiers and other within defended their rampiers and breaches most stoutlie, and with guns and quarrels still shot at the Englishmen, of whom they due manie, and among other the earle of Worcester was slaine, with a bullet of the great artillerie, & the lord Clifford with a quarrell of a crossebow; yet the Englishmen still won ground, and got nearer and nearer to the walles. They also toone the chiefest part of a bridge from the enimies, and kept watch and ward vpon and about the same. The earle of Warwick had also taken a tannure from them of the market place, built on the southside thereof, able to receiue and lodge a good number of men, which seruing to good purpose, for the better brideling of them within, he caused to be kept, and thus were they within Me-aur soze oppressed on euerie side.

Wherevpon in Februarie, the capteins doubting least the citie could not be defended long, caused all the vittels and goods to be conuected into the market place, and retired all the men of warre into the same, leauing none in the other part of the citie, but the commons, and such as were not able to do any anailable seruice in the warre. The king aduertised hereof, commanded in all hast to assault the citie, which was quicklie done; so that the citie by fine force was within three houres taken and spoiled; and the same daie the market place besieged round about, and a mill toone adjoining vnto the same. In April, the queene passed ouer into France, with a saire retinue of men, vnder the conduct of the duke of Bedford, the duke of Gloucester remaining lord gouernour of the realme in his place. At his com-ming thither, he was so welcommed and honozable receiued, first of his husband, and after of his father and mother, that she appeared to be no lesse loued of his noble husband, than of his deere and naturall parents.

Whilist the siege still continued before Meaur, Oliver Spennie a valiant man of warre of the Wolphins part (which before was capteine of Saleise, and pelding it, swate neuer to beare armour against the king of England) assembled a great number of men of warre, as well Brittaines as Frenchmen, that is lord of Chatelgiron, the lord Tintignace, the lord de la Housaie, and diuerse other, which entered into the countrie of Constantine in Normandie, and robbed and killed the Englishmen, where they might either espie or take them at their due aduantage. But the earle of Suffolke keeper of the marches, hearing of their doings, sent for the lord Scales, sir John Aston bailiffe of Constantine, sir William Hall, sir John Banaster, and many other, out of the garrisons within that territorie, the which encountered with their enemies at a place called Le parke leuesque, in English, The bishops parke.

A foze coñflict.

There was a foze fight and a long bettwit them, but finally, the Frenchmen were put to flight, so that in the conflict and chase were slain, the lord of Coinon, the lord of Chatelgiron, and three hundred other: and there were taken prisoners, the lord de la Housaie, and sir Oliver Hannie, with threescore others. The king pardoned sir Oliver Hannie his life, though he ill deserued so great a benefit, for that he had broken his oth and promise, but he was sent into England, there to learne to speake English, and so being brought to London, shortly after died, being as then a verie aged man, & was buried in the white friers. ¶ But here note (by the waie) the rotall hart of this king, who as he tempered all his actions with singular circumspection; so with a pitifull mind he pondered the miserie of his enemies; so that when he might (iure belli, by the law of armes) haue spoiled them of goods and life, he diuerse times spared both; with clemencie commonlie making conquest of them, who seemed by open hostilitie scarce conquerable.

Abr. Fl.

The king lying still before the market place at Meaux in Brie (as ye haue heard) foze beat the walls with his ordinance, and cast downe bulwokes and rampiers on euerie side the towne, so that he had made an open breach for his people to enter. Whereof the lord of Offemont being aduertised, with a companie of chosen persons sent by the Dolphin, assailed in the night season to enter the towne, to the succours of them within. But though diuerse of his people got ouer the walles, by helpe of ladders which they had set by; yet such was his chance, that as he passed a plank, to haue come to the walles, he fell into a deepe ditch; and in the meane time, the Englishmen perceiuing by the noise what the matter meant, came running to the ditch, toke the lord of Offemont, and slue diuerse of his companie that stood in defense.

The capitaine within, perceiuing in what case they stood, by reason their succours were thus intercepted, and doubting to be taken by assault, for that they wanted munition and weapon, began to treat with the king of England, who appointed the earle of Warwick, and the lord Hungerford, to commune with them; and in conclusion an accord was taken, and so the towne and market place with all the goods were deliuered into the king of Englands hands, the tenth daie of Maie, in the yeare 1422. The appointment taken with them of this towne was this, that they should yeld themselves simplie vnto the kings pleasure, their liues onlie saued: and hereby on manie of them were sent ouer into England, amongst whome was the bishop of that towne, which shortly after his arriual here fell sicke and died.

There were also foure persons excepted, againstt whome the king might by order of law and iustice proceed as he saw cause, for their faults and trespasses committed. As first, the capitaine of the towne, named the bassard of Claurcu, the which had done manie greuous oppressions to the people of the countrie thereabouts, in spoiling them of their goods and ransoming them at his pleasure. He had also put diuerse to death most cruellie, when they were not able to pae such finance and ransomes as he demanded. Whereupon, being now put to death himselfe, his bodie was hanged vpon a tree that stood on an hill without the towne, on the which he had caused both husbandmen and townesmen, with other prisoners, to be hanged before time. His standard also, which was wont to be borne before him in battell, was set vp in the same tree. The bailiffe also of the towne, and two of the chiefe burgesses that had bene of counsell with him in his vnlawfull doings, were likewise executed. Also beside these, there were found in this towne diuerse that were accused to be guiltie of the duke of Burgognies death, wherefore they were put to their triall, in the parlement at Paris, and some of them being found guiltie, were executed.

When the deliuerie of the strong towne of Meaux was published thorough out the countrie, all the townes and fortresses in the Ile of France, in Lannois, in Brie, & in Champaigne, yelded themselves to the king of England, which appointed in the same valiant captaine, and hardie soldiers. After that he had thus got possession of Meaux, and the other fortresses, he returned againe to Bois de Vincennes, and being there receiued of the king and queene of France, and of the queene his wife the thirtieth daie of Maie, being Whitson euen, they remoued all together vnto Paris, where the king of England lodged in the castell of Loure, and the French king in the house of saint Paule. These two kings kept great estate with their queenes, at this high feast of Pentecost, but the king of Englands court greatly erred, so that all the resort was thither. The Parisiens that beheld his princelie port & high magnificence, iudged him rather an emperour than a king, and their owne king to be in respect of him like a duke or marquisse.

The Dolphin hauing knowledge by espials where the king of England and his power laie, came with all his puissance ouer the riuer of Loire, and besieged Colneie, a towne situate vpon that riuer, a six score miles distant from Paris, and appointed part of his armie to waste and destroye the confines of the duchie of Burgognie, to the intent to diuide the power of the king of England, from the strength of the duke of Burgognie, supposing (as it came to passe indeed) that the duke would make haie towards Burgognie, to defend his owne lands. In the meane time, they within Colneie were so hard handled, that they promised to render their towne to the Dolphin, if they were not rescued by the king of England within ten daies. King Henrie hearing these newes would not send aie one creature, but determined to go himselfe to the raising of that siege, and so with all diligence came to the towne of Corbeil, and so to Senlis, where (whether it were with heat of the aie, or that he with his daile labour were feebled or weakened) he began to waie sicke, yea and so sicke, that he was constrained to farrie, and send his brother the duke of Bedford to rescue them of Colneie, which he did to his high honor. For the Dolphin hearing that the duke of Bedford was coming to raise his siege departed thence into Berry, to his great dishonor, and lesse gaine.

About the same time, the duke of Britaine sent his chancelor the bishop of Gaunts, with the bishop ofannes, and others of his counsell, as ambassadors from him vnto king Henrie, with full commission, to ratifie and allow for him and his people the peace concluded at Troies: but by reason of the kings greuous sicknesse, nothing was then done in that matter. After the lesse, the duke himselfe in person came afterwards to Amiens, and there performed that which he had appointed his ambassadors at this time, in his name, to haue done and accomplished.

thed. In the meane season, king Henrie waxed sicker and sicker, and so in an hozelitter was conveyed to Bois de Wincesnes, to whome hostlie after repared the dukes of Bedford and Gloucester, & the earles of Salisburie and Warwicke, whome the king lounglie welcomed, and seemed glad of their pefence.

Now, when he saw them penfise for his sickness, and great danger of life wherein he presentlie laie, he with manie graue, courteous, and pitie words, recomforted them the best he could, and therewith exhorted them to be trustie and faithfull unto his sonne, and to see that he might be well and vertuouslie brought up. And as concerning the rule and governance of his realms, during the minoritye and yong yeares of his said sonne, he willed them to goine together in frendlie love and concord, keeping continuall peace and amitie with the duke of Burgogonie, and never to make treatie with Charles that called himselfe Dolphyn of Wience, by the which any part either of the crowne of France, or of the duches of Foumandie and Guisen may be lessened or diminished; and further, that the duke of Orleans, and the other princes should still remaine prisoners, till his sonne came to lawfull age, least returning home againe, they might kindle more fire in one daie than might be quenched in thre.

He further advised them, that if they thought it necessarie, that it should be god to haue his brother Humfrie duke of Gloucester to be protectour of England, during the monage of his sonne, and his brother the duke of Bedford, with the helpe of the duke of Burgogonie to rule and to be regent of France, commanding him with fire and sword to persecute the Dolphin, till he had either brought him to reason and obedience, or else to drive and expell him out of the realme of France. And here with he protested unto them, that neither the ambitious desire to enlarge his dominions, neither to purchase baine renowne and worlde fame, nor any other consideration had moued him to take the warres in hand; but onelie that in prosecuting his iust title, he might in the end attaine to a perfect peace, and come to enioie those pieces of his inheritance, which to him of right belonged: and that before the beginning of the same warres, he was fallie persuaded by men both wise and of great holinesse of life, that vpon such intent he might and ought both begin the same warres, and follow them, till he had brought them to an end iustlie and rightlie, and that without all danger of Gods displeasure or perill of soule.

The noble men present, promised to obserue his precepts, and to performe his desires; but their hearts were so penfise, and replenished with sorrow, that one could not for weeping behold an other. Then he said the seauen psalmes, and receiued the sacrament, and in saying the psalmes of the passion ended his daies here in this world, at Bois saint Vincent, the last of August, in the yeare a thousand four hundred twentie and two. This Henrie was a king, of life without spot, a prince whome all men loved, and of none disdained, a captaine against whome fortune never frowned, nor mischance once frowned, whose people him so feared, a iusticer both loued and obeyed (and so humane) that he left no offence imputed, nor frendship unrewarded; a ferret to rebels, and suppressor of sedition, his vertues notable, his qualities most praiseworthy.

In strength and nimblenesse of bodye from his youth set to him comparable, for in travelling, leaping, and running, no man well able to compare. In raising of great iron barres and heauie stones he excelled consummation all men, neuer shrinking at cold, nor lothfull for heat; and when he most laboured, his head commonlie vncovered; no more wearie of harnesse than a light cloake, herie balliantlie abiding at needs both hunger and thirst; so manfull of mind as neuer seene to quinch at a wound, or to smart at the paine; not to turne his nose from euill saour, nor close his eyes from smoke or dust; no man more moderate in eating and drinking, with diet not delicate, but rather more meet for men of warre, than for princes or tender stomachs. Curie honest person was permitted to come to him, sitting at meale, where either secretlie or openlie to declare his mind.

High and weightie causes as well betwene men of warre and other he would gladielie heare, and either determined them himselfe, or else for end committed them to others. He slept verie little, but that verie soundlie, in so much that when his soldiers song at nights, or minstrels plaid, he then slept fastest; of courage inuincible, of purpose immutable, so wise hardie alwaies, as feare was banished from him; at euerie alarm he first in armoz, and foremost in ordering. In time of warre such was his prouidence, bountie and hap, as he had true intelligence, not one-lie what his enemies did, but what they said and intended: of his deuises and purposes few, before the thing was at the point to be done, should be made puiue.

He had such knowledge in ordering and guiding an armie, with such a gift to encourage his people, that the Frenchmen had constant opinion he could never be vanquished in battell. Such wit, such prou-idence, and such policie withall, that he neuer enter-prised any thing, before he had fullie debated and forecast all the maine chances that might happen, which done with all diligence and courage he set his purpose forwarde. What policie he had in finding present remedies for sudden mischances, and what engines in sauing himselfe and his people in sharpe distresses; were it not that by his acts they did plainlie appeare, hard were it by words to make them credible. Mar-tonnesse of life and thirst in auarice had he quite quenched in him; vertues in deed in such an estate of souereigntie, youth, and power, as verie rare, so right commendable in the highest degree. So staied of mind and countenance beside, that neuer iolie or triumphant for victorie, nor sad or damped for losse or misfortune. For bountifullnesse and liberalitie, no man more free, gentle, and franke, in bestowing rewards to all persons, according to their deserts: for his saying was, that he neuer desired monie to keepe, but to giue and spend.

Although that his properlie serues not for theme of praise or dispraise, yet what in breuitie may well be remembred, in truth would not be forgotten by both, were it but onelie to remaine as a spectacle for magnimitie to haue alwaies in reie, and for incouragement to nobles in honourable enterprises. Knowne he it therefore, of person and forme was this prince rightlie representing his herocall affects, of stature and proportion tall and manlie, rather leane than grosse, somewhat long necked and blacke haired, of countenance amiable, eloquent and graue was his speech, and of great grace and power to persuade; for conclusion, a matellie was he that both liued & died a paterne in princehood, a lode-starre in honour, and interour of magnificence: the more highlie exalted in his life, the more deeplie lamented at his death, and famous to the world alwaie. Peter Basset (a chefe man in his chamber) affirmed that he deceased of a pleurisie, though the Scots and French set it downe to be of saint seacres disease, that they saie was a polle with a crampe, which Enguerant reports to be saint Anthonies fire, but neither of them trulie.
Anglorum praeis saith, that it was a sharpe fever, which happening vnto him (wearied with the broiles of warre) in a verie vnseasonable time of the yeare, namelie the dogdaies, tormented him the sozer, and greto to be not onelie dangerous, but also desperat; for: it left him not till life was extingwished: the poets report is, as followeth:

His bodie imbalmed and closed in lead, was laid in a chariot colall, richlie appavelled with cloth of gold.
Upon his coffin was laid a representation of his person, adorned with robes, diadem, scepter, & ball, like a king; the which chariot, six horses drew richlie trapped, with severall appointments; the first with the armes of S. George, the second with the armes of Normandie, the third of king Arthur, the fourth of saint Edward, the fifth of France, and the sixth with the armes of England and France. On this same chariot gave attendance James II. of Scots, the principall mourner, king Henries uncle Thomas duke of Excester, Richard earle of Marleshe, the earle of March Edmund, the earle of Stafford Humfrie, the earle of Powysaigne Edmund Beaufort, the lord Fitz Hugh Henrie, the lord Hungerford Walter, sir Robert Robert lord Bourchier, sir John Cornwall lord Fanhope, and the lord Crum-well were the other mourners. The lord Louell, the lord Audelite, the lord Pozele, the lord Solow bare the banners of saints and annuities, as then they were called; the baron of Wodele bare the standard, and the earle of Longwile the banner. The hatchments were carried onelie by capteins to the number of twelue; and round about the chariot rode five hundred men of armes all in blacke armour, their hosses barbed blacke, and they with the but ends of their speares upwarde.

Lord Crum-
well.

The conduct of this dolorous funerall was committed to sir William Philip, treasurer of the kings houshold, and to sir William Porter, his chiefe caruer, and others. Beside this, on euery side of the chariot went three hundred persons, holding long torches, & lords bearing banners, banners, and pennons.
With this funerall appointment was he conueied from Bois de Vincennes, to Paris, and so to Rome, to Abail, to Catis, to Douer, from thence thorough London to Westminster; where he was interred with such solenne ceremonies; with singing of lords, prayer of priests, and such lamentation of commons, as neuer before then the like was done in England.
Shortlie after this solenne buriall, his bodyfull quene returned into England, and kept his estate with the young king his sonne.

This ended this painfull pynches most noble and fortunate reign, whose life (saith Hall) though cruel Atropos abbreviated; yet neither fate, malice, nor stretching time shall apall his honoure, nor blot out the glozie of him that in so small time had done so ma-nys and colall acts. [In this yeare, the drie and twentith of October deceased the gentle and welbelovd Charles French king the first of that name, who was buried at S. Denis.] And that befellene the death of these two kings, namelie the one of England, the other of France, there was no great space of time; for Charles departed in October, and Henrie in No-uember; by the pynction of whose lites, which of the two realmes remained the greater losse, it is a question not to be discussed: Certaine it is that they were both soveraigns tenderlie loved of their subjects, as they were princes greatlie fauouring their people. Fi-nallie, in memorie of this Henrie the fift, a king of a colall hart, and vertue was adorned with imperiall vertues, I find so fit a report concerning in truth both his properties and disposition, that I thinke it verie conuenient here to be inserted in place of an epilogue.

Henricus illustris propeperans mors occupat artus,

Ille sua patria decus immortale per aemum Penturum; virtutis & indelebile lumen, Celfo animi prorsus, leni quoque pectore cines Non solui, at iustos hostes fideique probata Dilexit; inuicem raro iracundior ore.

Of learned men and writers, these I find remembered by Bale and others, to haue liued in the daies of this noble and valiant king Henrie the fift. First, Alaine de Lin, bozne in Lin, and professed a Carmelite frater in that towne, he at length became prior of that conuent, proceeded doctor of diuinitie in Cambridge, and wrote manie treatises; Thomas Otterbozne that wrote an hystorie of England, is thought to liue about this season, he was a Franciscan or grate frater, as they called them, a great student both in diuinitie and philosophie; John Seguard an excellent poet, and arhetorician, kept a schole, and read to his scholars in Norwich, as is supposed, writing sundry treatises, reprobating as well the profaning of the christian religion in monks and priests, as the abuse of poeetrie in those that take upon them to write filthie verses and rimes; Robert Rose a frater of the Carmelites order in Norwich commonlie called the white fraters, both an excellent philosopher, and diuine, proceeded doctor at Orenford, promoted to be prior of his house, and writing diuerse treatises; amongst all the sophists of his time (as saith Bale) he offended none of the Wickheleffs, who in that season set forth purelie the word of God, as maie appeare by his woorkes.

Moreover, John Lucke, a doctor of diuinitie in Orenford, a frater infinite to the Wickheleffs; Richard Cassiter bozne in Norfolk, vicar of saint Stephens in Norwich, a man of great holinesse and puritie in life, fauouring (though secretly) the doctrine of the Wickheleffs, and reprobating in his sermons, the vn-chast manners and filthie example that appeared in the cleargie. Of sir John Oldcastle lord Cobham ye haue heard before; William Waller a blacke frater in Lin, and prouinciall of his order here in England, made a booke of moralisations upon Ouids Metamorphoses, comparable to possils upon Aescops Fables; Richard Sneytham, a student in Orenford, where he professed to greaue in learning and wis-dome, that he was accounted the chiefe in all that belonged to the study thereof he was made chancellor of the same, chosen also to be one of the twelue to examine and iudge upon Wickheleffs doctrine by the archbishop of Cantuarburie; John Langdene a monke of Chiches church in Cantuarburie, an other of those twelue; William Caillo, a priest, and a master of art in Orenford, a stedfast follower of Wickeleffs doctrine; burnt for the same in Smithfield at London, the second day of March, in the yeare of our Lord 1422; & last of king Henrie the fift his reign.

Furthermore, Richard Cradale student in Oren-ford, one of those twelue also; William Lindwood a lawyer excellentlie learned, as well in the ciuill as canon lawes, advanced to the seruice of this king, and made by him keeper of the priue seale, sent in ambassage both to the kings of Spaine and Portingale; Abbot Bullenell of most weightie importance. It is said that he was promoted to the bishop-ricke of saint Wand; Bartholomew Florentius, supposed (as Bale saith) by Nicholas Bingham, to be an Englishman; wrote a treatise called Florarium, whereof he took his surname; and also an other treatise of abundance, in which he reprobeth certayne corrupt manners in the cleargie; and the profession of friars mendicants; Adam Bismelington, a Carmelite frater, studied both in Orenford and Paris; William Watercombe is placed by Bale about the same of other learned men that liued in this kings time, he was an excellent mathematician, as by the the title of his works which he wrote it should appear.

Titus Lilius de Foro Luuifiis liued also in these daies, an Italian bozne: but sith he was both resiant here, and wrote the life of this king, I haue thought good to place him among other of our English writers. One there was that translated the said historie into English, adding (as it were) by waie of notes in manie places of that booke) sundrie things for the more large vnderstanding of the historie: a copie thereof I haue sene belonging to John Stow citizen of London. There was also about the same time an other writer, who (as I remember) hath followed the said Lilius in the order of his booke, as it were chapter for chapter, onelie changing a god, familiar and easie stile, which the said Lilius vsed, into a certaine poeticall kind of writing: a copie thereof I haue sene (& in the life of this king partlie followed) belonging to master John Twine of Kent, who (as I was informed) meant to leaue to posteritie some fruits of his labours for the due vnderstanding thereof.

Thus farre Henrie the fift sonne and successor to Henrie the fourth.

Henrie the sixt, sonne and heire to Henrie the fift.

1422

Buchan. lib. 10.

After that death had be-rest the world of that noble prince king Henrie the fift, his onelie sonne prince Henrie, being of the age of nine moneths, or thereabouts, with the sound of trumpets was openlie proclaimed king of England and France the thirtieth daie of August, by the name of Henrie the sixt; in the yeare of the world five thousand three hundred, eighty and nine, after the birth of our Sa-uiour 1422, about the twelue yeare of the emperor Frederike the third, the fortieth and two and last of Charles the first, and the third yeare of Goddaks regiment (after his father Robert) gouernour of Scotland. The custodie of this yong prince was appointed to Thomas duke of Excester, & to Henrie Beauford bishop of Winchester. The duke of Bedford was deputed regent of France, and the duke of Gloucester was ordeined protectour of England; who taking vpon him that office, called to him wise and graue counsellors, by whose aduise he provided and toke order as well for the good gouernment of the realme & subiects of the same at home, as also for the maintenance of the warres abroad, and further conuenience to be made in France, appointing valiant and expert captains, which should be readie, when need required. Besides this, he gathered great summes of monie to mainteine men of warre, and left nothing forgotten that might aduance the good estate of the realme.

While these things were a doing in England, the duke of Bedford regent of France studied most car-nestlie, not onelie, to keepe and well gouerne the countries by king Henrie late conquered; but also determined not to leaue off warre & trauell, till Charles the Dolphin (which was now called, because king Charles his father in the moneth of October in this present yeare was departed to God) should either be subdued, or brought to obedience. And suerlie the death of this king Charles caused alterations in France. For a great manie of the nobilitie, which before, either for feare of the English puissance, or for the loue of this king Charles (whose authoritie they followed) held on the English part, did now reuolt to the Dolphin, with all indeuour to vsurpe the English nation out of the French territories. Whereunto they were the more earnestlie bent, and thought it a thing of greater facilitie, because of king Hencies yong yeares; whome (because he was a child) they esteemed not, but with one consent reuolted from their thowne fealtie: as the recorder of the Englishmens battels with forren nations herie aptlie doth note, saieing:

Hic Franci puerum regem neglectum habentes Desiscunt, violatque fidem gens perfida sacro Consilio ante datum.

The duke of Bedford being greatlie moued with these sudden changes, fortified his towncs both with garrisons of men, munition, and battels, assembled also a great armie of Englishmen and Normans, and so effectuonlie exhorted them to continue faith-swore to king Henrie fealtie and obedience, by whose example the commonaltie did the same. Thus the people quieted and the countrie established in order, nothing was minded but warre, and nothing spoken of but conquest.

sions of well doing, sent the lord Granville to the towne of Pont Moulan, standing on the river of Seine, who coming to the same upon the sudden, the fourteenth of Januarie, took it, and slew a great number of English souldiours, which he found within it.

Lord Granville falsified his oth.

When the duke of Bedford the regent, aduertised of this sudden surprize, appointed the lord Thomas Montacute earle of Salisbury (a man both for policie and courage, liker to the old Romans than to men of his daies) accompanied with the earle of Suffolke, the lord Sciles, the young lord Poinings, sir John Fastolfe maister of the household, with himselfe, and diuerse others, to besiege the said towne of Pont Moulan, which after two moneths siege was rendred to the said earle, and the lord Granville swore to be true to the king of England ever after that day: but shortly after, forgetting his oth, he turned French againe.

The earle of Salisbury appointed sir Henrie Portimer, and sir Richard Vernon, captains of the towne, and from thence went into Champaigne, and there besieged the towne of Sens, took it, and sir William Mar in the captaine within it, and slew all the souldiours that kept it, made captaine there sir Hugh Godding, & sir Richard Aubemond. ¶ In this season, Henrie duke of Gloucester, either striken in loue, or upon some other occasion, married the ladie Jaquet or Jaquelin, daughter and sole heiress to William of Barre duke of Holland, which was lawfull wife to John duke of Brabant then liuing, who afterwards (as after ye shall heare) recovered his out of the dukes hands.

The chances thus happening (as you before haue heard) John duke of Bedford, Phillip duke of Burgonie, and John duke of Britaine made a frendlie meeting in the citie of Amiens, where they renewed the old league and ancient amitie made betwene the noble prince king Henrie the sixt and them, adding thereto these conditions and agreements, each of them to be to the other friend and aidet; and the enemie of the one to be enemie to the other; and all they to be friends and aiders to the king of England, wellwiller to his wellwillers, and aduersarie to his aduersaries. And (because that affinitie is commonlie the bond of amitie) there was concluded a marriage betwene the duke of Bedford, and the ladie Anne sister to the duke of Burgonie, which was after solemnized at Troies in Champaigne, in the presence of the duke of Burgonie brother to the bride, and of his uncle the duke of Brabant, the earles of Salisbury and Suffolke, and of nine hundred lords, knights, and esquires, with such feast and triumph, as before that time had not bene seene of the Burgognions.

Whilist these matters were in hand, the Parisiens, thinking to blind the eyes of the duke of Bedford, wrote to him how diuerse castles and fortresses lieng about their territories, were replenished with their enemies, daily stopping their passages, and robbing their merchants, to their utter vndoeing, if they by his helpe were not relieved. But this was but a glose of the Parisiens, meaning to cause him to go about the winning of some strong hold, whilist they in his absence might bring into the citie Charles the Dolphin, that then called himselfe French king; for so had they appointed, assigning to him the date of his coming, and the post of his entrie. But their practice being discovered to the duke of Bedford, he with a great power entered into Paris, one day before the same was appointed, & two nights before he was looked for of his enemies being vnprouided, and suddenly caused the conspirators within the citie to be apprehended, and openlie to be put to execution.

This done, putting a mistrust in the Parisiens, he caused the castles and fortresses neare and adjoining to the citie, to be furnished with Englishmen. And to auoid all night-watchers about Paris, and the confines thereof, he first took into his possession either by assault or composition, the towne of Trainelle and Bzaie upon Seine. And because two castles, the one called Bacie, and the other Courlaie were also euill neighbors to the Parisiens, he sent sir John Fastolfe great maister of his household with a notable armie to win the same castles, which he did, and with preie and prisoners returned backe againe to his maister the regent.

In this verie season, the Dolphin sent the lord William Stewart earle of Buchquane that was constable of France, and the earle of Ventadour in Auvergne, and manie other noble men of his part, to late siege to the towne of Crauant in the countie of Auvergne, within the parts of Burgonie. Wherof hearing the lord regent, and the duke of Burgonie they assembled a great armie, and appointed the earle of Salisbury to haue the guiding thereof; who with his captains and men of warre, English and Burgognions, came in good arrate to giue battell to the besiegers. And because the river of Yonne, which runneth by the said towne, was betwene the English armie, and their aduersaries, they could not well assaile their enemies, which defended the bankes and passages verie stronglie: yet notwithstanding, both horsemen and footmen of the English part courageously put themselves into the river, and with fine force recovered the bankes, whome the Burgognions incontinentlie followed.

When they were all gotten into the plaine, the archers shot, the bill men strake, and long was the fight in doubtfull balance. But in conclusion the French men not able to resist the force of the English nation, were discomfited, slaine, and chased, leauing a glorious victorie to the Englishmen and Burgognions. There were slaine of the Frenchmen an eightene hundred knights and esquires, beside commons: of Scots were hand thre thousand. Amongest the Frenchmen these were chiefest that were slaine: the earle of Westmarche, the earle of Comignens, the earle of Commoite, the lord Coquart de Comeron, the baron of Arminake, the vicount of Touraine, the baron of Rozettes, the lord de Vost, and the lord Permozancie.

After this fortunate victorie was the earle of Salisbury made (by the lord regent) lieutenant and vicegerent for the king and the said lord regent in the countie of France, Brie, and Champaigne; and sir John Fastolfe was substituted deputie vnder the lord regent within the duchie of Normandie on this side the river of Seine; and withall he was also made gouernour of the countie of Andou and Maine. The earle of Salisbury after five moneths siege, won by surrender the towne and castell of Montaguillon in Brie, the capitaine thereof, the one named Regent of Cotine, and Guille Bourgois Britons, swore ne ner to beare armour against the Englishmen on this side the river of Loire. In the meane time of that siege, the earle of Suffolke took by force the castell of Coucie, and the strong castell of la Roch in Gasconnois he got by appointment.

In this second yeare of king Henrie the first, James (the first of that name & the hundred & second k. of Scotland, took to wife the ladie Jane, daughter to John earle of Summerfet deceased, and sister to John then duke of Summerfet, and also cosine germane remoued to king Henrie, and next to the duke of Winchester, and to the duke of Excester) was set at libertie, covenanting to paie a small portion of monie more than was allowed to him for his wiues marriage monie, and left hostages for the same. But before his departure out of the realme, he did his homage unto the yong king of England Henrie the first at the castell of Windsor, before thre dukes, two archbishops, twelue earles, ten bishops, twentie barons, and two hundred knights and esquires, beside others, in order of words according to the tenour hereafter following.

I James Steward, k. of Scots, shall be true and faithfull unto you lord Henrie by the grace of God king of England & France, the noble and superiour lord of the kingdome of Scotland; and to you I make my fidelitie for the same kingdome of Scotland, which I hold and claime of you; and I shall beare you my faith and fidelitie of life and lim, and worldlie honour against all men; and faithfullie I shall knowledg and shall doe you seruice due for the kingdome of Scotland aforesaid. So God helpe me, and these holie euangelists.

But notwithstanding this his oth, and the great bounteous liberalitie of the mother & vncles of his wife, in bestowing on him abundance of plate & treasure, with rich clothes of arras; he had not bene long at home, but that some out of France into Scotland ouer came there James Steward, who (after manie of the Scottish nobilitie by diuerse occasions in France consumed) grew to be capteine of the hostesmen there. With him came the archbishop of Remes with power and commission for concluding a league betweene France and Scotland, and also of a marriage betweene Letwes the Dolphin's sonne and Margaret Jameses daughter, though both verie yong. Which matters accordinglie accomplished, to France againe they got the m. So James became as firme French as any of his predecessours.]

But now to leaue the Scottish king amongst his countriemen in Scotland, and returne to the doings of England. I find that the duke of Glocester, being protector and gouernour of the realme, prepared an armie of ten thousand men, and sent them ouer to his brother the regent into France; who comming into the territorie of Paris, were tofullie of him received. About the same time the Frenchmen got by stealth diuerse towines out of the Englishmens hands, and amongst other the faire towne of Compiene was one, and the pretie towne of Crotole another. When the duke of Bedford was aduertised hereof, he determined not to let the matter passe in such sort, but with all convenient speed sent forth a force to recouer those towines againe. And first the earle of Suffolke with the earle of Lignie, and diuerse other capteins of the Englishmen went to besiege Compiene, and lodged on the one side of the river of Somme, as the lord Lisle Abham, sir Thomas Kampston, and the protonost of Paris late on the other side. The Frenchmen within the towne well furnished with good souldiers, munition, and vittels, couragiously defended themselves.

The Englishmen remembryng that Guiliam Remond, otherwisse called Mariolaine had ben the leader of the souldiers within the towne (which Mariolaine before at Paris was taken prisoner by sir John Falstolfe) caused him to be brought from Paris unto the campe, and set him in a chariot with an halter about his necke, and comitted him to the gibet without the towne, sending word to them within, that if they would not without delaie render the towne, their capteine should incontinentlie be strangled afore their faces. Which moued the souldiers so much, by reason of the loue they bare to their old capteine and gouernour, that for the deliuerance of him and partlie of themselves they yielded the towne, so that both he and they might depart with honoure and harnesse onelie in sure conduct and safetie. Yet per this towne of Compiene was deliuered, sir Philip Hall, which was sent to Crotole by the lord regent with eight hundred men to besiege it, got it suddenly by assault, for the Frenchmen had either disposed their garrison, or appointed their lodgings.

Compiene &
Crotole reco-

About the same time sir John de la Poole brother to the duke of Suffolke, being capteine of Auranthes in Normandie, assembled all the garrisons of the base marches of the countrie of Arrou, and came before the citie of Angiers, burnt the suburbs, spoiled and destroyed the whole countrie; and hauing as manie prisoners as his men might go awaie with, he was encountered by the earle of Aumarle, the viscount of Parbonne, and sir Housland Frenchmen; which finding the Englishmen out of arae, incumbrd with carriage of their great spoile, suddenly set on them, gaue them the ouerthrow, slew thre hundred and toke manie prisoners; as the said sir John de la Poole, sir John Ballet, John Aulfort lieutenant of Faleise, John Clifton, Henrie Portimer, and other to the number of six hundred.

But though the Frenchmen got here in this place, they went not awaie with like gaine in an other: for the bassard de la Bailline, and the lord Craignat capteins of Courallon, with a great band made rode into Gasconnois, whom by chance spattethrough Cough and other Englishmen, which were also abroad in the countrie, met and encountered. There was a fore fight betweene the parties, being of courage and number in maner equall. But after long conflict, the Frenchmen almost all were slaine and taken, and the bassard being well hoisted, fled; after whome followed vpon the spurres, spattethrough Cough chasing him euen to his castell gate, and there toke him: for the which act he was much praised of the erle of Salisburie (to whom he presented the said bassard) and had not onelie the rights giuen him that belonged to the prisoner, but also was rewarded with a goodlie courser at the earles hands.

About this season, Arthur brother to John duke of Britaine, commonlie called the earle of Richmond, hauing neither profit of the name, nor of the countrie, notwithstanding that king Henrie the first had created him earle of Purie in Normandie, and gaue him not onelie a great pension, but also the whole profits of the same towne of Purie; yet now, because that the duke his brother was returned to the part of the Dolphin, he likewise revolting from the English obedience, came to the Dolphin to Dolsters, and there offered himselfe to settie him, whom the the Dolphin gladly accepted, resolving more thereof, than if he had gained an hundred thousand crownes: for the Britons within the towne of Purie, hearing that their maister was ioined with the Dolphin, kept both the towne and castell against the duke of Bedford, furnishing it daile with new men and munition.

The lord regent aduertised hercof, raised an armie of Englishmen and Normans, to the number of eightene hundred men of armes, and eight thousand archers and other. He had in his companie the earles of Salisburie and Suffolke, the lords Scales, Willoughbie, and Boynings, sir Reginald Graie, sir John Fastolfe, sir John Saluaine, sir Lancelot Astele, sir Philip Hall, sir John Baskleie, sir John Crete, sir Thomas Blunt, sir Robert Harling, sir William Oldhall, and manie other, both knights and esquiers, with whom he came before the towne of Purie, which was well defended, till they within perceiued themselves in danger, by reason of a mine which the Englishmen made, whereupon they yielded the towne. But the captaine of the castell would not presentlie render the place, howbeit they promised to deliuer it, if the same were not rescued at a day assigned by the Dolphin or his power.

Upon this promise, hostages were deliuered into the possession of the lord regent, by whose licence an herald was sent to the Dolphin, to aduertise him of the time determined; who understanding the distresse of his friends, incontinentlie sent John duke of Alanson, as his lieutenant generall, the erle Douglas, whom at their setting forth he made duke of Touraine, and the earle Buchquhane as then constable of France, the erls of Aumarie, Montadoure, Comnere, Paulieurier, and Forests, the vicounts of Parpigne, and Louars, the lords of Craulle, Gaulles, Malicorne, Hannie, Ballaie, Fountains, Pontfoix, and manie other nobles knights and esquiers, to the number of sixtene thousand Frenchmen & Britons, besides five thousand Scots, whom the earle Douglas had but latelie transported out of Scotland.

This small armie approached within two miles of Purie. But when the duke of Alanson understood by such as he had sent to view the conduite of the Englishmen, that he could not get anye advantage by assailing them (although the Dolphin had given him strict commandement to fight with the regent) he retired backe with his whole armie to the towne of Wernueill in Berch, that belonged to the king of England; sending word to the garrison, that he had discomfited the English armie, and that the regent with a small number with him by swiftnesse of horse had saved himselfe. The inhabitants of Wernueill, giving to light credit hereunto, received the duke of Alanson with all his armie into the towne.

In the meane time came the date of the rescues of Purie, which for want thereof was deliuered to the duke of Bedford by the captaine called Gerard de la Ballier, who presenting vnto the duke of Bedford the heles of the castell, shewed him a letter also signed and sealed with the hands and seales of eightene great lords, who the date before promised by the tenour of the same letter to giue the duke battell, and to raise the siege. Well (said the duke), if their hearts would haue serued, their puillance was sufficient once to haue proffered, or so haue performed this faithfull promise; but sith they disdain to seke me, God and saint George willing, I shall not desist to followe the tract of their hostes till one part of vs be by battell ouerthrowne. And herewith he sent word the earle of Suffolke with five hundred horsemen, to espie the doings of the Frenchmen, and where they were lodged. The earle riding forth, passed by Dampstie, and came to Wretuill, where he heard certeine newes where the Frenchmen had gotten Wernueill, and remained there still.

These newes he sent by post vnto the duke of Bedford, the which incontinentlie vpon that aduertisement set forthward in great hast towards his enemies. The Frenchmen hearing of his coming, set their people in arrate, and made all one maine battell without fore ward or reer ward; and appointed foure hundred horsemen, Lombards and others to breake the arrate of the Englishmen, either behind, or at the sides, of the which was captaine sir Stephan de Winolles, called the Hire. The duke of Bedford likewise made one entier battell, and suffered no man to be on horsebacke, and set the archers (euerie one having a sharpe stake) both on the front of the battell, and also on the sides, like wings. And behind were all their hostes tied together, either by the reins or by the talles, with the carts and carriages, to the defense whereof were two thousand archers appointed.

Herewith either part being come almost to the ioining, the duke of Alanson, on the one side, exhorted his people to plaie the men, declaring vnto them, that the conclusion of this battell should either deliuer them out of vile seruitude, or place them in the bale of bondage. On the other side, the duke of Bedford, to encourage his men, willed them to remember how oft they had subdued those their aduersaries in battell (with whom they should now cope) for the most part, euer being the lesse number against the greater. Again, he declared how necessarie it was to tame the bold attempts of the presumptuous Dolphin now in the beginning, least if the fire were suffered further to burne, it should haue need of the more water to quench it.

Spanish words he uttered, to put them in hope of good success, and victorie. But scarce had he ended his exhortation, when the Englishmen rushed forth, and boldly set on their enemies, crying; Saint George, a Bedford, a Bedford; and the Frenchmen likewise cried Pontop saint Denis. Then began the battell right fierce on both sides, continuing for the space of three houres in doubtful balance, fortune shewing hir selfe so equall, that no eie could iudge to whether part she was more fauourable. But at length, after that those foure hundred horsemen, which were appointed, as we haue hard, to breake the arrate of the Englishmen, had passed thorough on the one side vnto the place where the carriages and hostes stood, and could not passe further, by reason of the fierce shot of the English bowes, they falling to the spoile made a band, and therewith departed. Those archers then that were appointed to keepe the carriages, being now at libertie, came forthward, and so fiercely shot at the thickest peeple of their enemies fighting on foot, that in the end they were not able longer to indure, but were borne downe by fine force, and so hanged.

This battell was fought the eight and twentieth of August, in the yeare of our Lord a thousand foure hundred twentie and foure, in the which battell were slaine of the Frenchmen, the earles of Aumarie, Montadour, Forest, Parte, the lords Craulle, Gaulles, Fountains, Ambois, Louars, Montente, Combrese, Ryuell, Tumble, and Poisse, besides five hundred knights. The vicount Parbonnie was hanged on a gibbet, because he was one of the murderers of the duke of Burgognie. Of Scots also were slaine, Archembald earle Douglas, that was made (as before is mentioned) duke of Touraine, James Douglas sonne to the said Archembald earle of Winton, John earle of Boughen newlie made constable of France, sir Alexander Meldin, sir Henrie Balgaulie, sir John Sterling, William of Pomelidon, sir James

So that in this battell were slaine by report of gontoy king at armes in France, and the English harolds there present, of Frenchmen & Scots nine thousand and seauen hundred: and of Englishmen one and twentie hundred, but no man of name, savinge five yong esquieres. And there were taken prisoners, John duke of Alanson, the bastard of Alanson, the lord of Flete, the lord of Hozmit, sir Piers Harison, sir Lois de Gaucourt, sir Robert Bouslet, sir John Auernebull a Scot, and two hundred gentlemen, beside common soldiers. The Frenchmen with in Veruill, seeing the Dolphin's armie thus overthrowne, deliuered the towne to the regent, their liues saued. Then was sir Philip Hall appointed capteine there, and the lord regent returned, and came to Rone, and after to Paris.

The Dolphin that called himselfe king of France, was sore appalled with the overthrow of his armie: for he was driven out of all the countreies in maner, that appertained to the crowne of France, & might resort to none except to Bourbonnois, Aluergne, Berry, Poictou, Touraine, a part of Aniois, and Langue doc: yet to shew himselfe as king, he erected his court of parlement, his chancerie, & all other courts in the cite of Poitiers, and there established his great seale, with all due circumstances thereto appertaining: where he continued foureteene yeares together, and then was remoued to Paris, after he had got that cite, and expelled the Englishmen, as after shall appeare.

The duke of Bedford lieng at Paris, sent the lord Scales, sir John Montgomerie, sir John Fastolfe, with two thousand men to winne the countreies of Aniois, and Spaine, unto whom were rendezed with out assault, the strong castels of Beaumont le Vicount, Meune, Sillie, Olce, Courtieriers, Kouffe, Vasse, Courtemeniant, and twentie other, which I do here passe over. Such was then the opinion conceived of the English puissance, so oft tried, proued, and preuailing, that the Frenchmen thought the Englishmen would haue all which they wished for, or wroughit for.

The earle of Salisburie, with the said lord Scales, and the other capitaines before named, were appointed with an armie of ten thousand men, to besiege the rich and strong cite of Spans, the chiefe cite of all the countrie of Spaine; whither when they came, they made their appoche, and planted their batterie to the walls, so that with the shot of their great peeces (which kind of engins before that time had not beene much here nor heard of in France) the cite was within a few daies despoiled of all his towres and outward defenses. The citizens and soldiers, perceiving in what danger they stood, & knowing not how to remedie the matter, offered the towne vpon this condition, that all persons which would farrte within the towne, might abide; and all that would depart with horse and harnells onelie, should be permitted: which offers were accepted, and the towne rendered, whereof the earle made capteine the earle of Suffolke, and his lieutenant sir John Fastolfe.

After this, the earle of Salisburie besieged the faire towne of saint Sufan, whereof was capteine one Ambrose de Lorie, a right valiant chiefe. The earle caused the towne to be assaulted at his first coming to it: but he lost more than he gained, and therefore left off his assaults, and caused a trench to be cast about the towne, and so planted his batterie, by force whereof he overthrew the walles, in such sort that the capitaine offered for himselfe and his soldiers 200000 crownes, so that they might depart in their doublets onelie, which summe (because winter appoched) was accepted, and the towne yelded. Of this towne sir John Popham was made capteine. When the earle went to Spaine la Tuber, which towne after five weekes siege was yelded, and appointed to the keeping of sir John Montgomerie, knight.

After the feast of the Purification of our ladie, the earle of Salisburie besieged the castell de la Fert Barnard, during which siege a sale was made of the towne of Alanson being in the Englishmens possession, by a Gascoigne that was one of the garrison there. But this sale being opened to the earle of Salisburie by the same Gascoigne at the date appointed, the lord Willoughbie and sir John Fastolfe, with two thousand men were sent to encounter with the buiers of that towne, so that when Charles de Willers chiefe merchant of this ware, came earlie in a morning with two hundred horsemen, and three hundred footmen, and approached the towne, abiding for the Gascoigne, yet he was aware, the Englishmen had compassed him and his companie round about, and setting vpon the Frenchmen, slue and toke all the whole number of them, saue Peter Danthenazie and five and twentie other, which by the swiftnesse of their horses saued themselves.

After this conflict, the lord Willoughbie returned to the earle of Salisburie, lieng still at siege before the towne de la Fert Barnard, which shortly after was rendered by into the earle of Salisburies hands, to whom the lord regent gaue it, to inioie to him and his heires for ever. Beside this, the said earle partlie by assault, & partlie by composition toke diuers other, as saint Bales; where he made capteine Richard Gethin esquier; Chauceaur Lermilage, where he made gouernour Hatthew Cough; Cherland, of the which he assigned ruler John Banasser; Spalcoyne, whereof he made capteine William Glasdale esquier; Lille Somb; Boulton, whereof was made capteine sir Lancelot Lille knight; Loupeland, whereof was made capteine Henrie Branch; Montseur, of the which was made capteine sir William Oldhall knight; la Suze was assigned to the keeping of John Suffolke, esquier. And besides this, a bouie fortie castels and piles were overthrowne and destroyed. The newes hereof reported in England, caused great reioysing among the people, not onelie for the conquest of so manie towne & fortresses, but also for that it has pleased God to giue them victorie in a pitched field: whereof generall processions were appointed, to render vnto God humble thanks for his fauour so bestowed vpon them.

This yeare after Easter, the king called a parlement at Westminster, by aduise of the prelates; and comming to the parlement house himselfe, he was conueled through the cite vpon a great courser, with great triumph, the people flocking into the streets to behold the child, whom they iudged to haue the liuelie image and countenance of his father, and like to succeed him, and be his heire in all princelie qualities, martiall policies, and morall vertues, aswell as in his realmes, seignories and dominions. In this parlement was granted to the king a subside of twelue pence the pound, towards the maintenance of his warres, of all merchandize, comming in or going out of the realme, as well of Englishmen as strangers.

During which parlement, came to London Peter duke of Dufimbre, sonne to the king of Portingale, coulsine germane remoued to the king; which of the duke of Excester and the bishop of Winchester. Her his vnckles was highlie feasted, he was also elected into the order of the garter. During the same season, Edmund Mortimer, the last earle of March, of that name (which long time had bene restrained from his libertie, and finally wared lane) deceased without issue, whose inheritance descended to the lord Richard Plantagenet, sonne and heire to Richard earle of Cambridge, beheaded (as before ye haue heard) at the towne of Southampton. In the time of this parliament also was sir John Portiner cousin to the same earle, either for desert or malice, atainted of treason, and put to execution, of whose death no small slander arose amongst the common people.

After all these things done in England and in France, Humfreie duke of Gloucester, who had married the ladie Jaquet, or Jaqueline of Bauler, countesse of Heinault, Holland, and Zeland (notwithstanding she was coupled in marriage afore to John duke of Brabant, as yet living, and had continued with him a long space) passed now the sea with the said ladie, and went to Mons or Bergen in Heinault, where the more part of the people of that countrie came and submitted themselves unto him, as to their soveraigne lord, in right of his said wife, the ladie Jaquet or Jaqueline: with which doing hir former husband was greatlie moued. And likewise the duke of Burgognie, being great friend to the same duke of Brabant, was much offended: who of old familiaritie wrote lovinglie to the duke of Gloucester, requiring him to reforme himselfe according to reason, and to forsake his vngodlie life, both in keeping of an other mans wife, and also in seeking to usurpe other mens rights and titles.

Whereupon went letters betwixt them for a time, but at length when the duke of Burgognie perceived that the duke of Gloucester meant to mainteine his interest, & to make warre against the duke of Brabant; he took part with the duke of Brabant so earnestlie, that he consented to fight with the duke of Gloucester bodie to bodie within liks in defense of the duke of Brabants quarrell, and further aided the duke of Brabant in his warres against the duke of Gloucester, with all his puissance, inasmuch that in the end (after the duke of Gloucesters returne into England) the duke of Brabant recovered all the towns in Heinault, which the ladie Jaquet or Jaqueline held against him. And further the same ladie was by composition deliuered by them of the towne of Mons unto the duke of Burgognie; who caused hir to be conveyed unto Gant, from whence she made shift to escape into Holland, where she was obeyed as countesse of the countrie.

Then made the warre in hir owne defense against the dukes of Burgognie and Brabant, who sought to spoile hir of all hir towns and lands: but they procured pope Martin the first (before whome the matter was) to give sentence that the first matrimonie with the duke of Brabant was good, and the second with the duke of Gloucester to be unlawfull. But in the meane time, the lord J. Fitz Walter was sent over to the aid of the ladie Jaquet or Jaquelin, with a power of Englishmen, landed in Zeland, nere unto the towne of Zertre, against whome came the duke of Burgognie, and encountering with them and other such Hollanders and Zelanders, as were joined with them, nere to a place called Biewers hauen, there discomfited them; so that of English, Hollanders, and Zelanders, with the said lord J. Fitz Walter, were slaine seauen or eight hundred, and the residue chased to the water. At length, when the duke of Gloucester vnderstood the sentence pronounced against him by the pope, he began to war wearie of his wife the said ladie Jaquet, by whome he neuer had profit, but losse, and took in a second marriage Eleanor Cobham, daughter to the lord Cobham of Steveroto, which before (as the same went) was his soveraigne paramour, to his slander and dishonour.

A little before this time, sir Thomas Kemplton, sir Philip Branch, sir Nicholas Burdet, and other Englishmen, to the number of five hundred men of warre, repaired and fortified the towne of St. James de Beuron, situate on the frontiers of Normandie towards Britaine, within halfe a league of the duke of Britains ground, with whome as then they had open warre; and so began to dw. manie displeasures to his people. Whereupon Arthur earle of Richmond and Purie, brother to the said duke, and latelie before created constable of France, assembled an huge power of men to the number of fortie thousand (as some haue written) and with the same came before the said towne of St. James de Beuron, and played his siege verie stronglie about it, enforcing with his great ordinance to ouerthrow the walls. And one day amongst other, he determined to give the assault, and so did, the which continued a long space verie hot and earnest.

The Britons Whistonants were come downe into a low bottom, where there was a little pond or fish-pole, and they must needs passe by a streit waie to come to the walles in great danger. On that side of the towne was a little bulwke, which sir Nicholas Burdet kept, having with him a fortie or eightie fighting men: and over against the same bulwke there was a gate well furnished also with English souldiers; so that the Britons which came downe into the ditches in great number to give the assault, heard on either side them the Englishmen (within the said bulwke and gate) make a great noise, in crieng Salisburie and Suffolke; with the which cri the Britons being maruelouslie astoned, began to recolle in great disorder. And therewith the said sir Nicholas Burdet issued forth vpon them, and pursuing them right valiantlie, slue them downe, so that there died of them what by the sword, and what by drowning in the said pole, about seauen thousand or eight hundred, and to the number of fiftie were taken prisoners. And beside this, those Englishmen gained eightene standards and one banner.

Incontinentlie the newes hereof were reported to the constable of France, who was busie at the assault on the other side of the towne, whereof he was sore displeased, and no lesse amazed; so that he caused the retreat to be sounded, for all the siege on that side toward the pole was already raised. After this, vpon counsell taken amongst the Frenchmen, it was determined that they should dislodge: and so about the middes of the next night, the constable and all the residue of his people departed toward Fougiers, leaving behind them great plentie of artillerie both great and small, with victuals, and all their other provisions: as fourtene great guns and fortie barrels of powder, three hundred pipes of wine, two hundred pipes of biscket and flower, two hundred stalles of figs and rellins, and five hundred barrels of herrings.

Somewhat before this season fell a great diuision in the realme of England, which of a sparke was like to haue grown to a great flame, for whether the bishop of Winchester called Henrie Beaufort, sonne to John duke of Lancaster by his third wife, enuied the authoritie of Humfreie duke of Gloucester, protector of the realme; or whether the duke disdained at the riches and pompous estate of the bishop: sure it is that the whole realme was troubled with them and their partakers: so that the citizens of London were faine to keepe daile and nightlie watches, and to shut by their shops for feare of that which was doubted to haue ensued of their assembling of people about them. The archbishop of Cantuarbie and the duke of Aquitaine, called the prince of Portingale, rode rode eight times in one daie betwene the two parties, and so the matter was staied for a time. But the bishop of Winchester, to cleere himselfe of blame so farre as he might, and to charge his nephew the lord protector with all the fault, wrote a letter to the regent of France, the tenor whereof insueth.

The bishop of Winchesters letter excusatorie.

Right high and mightie prince, and my right noble, and after one, lieuest lord, I recommend me vnto you with all my hart. And as you desire the welfare of the king our soueraigne lord, and of his realmes of England and France, your owne health, and ours also: so halt you hither. For by my truth, if you tarie, we shall put this land in aduenture with a field; such a brother you haue here, God make him a good man. For your wisdom knoweth, that the profit of France standeth in the welfare of England. Written in great hast on Allhallowen euen. By your true seruant to my liues end, Henrie Winchester.

The duke of Bedford being sore grieved and disquieted with these newes, constituted the earle of Warwick, which was latelie come into France with six thousand men, his lieutenant in the French dominions, and in the duchie of Normandie; and so with a small companie, he with the duchesse his wife returned againe ouer the seas into England, and the tenth daie of Januarie he was with all solemnitie receiued into London, to whome the citizens gaue a paire of basins of silver and gilt, and a thousand markes in monie. Then from London he rode to Westminster, and was lodged in the kings palace. The five and twentieth daie of March after his coming to London, a parlement began at the towne of Leicester; where the duke of Bedford openly rebuked the lords in generall, because that they in the time of warre, thorough their priue malice and inward grudge, had almost moued the people to warre and commotion, in which time all men ought to shoulde be of one mind, hart, and consent: requiring them to defend, serue, & dread their soueraigne lord king Henrie, in performing his conquest in France, which was in manner brought to conclusion. In this parlement the duke of Gloucester laide certaine articles to the bishop of Winchester his charge, the which with the answers hereafter do insue; as followeth.

The articles of accusation and accord betwene the lord of Gloucester, and the lord of Winchester.

Are insueth the articles, as the kings counsell hath conceived, the which the right high and mightie prince my lord of Gloucester hath furnished vpon my lord of Winchester chancellor of England, with the answer to the same.

First, whereas he being protector, and defender of this land, desired the Tower to be opened to him, and to lodge him therein; Richard Woodville esquier (having at that time the charge of the keeping of the Tower) refused his desire, and kept the same Tower against him vndelie and against reason, by the commandement of my said lord of Winchester; and afterward in appointing of the said refusall, he receiued the said Woodville, and cherished him against the state and worship of the king, and of my said lord of Gloucester.

Item, my said lord of Winchester, without the aduise and assent of my said lord of Gloucester, or of the kings counsell, purposed and disposed him to set hand on the kings person, and to haue remoued him from Eltham, the place that he was in, to Windsor, to the intent to put him in gouernance as him list.

Item, that where my said lord of Gloucester (to whome of all persons that shoulde be in the land, by the waie of nature and birth, it belongeth to see the gouernance of the kings person) informed of the said vndue purpose of my said lord of Winchester, declared in the article next abovesaid, and in letting thereof, determining to haue gone to Eltham vnto the king to haue provided as the cause required: my said lord of Winchester vnturle, and against the kings peace, to the intent to trouble my said lord of Gloucester going to the king, purposing his death, in case that he had gone that waie, set men of armes and archers at the end of London bridge next Southwarke: and in forbarring of the kings high waie, let balaue the chaine of the stoupes there, and set by pipes and hurdles in manner and forme of bulwarks: and set men in chambers, cellars, & windowes, with bowes and arrowes and other weapons, to the intent to bring small destruction to my said lord of Gloucesters person, as well as of those that then shoulde come with him.

Item, my said lord of Gloucester saith and affirmeth, that our soueraigne lord his brother that was king Henrie the sixt, told him on a time, when our soueraigne lord being prince was lodged in the palace of Westminster in the great chamber, by the noyse of a spannell, there was on a night a man spied and taken behind a tapet of the said chamber, the which man was deliuered to the earle of Arundell to be examined vpon the cause of his being there at that time; the which so examined, at that time confessed that he was there by the stirring and procuring of my said lord of Winchester, ordeined to haue slaine the said prince there in his bed: wherefore the said earle of Arundell let sacke him forthwith, and doctored him in the Thames.

Item, our soueraigne lord that was, king Henrie the sixt, said vnto my said lord of Gloucester, that his father king Henrie the fourth lining, and visited then greatlie with sicknesse by the hand of God, my said lord of Winchester said vnto the king (Henrie the sixt then being prince) that the king his father so visited with sicknesse was not personable, & therefore not disposed to come in conuersation and gouernance of the people; and for so much, counselled him to take the gouernance and crowne of this land vpon him.

The answer of the bishop.

Are insue the answers to the accusations made by my lord of Winchester chancellor of England, vnto the causes and matters of heavinesse, declared in the articles against him by my lord of Gloucester.

First, as of the refusall made by to my lord of Gloucester, of opening the Tower to him, of his lodging therein, by the commandement of my said lord of Winchester; he answereth, that in the presence of my said lord of Gloucester before his coming out of his countrie of Heirault, for causes such as were thought resonable, it seemeth lawfull that the Tower shoulde haue bene notablie stoyed and kept with vit-tels: hotob: it it was not forthwith executed, and that in likewise after that my said lord of Gloucester, was gone into his said countrie of Hainault, for seditious and odious billes and languages, cast and used in the citie of London, fouding of insurrection and rebellion against the kings peace, and destruction as well of diuerse estates of this land, as strangers being under the defense, in so much that in doubt thereof, strangers in great number fled the land. And for the more sure keeping of the said Tower, Richard Woodville esquier so trusted with our soueraine lord the king that dead is (as well ye know) & also chamberlain and counsellor vnto my lord of Bedford, with a certeine number of defensible persons assigned vnto him, was made deputie there by the assent of the kings counsell, being that time at London, for to abide therein, for the safegard thereof; and straightlie charged by the said counsell, that during that time of his said charge, he should not suffer any man to be in the Tower stronger than himselfe, without speciall charge or commandement of the king by the aduise of his counsell.

2 Item, that sone after (vpon the comming of my said lord of Gloucester into this land from his countrie of Hainault) the said lords of the kings counsell were informed, that my said lord of Gloucester grudged with the said maner of inforcing the Tower, and let saie to them of London, that he had well vnderstand that they had bene heauilie threatened for the time of his absence, and otherwise than they shuld haue bene, if he had bene in this land. Wherefore he was right euill contented, and especiallie of the said forcing of the Tower, set vpon them in manner of a chased villain, considering the good equitie and truth that they had alwaies kept vnto the king, offering them there vpon remedie if they would.

3 Item, that after this, Richard Scot licutenant of the Tower, by the commandement of my said lord of Gloucester, brought vnto him frer Randolp, the which had long before confessed treason done by him against the kings person that dead is, for the which knowlege he was put to be kept in the said Tower, & straightlie commanded vnder great paine giuen vnto the said Scot, to kepe him straightlie & suerlie, & not to let him out of the said Tower without commandment of the king by aduise of his counsell. The which frer Randolp, my said lord of Gloucester kept then with himselfe (not witting to the said Scot) as he declared to my said lord of Winchester, sone after that he had brought the said frer Randolp to my lord of Gloucester; saing to my lord of Winchester, that he was wdone but he helped him, & expelled, as for cause of the withholding of frer Randolp: and saing moreover, that when he desired of my said lord of Gloucester, the deliuerance of the said frer Randolp, to lead him againe vnto the Tower, or sufficient warrant for his discharge: my said lord of Gloucester answered him, that his commandement was sufficient warrant and discharge for him. In the which thing abovesaid, it was thought to my lord of Winchester, that my said lord of Gloucester toke vpon him further than his authoritie stretched vnto, and caused him to doubt and dread, least that he would haue proceeded further. And at such time as the said Woodville came vnto him, to aske his aduise and counsell, of lodging my said lord of Gloucester in the Tower; he aduised and charged him, that before he suffered my said lord of Gloucester, or any person to lodge therein stronger than himselfe, he should procure him a sufficient warrant therof, of the king, by the aduise of his counsell.

4 Item, as to the said article of the foresaid causes of heauinesse, my said lord chancelor answereth, that he neuer purposed to set hand on the kings person, nor to remoue him, or that he should be removed, or put in any manner of gouernance, but by the aduise of the kings counsell. For he could not perceive any manner of goodnesse or of auantage that might haue grolone to him thereof, but rather great peril and charge; and hereof my said lord of Winchester is ready to make pprove, in time and place conuenient.

5 Item, as to the third article of the foresaid causes and heauines, my said lord chancelor answereth, that he was oft and diuerse times warned, by diuerse credible persons, aswell at the time of the kings last parlement, holden at Westminster, as before and since, that my said lord of Gloucester purposed him bodilie harme, & was warned therof, and counselled by the said persons, and that diuerse times, to abstaine him from comming to Westminster, as my said lord of Winchester declared vnto my said lord of Gloucester.

6 Item, that in the time of the said parlement, diuerse persons of low estate of the citie of London, in great number assembled on a day vpon the wharfe, at the crane of the vinetree, and wished and desired that they had there the person of my lord of Winchester, saing, that they would haue thowen him into the Thames, to haue taught him to swim with wings. Whereof billes and language of slander and threatenings were cast and spoken in the said citie by my said lord the chancelor, which caused him to suppose that they that so said and did, willed and desired his destruction, although they had no cause.

7 Item, that after the comming to London of sir Rafe Botiller, and maister Letwes, sent from my lord of Bedford, to the rest of the lords of the counsell, they being informed, that my said lord of Gloucester did beare displeasure to my said lord of Winchester, they came to the said lord of Gloucester to his In, the second sundae next before All hallondate, and there opened vnto him, that they had knowledge and vnderstanding of the said displeasure, praing him to let them know if he bare such displeasure against my said lord of Winchester, and also the causes thereof. At the which time (as my said lord of Winchester was afterwards informed) my said lord of Gloucester affirmed that he was heauie toward him, and not without causes that peraduenture he would put in writing.

8 Item, that after the mondate next before All hallondate last past in the night, the people of the said citie of London, by the commandement of my said lord of Gloucester, as it was said (for what cause my lord the chancelor wist not) assembled in the citie, armed and arraised, and so continued all the night. Amongst diuerse of the which (the same night by what excitation, my said lord the chancelor wist not) seditious and heauie language was used, and in especiall against the person of my lord the chancelor. And so the same mondate at night, my said lord of Gloucester sent vnto the Ius of court at London, charging them of the court dwelling in the same, to be with him vpon the morrow at eight of the clocke in their best arrais.

9 Item, that on the morrow being tuesday next following, my said lord of Gloucester sent earlie vnto the maior and aldermen of the said citie of London, to ordeine him to the number of three hundred persons on horse backe, to accompanie him vnto such a place as he disposed him to ride, which (as it was said) was vnto the king, to the intent to haue his person, and to remoue him from the place that he was in, without assent, or aduise of the kings counsell. The which thing was thought vnto my said lord the chancelor, that he ought in no wise to haue done, nor had not bene sene so before.

Item, that my said lord the chancelloz, considering the things aboue said, and doubting therfore of perils that might haue ensued thereof, intending to purueie there against, and namelie for his owne suertie and defense, according to the laie of nature, ordeined to let, that no force of people should come on the bridge of London towards him, by the which he or his might haue bene indangered or noied, not intending in any wise bodilie harme vnto my said lord of Glocester, nor to any other person, but onelie his owne defense, in eschewing the perill abouesaid.

Item, as toward the fourth and fift of the said articles, my lord the chancelloz answereth, that he was euer true to all those that were his soueraigne lords and reigned vpon him, and that he neuer purposed treason or vnturth against any of their persons, and in especiall against the person of our said soueraigne lord Henrie the sixt. The which considering the great wisdom, truth, and manhood that all men knew in him, he would not for the time that he was king, haue set on my said lord the chancelloz so great trust as he did, if he had found or thought in him such vnturth. The which thing my said lord the chancelloz offered to declare and shew, as it belongeth to a man of his estate to do, requiring therupon my lord of Bedford and all the lords spirituall and tempozall in this parlement, that it might be scene that there were iudges conuenient in this case, that they would do him right, or else that he might haue leaue of the king by their abuisse to go sue his right, before him that ought to be his iudge.

And as toward the letter sent by my lord of Winchester vnto my lord of Bedford, of the which the tenor is before rehearsed, of the which my lord of Glocester complained him of the malicious and vnture purpose of my said lord of Winchester, as toward the assembling of the people, and gathering of a field in the kings land, in troubling thereof, and against the kings peace: my said lord of Winchester answereth, that if his said letters duellie vnderstand, and in such wise as he vnderstood and meant in the writing of them, it maie not reasonable be gathered and taken, that my said lord of Winchester intended to gather any field, or assemble people in troubling of the kings land, and against the kings peace, but rather purposed to acquite him to the king in his truth, and to keepe the rest and peace in the kings land, and to eschew rebellion, disobedience and all trouble. For by that that in the beginning of the said letter, he calleth my said lord of Bedford his lieuest lord after one, that is the king, whome he ought to accept of dutie of his truth, the which he hath euer kept, and will keepe.

Moreover, in the said letter he desireth the comming home of my lord of Bedford, for the welfare of the king and of his realmes of England and of France, which stand principallie in keeping of his rest and peace, and praieth my said lord of Bedford to speed his coming into England, in eschewing of iopardie of the land, and of a field, which he dread him might haue followed if he had long taried. As toward those wordes: If ye farie, we shall put this land in aduenture with a field, such a brother ye haue here, etc. My said lord of Winchester saith, the soth is: before he wrote the said letter, by the occasion of certeine ordinances made by the mayo and aldermen of London against the excessive taking of masons, carpentars, tilers, plasterers, and other labourers for their daile tourmes, and approued by the kings devise and counsell, there were cast manie heauines and seditious willes vnder the names of such labourers, thetarning rising with manie thousands, and menacing of estates of the land, and likewise seditious and euill language sownen and so continued and likelie to haue ensued, of purpose and intent of disobedience and rebellion. To the redressing of which, it seemed to my lord the chancelloz, that my said lord of Glocester did not his indeuour nor diligence that he might haue shewed. For lacke of which diligence, they that were disposed to do disobedience were incouraged and emboldened, so that it was like, that they should haue made a gathering, and that the king and his true subiects should haue bene compelled to haue made a field to haue withstand them; the which field making, had bene aduenturing of this land, and in tokening that it was neuer my said lord chancellozs intent, to gather no field, but as truth most stirred him against such as riotouslie would make such assembling against our soueraigne lord, and the weale of this land, he desired so hastilie the comming of my said lord of Bedford: the which he would in no wise haue so greatlie desired, if he would haue purposed him vnto any vnlawfull making of a field; for he wist well, that my said lord of Bedford would most sharplie haue chastised and punished all those, that so would make any riotous assemble.

When this answer was made, the duke caused this writing following openlie to be proclaimed.

BE it knowne to all folkes, that it is the intent of my lord of Bedford, and all the lords spirituall & tempozall, assembled in this present parlement, to acquite him and them, and to proceed truelie, iustlie, and indifferently, without any parcialitie in any manner of matter or quarels, moued or to be moued betwene my lord of Glocester on that one partie, & my lord of Winchester chancelloz of England on that other partie. And for suer keeping of the kings peace it is accorded by my said lord of Bedford, & by my said lords spirituall and tempozall, an oth to be made in forme as followeth, that is to saie.

The oth of the lords.

That my said lord of Bedford, and my said lords, spirituall and tempozall, and ech of them shall (as far forth as their cunninges and discretions suffice) truelie, iustlie, and indifferently counsell and aduise the king, and also proceed and acquit themselves in all the said matters, and quarels, without that they or any of them shall prouilie and apertlie make or shew himselfe to be partie or parciall therein, not leaning or eschewing so to do for affection, loue, meed, doubt, or dread of any person or persons. And that they shall in all wise keepe secret all that shall be commoned by waie of counsell, in the matters and quarrels abouesaid, in the said parlement, without that they or any of them shall by word, writing of the king, or in any wise open or discover it to any of the said parties, or to any other person that is not of the said counsell: but if he haue a speciall commandement or leaue therevnto of the king or my said lord of Bedford. And that ech of them shall with all his might and power, assist by waie of counsell, or else shew it vnto the king, my lord of Bedford, and to the rest of my said lords to put the said parties to reason; and not to suffer that any of the said parties by them, or by their assistance, proceed or attempt by way of fight against the kings peace; nor helpe, assist, or comfort any of them thereto: but let them with all their might and power withstand them, and assist vnto the king, and my said lord of Bedford, in keeping of the kings peace, and redressing all such maner of proceeding by waite of fight or force.

Dukes: the duke of Bedford, the duke of Norfolk, the duke of Excester. Bishops: the archbishop of Canturburie, the bishop of Carleill, the bishop of Bath, the bishop of Landaffe, the bishop of Rochester, the bishop of Elychester, the bishop of Worcester, the bishop of Saint Davids, the bishop of London, the bishop of Duresme. Abbats: the abbat of Waltham, the abbat of Classenburie, the abbat of S. Augustines in Canturburie, the abbat of Westminster, the abbat of S. Maries in Porke, the abbat of S. Albons not knowne because he was not present. Which in manner and forme above rehearsed, all the lords aforesaid spirituall as temporall, being in this parliament at Leicester assembled, the fourth day of March, promised upon their faith, dutie, and allegiance, which they owe to the king their soueraigne lord, truelie to obserue and keepe, according to the true meaning and purport of the same.

The arbitrement.

IN the name of God Amen. We Henrie archbishop of Canturburie, Thomas duke of Excester, John duke of Norfolk, Thomas bishop of Duresme, Philip bishop of Worcester, John bishop of Bath, Humfreie earle of Stafford, William Alnwick keeper of the kings priuie seale, Kase lord Cromwell, arbitrators in all maner of causes, matters and quarrels of heavinesses & greivances, with all incidents, circumstances, dependents, or connexes being and hanging betwene the high & worthy prince Humfreie duke of Glocester on the one partie, and the worthy full father in God Henrie bishop of Winchester and chancellor of England on the other partie, by either of them, for the peasing of the said quarrels and debates taken and chosen in maner and forme as it is conteined more plainelie in a compromise made thereupon, of the which the tenor insueth in this forme.

Memorandum, the seauenth daie of March in the fourth yeare of our soueraigne lord the king, Henrie the sixt, the high and mightie prince Humfreie duke of Glocester at the reuerence of God, and for the god of the king our soueraigne lord in this land, & name: lie at the reuerence, and especiallie at the request and praier of the mightie and high prince my lord of Bedford his brother, agreed him to put, and putteth all maner matters and quarrels indeed, with all their incidents, circumstances, dependents and connexes that touchen him and his person, that he hath in anie wise do, or feeleth himselfe greued or heauie against my lord his vnicle, my lord of Winchester: or else that my lord of Winchester findeth him agreued against him, in as much as they touch him or his person from the beginning of the world unto this date, in the aduise, ordinance and arbitrement of the worthy father in God, Henrie archbishop of Canturburie, the high and noble prince Thomas duke of Excester, and John duke of Norfolk, the worthy full father in God Thomas bishop of Duresme, Philip bishop of Worcester, John bishop of Bath, the noble lord Humfreie earle of Stafford, the worthy full persons maister William Alnwick keeper of the kings priuie seale, and Kase lord Cromwell, promising and beighting by the faith of his bodie, & word of his princehood and kings sonne, to do, keepe, obserue, and fulfill for him and his behalfe, all that shall be declared, ordeined, and arbitrated, by the foresaid archbishop, dukes, bishops, earle, keeper of the priuie seale, and lord Cromwell in all matters and quarrels abovesaid.

Granting also and promising ouer that, to be comprehended in the foresaid arbitrement, as toward putting awaie all heavinesses and displeasures, in anie wise conteined, by my lord of Glocester against all those that haue in anie wise assisted, counselled, or fauoured vnto his said vnicle of Winchester, and as toward anie matters that be touching my lord of Glocester, remitteth it, and the gouernance thereof vnto the king & his counsell, they to deme it by the aduise of his counsell, as him thinketh it to be done. In witness of the which thing to this present compromise my said lord of Glocester hath subscribed his name with his owne hand: Humfreie Glocester. And in like forme my lord of Winchester in another compromise hath subscribed with his owne hand vnder the word of his priesthood, to stand at the aduise, ordinance, & arbitrement of the persons abovesaid, Mutatis mutandis.

A decree or order taken by the kings counsell for the pacifying of the quarrels & variances that were betwene the duke of Glocester, and the bishop of Winchester.

The causes aforesaid and quarrels by us seene, heard, and diligentlie examined and decreed, by the assent of the said parties, ordeine and award, that my lords of Glocester, and of Winchester, for any thing done or spoken, by that one partie against that other, or by anie of theirs, or anie other person or persons, afore the seuenth daie of this present moneth of March, neuer hereafter take causes, quarrels, displeasures, or heavinesses, that one against the other, ne neither against the counsellors, adherents, or fauourers of that other for anie thing or things that are past. And that my said lord of Glocester be good lord to my said lord of Winchester, & haue him in loue and affection as his kinsman & vnicle. And that my said lord of Winchester haue to my said lord of Glocester true and full loue and affection, do and be readie to do him such seruice as apperteineth of honestie to my said lord of Winchester and his estate to do. And that each of them be good lord vnto all those adherents, counsellors, and fauourers of that other, and shew them at all times fauourable loue and affection, as for anie thing by them done or said, before the seauenth daie of March.

And we decree, ordeine, and award, that my said lord of Winchester, in the presence of the king our soueraigne lord, my lord of Bedford, and my lord of Glocester, and the residue of the lords spirituall and temporall, and commons being in this present parliament, saie and declare in maner and forme that folloiweth: My soueraigne lord, I haue well vnderstand, that I am noised among the states of your land, how that the king our soueraigne lord that was, at that time being prince, and lodged in the great chamber at Westminster, by the baseng of a spannell, there was on a night taken behind a tapet in the same chamber, a man, that should haue confessed, that he was there by mine excitation and procuring, to haue slaine the foresaid prince there in his bed; whereupon he was sacked, and worthily also drowned in the Thames.

Furthermore, I am accused, how that I should haue stirred the king that last died, the time also that he was prince, to haue taken the gouernance of this realme, and the crowne vpon him, his father liuing the same time, being king. Although which language and nothing, I feele my name and fame greatly emblemished in diuerse mens opinions. Wherevpon, I take first God to my witness, and after all the world, that I haue bene at all times, and am true louer, and true man, to you my soueraigne lord, and shall be all my life. And also, I haue bene to my soueraigne lord that was your father, all the time of his reigne, true man, and for such he took me, trusted me and cherished me to his liues end; and as I trust, no man will affirme the contrarie, nor neuer in my life procuring nor imagining death nor destruction of his person, ne assenting to any such thing, or like thereto, the time that he was king or prince, or else in other state.

I was likewise true man to king Henrie the fourth, all the time that he was my soueraigne lord, and reigned vpon me. In which matters, in all manner of wise that it liketh to you my soueraigne lord for to command me, I am ready for to declare me: and furthermore, where, how, and when it shall like you, by the aduise of your counsell, to assigne me. Wherefore I beseech you my soueraigne lord, as humble as I can, considering that there is no grounded proceste, by the which I might lawfully in these matters abonesaid, be conuict (blessed be God) to hold me, and declare me, by the aduise of all the lords, spiritual and temporall, being in this present parlement, true man to you my soueraigne lord, and so to haue bene vnto my soueraigne lords that were your father and grandfather, and true man also to haue bene at all times to your said father whilest he was prince, or else in anie other estate, the said slander and noise notwithstanding, and this same declaration to be made in this your said present parlement.

The which words declared in maner as it is abovesaid, it seemeth to my said lords the arbitrators, that it is met, that my said lord of Winchester shoulde him apart, and in the meane time, the lords being present, be singularly examined therevpon, and saie their aduise. And if it be assented by them, in maner as my said lord of Winchester desireth, let him be called againe, and that then my lord of Bedford haue these words in effect that follow: Faire vncle, the king my lord by the aduise of his counsell, hath commanded me to saie to you, that he hath well understood and considered all the matters which ye haue here openly declared in his presence, and therevpon ye desire a petition, that he will declare you, and by the aduise and assent of the lords spiritual and temporall, being in this present parlement, he declareth you a true man to him, and that ye haue so bene to my lord his father, and grandfather, also true man to my lord his father while he was prince, or else in anie other estate, the said slander and nothing notwithstanding, and will that the said declaration be so made in this present parlement.

After the which words thus said (as before is declared) it was decreed also by the said lords arbitrators, that the said lord of Winchester shoulde haue these words that follow vnto my said lord of Gloucester: My lord of Gloucester, I haue conceiued to my great heauinesse, that ye should haue receiued by diuerse reports, that I should haue purposed and imagined against your person, hono^r, and estate, in diuers matters, for the which, ye haue taken against me great displeasure: Sir, I take God to my witness, that what reports so euer haue bene to you of me, peradventure of such as haue had no great affection to me, God forgive it them, I neuer imagined, ne purposed anie thing that might be hindring or prejudice to your person, hono^r, or estate: and therefore I praise you, that ye be vnto me good lord from this time forth; for by my will, I gaue neuer other occasion, nor purpose not to do hereafter by the grace of God. The which words so by him said, it was decreed by the same arbitrators, that my lord of Gloucester, shoulde answer and saie: Faire vncle, sith ye declare you such a man, as ye saie, I am right glad that it is so, and for such a man I take you. And when this was done, it was decreed by the same arbitrators, that euery each of my lord of Gloucester, and Winchester, shoulde take either other by the hand, in the presence of the king and all the parlement, in signe and token of good loue & accord, the which was done, and the parlement adioyned till after Easter.

At this reconciliation, such as loued peace reioiced (sith it is a fowle & pernicious thing for priuat men, much more for noblemen to be at variance, sith vpon them depend manie in affections diuerse, whereby factions might grow to the shedding of blood) though others, to whom contention & hartgrudge is delight, wished to see the bittermost mischance that might therof insue, which is the bitter ouerthrow and desolation of populous tribes, even as with a little sparkle whole houses are manie times consumed to ashes; as the old proverbe saith, and that verie well and aptly;

But when the great fier of this dissension betwene these two noble personages, was thus by the arbitrators (to their knowledge and iudgement) utterly quenched out, and laid vnder bond; all other controuersies betwene other lords, taking part with the one partie or the other, were appeased, and brought to concord, so that for soe the king caused a solemne feast to be kept on Whitsonday; on which date he created Richard Plantagenet, sonne and heire to the erle of Cambridge (whome his father at Southampton had put to death, as before ye haue heard) duke of York, not foreseeing that this preferment shoulde be his destruction, nor that his seed shoulde of his generation be the extreame end and finall conclusion. He the same date also promoted John lord of Arundell, and earle marshall, sonne and heire to Thomas duke of Norfolk (by king Richard the second exiled this realme) to the title, name, and stile of duke of York.

During this feast, the duke of Bedford adioyned the king with the high order of knightshood, who on the same date dubbed with the sword these knights, whose names insue: Richard duke of York, John duke of Norfolk; the earle of Westmerland, Henrie lord Persie, John lord Butler, sonne to the earle of Dymond, the lord Kosse, the lord Batrauers, the lord Welles, the lord Barkelle, sir James Butler, sir Henrie Greie of Tankerville, sir John Talbot, sir Rafe Greie of Marke, sir Robert Wre, sir Richard Greie, sir Edmund Hungerford, sir Walter Wingfield, sir John Butler, sir Reginald Cobham, sir John Passhelen, sir Thomas Tunstall, sir John Chedocke, sir Rafe Langstre, sir William Dzurie, sir William ap Thomas, sir Richard Carnonell, sir Richard Wadville, sir John Shirdlow, sir Nicholas Blunket, sir William Cheintestice, sir William Babington, sir Rafe Butler, sir Robert Beauchampe, sir Edmund Trafford, sir John June these baron, and diuerse others.

After this solemne feast ended, a great aid and subsidie was granted for the continuance of the conquest in France, and so therevpon monie was gathered, and men were prepared in euery citie, towne, and countrie. During which businesse, Thomas duke of Excester, great vncle to the king, a right sage and discreet counsellor, departed out of this mortal life, at his manor of Greenewich, and with all funerall pompe was conveyed through London to Berrie, and there buried. ¶ In the same yeare, also died the lady Elizabeth, halfe sister to the same duke, and of the whole blood with king Henrie the fourth, married first to the lord John Holland, duke of Excester, and after to the lord Janhope, buried at the blacke friers of London.

[Philip Morgan after the death of John Foxham (sometime treasurer of England, bishop of Elie and Durham, both which bishoprics, for any thing that I can yet see, he enjoyed both at one time) was made bishop of Elie in the yeare of our redemption 1425, in this sort. Henrie the sixt and manie of the nobilitie had written to the convent of the church of Elie, to chuse William Alnewicke (doctor of both lawes confessor to the king and keeper of the privie seale) to be their bishop. Notwithstanding which (they having more regard to their owne privileges and benefit) chose Peter the prior of Elie to succeed in the place of John Foxham. But none of both these enjoyed that roome; for Martin bishop of Rome (stepping into the matter to make the third part, neither favouring the kings motion, nor approving the monks election) removed this William Morgan from the see of Worcester into Elie, sometime called Helix: as I have seen it set downe in Saron characters in an ancient booke of the lives of saints written in the Saron tongue, about the yeare of Christ 1010, before the time of Edward the confessor, and much about the time of Albo Floriacensis. This Morgan sat at Elie nine yeares, twentie and six weeks, and foure daies, departing this life in his manour of Hatfield, in the yeare 1434, and was buried at the Charterhouse of London; being the twentie and fourth bishop that was installed in that place.]

John Winter.

While these things were thus a doing in England, the earle of Warwicke, lieutenant for the regent in France, entered into the countrie of Paine, & besieged the towne of Chateau de Loire, the which hostile to him was rendered, whereof he made captaine Mattheu Cough, esquier. After this, he took by assault the castell of Paiet, and gave it for his valiantnesse to John Winter esquier, and after that he conquered the castell of Lude, and made there captaine William Glafeldale gentleman. Here he was informed, that the Frenchmen were assembled in the countrie of Beaulle, whereupon he halted thitherwards to have given them battell, but they having knowledge of his approach, durst not abide to trie the matter with him by a pight field, but fled before he came nere them.

The earle in his returne won the castell of Pont-dubleau by surrender; where he left the valiant lord Willoughbie, and then returned to Paris. During which season, he was ordained by the three estates of the realme of England, to be gouvernour of the young king in the place of the duke of Excester deceased: howbeit, he did not as yet returne into England, but remained in France for a season, and achieved manie worthy enterprises. Whilste the lord regent of France was thus in England, meanes was made by the duke of Burgognie, for the delivrie of the duke of Alanson, taken at the battell of Verneuil, and now for the summe of two hundred thousand crownes he was set at libertie; but he would not by any meanes acknowledge the king of England to be his liege and soveraigne lord.

After that the duke of Bedford had set all things in good order in England, he took leave of the king, and together with his wife returned into France, first landing at Calis, where the bishop of Winchester (that also passed the seas with him) received the habit, hat, and dignitie of a cardinal, with all ceremonies to it appertaining: which promotion, the late right despitefuling into the unreasonable ambitious mind of the man, that even from his youth was ever to checke at the highest: and also right well ascertained with what intollerable pride his head should soon be swollen under such a hat: did therefore all his life long keepe this prelat backe from that presumptuous estate. But now the king being young and the regent his friend, he obtained his purpose, to his great profit, and the impoverishing of the spiritualitie of his realme. For by a bull legantine, which he purchased from Rome, he gathered so much treasure, that no man in manner had mouie but he: so that he was called the rich cardinal of Winchester.

After that the lord regent was arrived in France, the lord of Anstian, marshall of Britaine, assembled a great companie of the British nation, which fortified and repaired the towne of Pontorion: and after, the said marshall, with a thousand men, entered into the countrie of Constantine, and comming before the towne of Arranches, was encountered by the Englishmen of that garrison; & after long fight, his people were put to the worse, chased, and discomfited, and he himselfe taken prisoner in the field. The duke of Bedford, hearing that the towne of Pontorion, situate within two leagues of Pont Saint Michel, was well fortified, and strongly defended, sent thither the earle of Warwicke, accompanied with the lord Scales, and other valiant captains and souldiers, to the number of seaven thousand men, to besiege the towne; who so intrenched it on euerie side, that no man could scale neither in nor out.

The siege thus long continuing, vittels began to war scant in the English armie: wherefore the lord Scales, having in his companie sir John Harpeleite bailiffe of Constantine, sir William Brearton bailiffe of Caen, sir Rafe Tesson, sir John Carbonell, and three thousand good men of warre, departed from the siege to get vittels, powder, and other things necessary for their purpose. And as they were returning with their carriages by the sea coast, nere to Saint Michaels Mount, they suddenly were encountered by their enemies, whereof were chiefe, the baron of Coloses, the lord Daulebois, captaine of the said Mount, the lord Mountabon, the lord Pontburcher, the lord of Chateaugiron, the lord of Anthgnat, the lord of Chateaublan, with six thousand men of warre.

The lord Scales and his companie, perceiving themselves beset on the one side with the sea, & on the other with their enemies, alighted from their horses, and like courageous persons, there in an unspeakable furie, set on their enemies. The fight was fierce & cruel. The Englishmen kept themselves close together; so that their enemies could get no advantage of them. At the last, the lord Scales cried, St. George they die. Whereupon, the Englishmen took such courage, and the Frenchmen that fought before, were so dismayed, that they began to flee in deed. The Englishmen leaped on horse-backe, and followed them so, that they slew and took aboute eleven hundred persons, among the which were taken the baron of Coloses, the vicount of Rone, and others. The lord of Chateaugiron, with a Scottish captaine, & divers other men of name were slaine. After this victorie, the lord Scales with his vittels, provision, and prisoners, returned to the siege, where he was of the earle and other noble men toioulde received.

Whilste the siege continued thus before Pontorion, Christopher Hanson, and other souldiers of the garrison of Saint Susan, made a rode into the countrie of Anjou, and came to a castell called Hamfort, which castell was so pitulie scaled, that the capteine within, and his companie, were taken or slaine, before they knew of their enemies approaching. When knowledge hereof was given unto the Frenchmen which were assembled, to the number of twentie thousand, to raise the siege that late before Pontorson, they left that enterprise, and went to recover the said castell of Ramfort, and so comming before it, planted their siege so on each side of it, that at length by composition the Englishmen within, doubting to be taken by force, rendered by the castell, having libertie to depart with bag and baggage.

Shortlie after, the lord of Rair, calling himselfe lieutenant generall for the Dolphin, entered into Spain with an armie of three thousand men, and by force toke the castell of Malicorne, wherof was capteine an Englishman, one Oliver Waterhouse. In like manner, they toke the little castell of Lude, and therein William Blackborne, lieutenant for William Gladale esquire. After this, the Frenchmen returned backe to the Dolphin, and kept not on their journeie to Pontorson, for that they understood by es-pials, that the earle of Marlowe, and the Englishmen there, determined to give them battell, if they once attempted to raise the siege. They within the towne, being straitlie besieged, perceiving no likelihood of succours, and seeing the English armie daie-lie increase, fell to treatie for doubt to be taken by force, and so rendered the towne upon condition, that they might depart with houlse and harnesse onelie.
Which being granted to them, the earle like a valiant capteine entered into the towne, and there appointed for governors, the lord Ros, and the lord Talbot, and leaving there a convenient garrison, returned to the lord regent.

After the taking of this towne of Pontorson, there was a league, and treatie concluded betwix the regent and the duke of Britaine; by the articles of which agreement, the townes of Pontorson and saint James de Beuron were beaten downe to the ground and razed. When the lord of Rair was departed out of Spaine (as ye have heard) Christopher Hanson, Philip Gough, Martin Goodricke, called the Scaler, toke by stealth the castell of saint Laurence de Spottiers. At the same time, when the capteine and the most part of his companie were gone forth to heare masse, in a church over against the same castell, and keeping themselves close, till the capteine returned, they toke him as he was entered within the first gate, & so was this castell stuffed with Englishmen, and capteine thereof was appointed sir William Adhall.

The same season, sir John Fastolfe, gouvernour of the countries of Anjou and Spaine, assembled a great puissance of men warre, and laid siege before the castell of saint Owen Disrais, beside the towne of Laual; and after he had laine there ten daies, the castell was delivered, they within departing with their lives and armour onelie to them granted, by the tenor of the composition, which they toke with the same sir John Fastolfe. After the winning of this castell, the Englishmen remoued to the strong castell of Craule, and after twelue daies, they within offered to yield the castell by a daie, if they were not succoured by the Dolphin or his power: the offer was taken and pledges deliuered.

When sir John Fastolfe returned in post to the regent, aduertising him of this composition and agreement; wherefore, the said regent raised a great power to fight with the Frenchmen at the daie appointed, and in his companie were the earles of Portaigne and Marlowe, the lord Ros and Talbot, sir John Fastolfe, sir John Aubmond, sir John Hatchiffe, and diuerse other, to the number of twen-tie thousand men; and so marched forwards, in hope to meet and joine battell with their aduersaries. But the French power, being not far off from the place, durst not approach. Wherefore, the regent sent to sir John Fastolfe incontinentlie, to retrieve the castell: but they within (contrarie to promise and appointment) had secretly vittelled & manned the place, and so forsaking the pledges and their fellowes in armes, refused to render the fortresse: wherefore, the pledges were brought before their sight, and there before the castell openly put to death.

After this the lord Talbot was made gouernour of Anjou and Spaine, and sir John Fastolfe was assigned to an other place. This lord Talbot, being both of noble birth, and of valiant courage, after his comming into France, obtained so many glorious victories of his enemies, that his onelie name was yet so dreadfull to the French nation, and much renowned amongst all other people. This justie and most valiant capteine entered into Spaine, where he slue men, destroyed castles, burnt townes, and in conclusion suddenly toke the towne of Laual. The lord Lochar, and diuerse other, withdrew into the castell, in the which they were so straitlie besieged, that in the end they agreed to paye the lord Talbot an hundred thousand crownes, for licence to depart, with all their bag and baggage.

When this castell was delivered to the keeping of Gilbert Hallsall, which after was slaine at the siege of Dyleance, in whose place Matthew Gough was made capteine there: who being at the iourneie of Scutis, by treason of a miller that kept a mill adjoining to the wall, the Frenchmen entered into the towne, and brought it againe into their subiection.
Now the duke of Bedford hearing that the towne of Pontargis, in the territoirie of Dyleance, was but scantlie kept, and not thoroughlie furnished, sent the earle of Suffolk, with his brother sir John Pole, and sir Henrie Bisset, having in their companie a sir thousand men, to assalt that towne; but when they came thither and found the towne both well manned and stronglie fortified, contrarie to their expectation, they successed from giving the assault, and onelie laid their siege round about it.

The earle of Marlowe was appointed to lie with a great number of men of warre, at S. Sparthelines de Archempe, to encounter the Frenchmen, if they would attempt to aid or vittell those within the towne. The situation of this towne was such, that by reason of waters and marshes, the English armie must needs sever it selfe into three parts, so that the one could not easilie helpe the other, but either by boats or bidges. This siege continued aboue two moneths, so that in the meane time the Frenchmen had leasure to prouide for the succour thereof; and so it came to passe, that the constable of France Arthur of Britaine, the lord Boisac one of the marshals, Stephan la Hire, Pothon de Saintreilles, the lord Craule, and diuerse others, to the number of three thousand horsemen, were sent forth by the Dolphin.

These pitulie in the night season came on that sode, where sir John de la Pole and sir Henrie Bisset laie, whome they found so out of order, and without good watch, that the Frenchmen entered into their lodgings, slue many in their beds, and spared none, for their resistance was but small. Sir John de la Pole with his horse saved himselfe, and sir Henrie Bisset escaped by a boat, and eight other with him.
The residue lying in plumpes, and straining to passe by a bidge of timber, the which was pestered with peeasse of the multitude, brake, and so there were a great number drowned: insomuch that there were

The earle of Warwicke hearing of this misfortune, departed from saint Mathelines with all speed, and comming before Pontargis, offered battell to the French capitaine, which answered, that they had maner and vittelles the towne, and intended to do no more at that time. The Englishmen hereupon came forth backe againe with all their ordnance to the duke of Bedford, who had not the French so great cause to vaunt of their successe: for at this verie time, Sir Nicholas Burdet, appointed by the duke of Sum-Sir Nicholas Burdet, Polydor.
 meret to indamage his enemies in the coaste of Brittain, sent his men into euery part, working all the displeasure to the people that might be devised. The countie, through which he passed, was wasted: the townes were burnt, the houses spoiled, and great number of prisoners taken, the small villages were sacked, and the wasted townes ransomed, and so without hurt or damage the said Sir Nicholas Burdet returned into Normantie.

These newes being signified to the constable, and other the French capitaine, allayed their great wrath and triumphant joy, conceived for the victory of Pontargis, that both they were to attempte and further enterprises against the English nation. But the duke of Alanson, who (as ye haue heard) was latelye deliuered out of captiuitie, returned againe the pulled spirits of the Dolphin, and somewhat aduanced, in hope of good speed, the fainting hartes of his capitaine; so that (some occasion offered) they determined to atchieue a notable feat (as they took it) against the Englishmen, which was the recoverye of the citie of Orlans out of their hands: for so it happened, that diuers of the chiefe rulers in that citie, and namelie diuerse spirittuall persons, meaning to revolt to the Dolphin the, aduertised him by letters of their whole minde, which letters were conueied vnto him by certēne friers.

The Dolphin glad of those newes, appointed the lord de la Beche and Faget, marshall of France, accompanied with the lords of Mount Jehan, of Beuil, Dornall, Lofle, Beaumanoir, the Bre, and his brother Guillaime, with five hundred other valiant capitaine and souldiers, to the accomplishing of this enterprise; who comming thither at the date assigned, in the night season approached towards the walles, making a little fire on an hill, in sight of the towne, to signifie their comming, which perceiued by the citizens that nere to the great church were watching for the same, a burning cresset was shewed out of the steeple, which suddenlye was put out and quenched. That needeth manie wordes.

Orlans lost by treason of the citizens.

The capitaine on horsebacke came to the gate, the traitors within shew the porters and watchmen, and let in their friends, whereby the French entered first, and the men of armes waited at the barriers, to the intent that if need required, they might fight it out in open field. Hereby manie Englishmen were slaine, & a great crye and garboile raised through the towne, as in such surprises is wont. The cause of this mischance was not knowne to any, but onelie to the conspirators; for the remnant of the citizens being no partakers, imagined, that the Englishmen had made haucke in the towne, and put all to the sword. The Englishmen on the other side iudged, that the citizens had begun some new rebellion against them, or else had fallen amongst themselves.

The earle of Suffolke, which was gouernour of the towne, hauing perfect knowledge by such as escaped from the wals, how the matter went, withdrew without any tarriance into the castell, which standeth at the gate of saint Vincent, thereof was constable Thomas Colver esquier, whither also fled manie Englishmen; so as for byging of the enimie, prease of the number, and lacke of vittells, they could not haue endured long: wherefore they pitifully sent a messenger to the lord Talbot, which then late at Alanson, certifieng him in how hard a case they were. The lord Talbot hearing these newes, like a careful capitaine in all hast assembled together about seuen hundred men, & in the evening departed from Alanson, so as in the morning he came to a castell called Cuiorch, two miles from Orlans, and there staid a while, till he had sent out Mathew Cough as an espiall, to vnderstand how the Frenchmen demeaned themselves.

Mathew Cough so well sped his business, that prustie in the night he came into the castell, where he learned that the Frenchmen were negligent to see themselves without taking heed to their watch, as though they had bene out of all danger: which well vnderstood, he returned againe, and within a mile of the citie met the lord Talbot, and the lord Stales, and opened vnto them all things, according to his credence. The lords then, to make hast in the matter, because the date approached, with all speed possible came to the posterne gate, and alighting from their horses, about six of the clocke in the morning, they issued out of the castell, crying saint George, Talbot.

The Frenchmen being thus suddenlye taken, were so amazed, in so much that some of them, being not out of their beds, got vp in their shifts, and leapt vnder the walles. Other ran naked out of the gates to save their liues, leauing all their apparell, horses, armour, and riches behind them, none was hurt but such as resisted. A hard shift was made on all hands for safetie of life, & hapie was he that could find a place of refuge where to lurke vnsifted and vnhurt of the enimie; who in the execution of their vengeance were so petympoize, that it was a matter of great difficultie or rather impossibilitie to escape their force. To be short, there were slaine and taken, the number of foure hundred gentlemen, the priuat souldiers were frankelie let go. After this, inquisition was made of the authors of the treason, and there were found & condemned thirtie citizens, twentie priests, and sixtēne friers, who according to their demerits were all hanged.

The citie of Orlans being thus recovered, the lord Talbot returned to Alanson, and shortlye after the earle of Warwicke departed into England, to be gouernour of the young king, in stead of Thomas duke of Excester, latelye departed to God, and then was the lord Thomas Montacute earle of Salisburie sent into France, to supplie the roome of the said earle of Warwicke, who landed at Calis with five thousand men, and so came to the duke of Bedford as then lying in Paris, where they fell in counsell together concerning the affaires of France, and namelie the earle of Salisburie began manuellouslie to shew the gainting of the citie & countrie of Orlance.

This earle was the man at that time, by whose wit, strength, and policie, the English name was much fearefull and terrible to the French nation, which of himselfe might both appoint, command, and do all things in manner at his pleasure, in whose power (as it appeares after his death) a great part of the conquest consisted: for, merlie, he was a man both painefull, diligent, and ready to withstand all dangerous chanches that were at hand, prompt in counsell, and of courage inuincible, so that in no one man, men put more trust; no; any singular person wote the parts so much of all men.

Hereupon, after this great enterprise had long bene debated in the priue counsell, the earle of Salisburie demie therein was of them all granted and allowed, so that he being replenished with good hope of victory, and furnished with artillerie & munition apperapertaining to so great an enterprise, accompanied with the earle of Suffolke, and the lord Talbot, and with a valiant armie, to the number of ten thousand men, departed from Paris, and passed through the countie of Beaulieu. There he took by assault, the towne of Crenelle, and within five daies after had the castell deliuered unto him, by them that were fled into it for their safegard. He also took the towne of Baugencie, suffering every man which would be come subiect to the king of England, to intioie their lands and goods. The towne of Meun upon Loire, and Jargeaulx, hearing of these doings, presented to them the keys of their towne upon like agreement. [About this time in this 4 2 8, the towne of Baunts and territories there with a fearefull earthquake were shaken, houses castles and strong buildings, in such terrour, as it was thought the end of the world had bene come.]

After this, in the moneth of September the earle came before the citie of Dileance, and planted his siege on the one side of the river of Loire, but before his coming, the ballard of Dileance, the bishop of the citie, and a great number of Scots, hearing of the earles intent, made diuerse fortifications about the towne, and destroyed the suburbs, in which were twelve parish churches, and foure orders of friers. They cut also downe all the vines, trees, and bushes, within five leagues of the citie, so that the Englishmen should haue neither refuge nor succour.

After the siege had continued full three weekes, the ballard of Dileance issued out of the gate of the bridge, and fought with the Englishmen; but they received him with so fierce and terrible strokes, that he was with all his companie compelled to retire and flee backe into the citie. But the Englishmen followed so fast, in killing and taking of their enemies, that they entered with them. ¶ The bulwourke of the bridge, with a great tower standing at the end of the same, was taken incontinentlie by the Englishmen, who behaued themselves right valiantlie vnder the conduct of their courageous capteine, as at this assault, so in diuerse skirmishes against the French; partly to keepe possession of that which Henrie the sixt had by his magnanimitie & puissance achieved, as also to enlarge the same. But all helped not. For who can hold that which will atwaie? In so much that some cities by fraudulent practises, other some by martiall prowesse were recovered by the French, to the great discouragement of the English and the appalling of their spirits; whose hope was now dashed partly by their great losses and discomfitures (as after you shall heare) but chiefly by the death of the late deceased Henrie their victorious king; as Chr. Okland herie true lie and agreeable to the storie noteth:

Dolphinus, comit' que eius fera praelia tentant, Fraude domi capiant alias, virtute recepta Sunt urbes alia quiddam, sublapsa referunt Anglum spes retro, languescere pectora dicat, Quippe erat Henricus quintus, dux strenuus olim, Mortuum: hinc damni grauior causa atque doloris.

In this conflict, manie Frenchmen were taken, but moze were slaine, and the keeping of the towne and bulwourke was committed to William Glasdale esquier. By the taking of this bridge the passage was stopped, that neither men nor vittels could go or come by that waie. After this, the earle caused certeine bulwokes to be made round about the towne, casting trenches betwene the one and the other, laicng ordinance in euerie place where he saw that any batterie might be deuised. When they within saw that they were enuironed with fortresses and ordinance, they laid gun against gun, and fortified towers against bulwokes, and within cast new rampiers, and fortified themselves as stronglie as might be deuised.

The ballard of Dileance and the fire were appointed to see the walles and watches kept, and the bishop saw that the inhabitants within the citie were put in good order, and that vittels were not vainelie spent. In the tower that was taken at the bridge end (as before you haue heard) there was an high chamber, hauing a grate full of barres of iron, by the which a man might looke all the length of the bridge into the citie; at which grate manie of the 10 these capteins stood manie times, biewing the citie, and deuising in what place it was best to giue the assault. They within the citie well perceived this watching hole, and laid a peece of ordinance directlie against the window.

It so chanced, that the nine and fiftith daie after the siege was laid, the earle of Salisburie, sir Thomas Cargraue, and William Glasdale, with diuerse other went into the said tower, and so into the high chamber, and looked out at the grate, and within a short space, the sonne of the maister-gunner, perceiving men looking out at the window, took his match (as his father had taught him) who was gone downe to dinner, and fired the gun; the shot whereof brake, and shinered the iron barres of the grate, so that one of the same bars strake the earle so violently on the head, that it stroke atwaie one of his eyes, and the side of his cheeke. Sir Thomas Cargraue was likewise stricken, and died within two daies.

The earle was conueied to Meun on Loire, where 30 after eight daies he likewise departed this world, whose bodie was conueied into England with all funerall appointment, and buried at Wilsam by his progenitois, leaving behind him an onelie daughter named Alice, married to Richard Beuill, sonne to Rafe earle of Westmerland, of whose moze shall be said hereafter. The damage that the realme of England receiued by the losse of this noble man, manifestlie appeared; in that immediatlie after his death, the prosperous good lucke, which had followed the 40 English nation, began to decline, and the glorie of their victories gotten in the parties beyond the sea fell in decaye.

Though all men were sorrowfull for his death, yet the duke of Bedford was most stricken with heavinesse, as he that had lost his onelie right hand, and chiefe aid in time of necessitie. But sith that dead men cannot helpe the chances of men that be liuing, he like a prudent gouernour appointed the earle of Suffolke to be his lieutenant and capteine of the siege, and joined with him the lord Scroales, the lord Talbot, sir John Fastolfe, and diuerse other right valiant capteins. These persons caused bastilles to be made round about the citie, and lest nothing vnattempted, that might aduance their purpose, which to bring to wished effect there was not arie want, as of no cautelous policie, so of no valiant enterprise, tending to the enemies overthrow.

In the Lent season, vittels and artillerie began to waiescant in the English campe, wherefore the earle 60 of Suffolke appointed sir John Fastolfe, sir Thomas Kampston, and sir Philip Hall, with their retinues, to ride to Paris, to the lord regent, to informe him of their lacke, who incontinentlie vpon that information prouided vittels, artillerie, and munitions necessarie, and lobed therewith manie chariots, carts, and horses: and for the sure conueiung of the same, he appointed sir Simon Dordier, prouost of Paris, with the gard of the citie, and diuerse of his owne household-feruants to accompanie sir John Fastolfe and his complices, to the armie lieng at the siege of Dileance. They were in all to the number of sixtene hundred men, of the which there were not past five or six hundred Englishmen.

ris, came to Gernille in Beaulle, and in a morning earlie, in a great frost, they departed from thence toward the siege; and when they came to a towne called Roubaie, in the lands of Beaulle, they perceived their enemies coming towards them, being to the number of nine or ten thousand of Frenchmen and Scots, of whom were capitaine Charles of Clermont, sonne to the duke of Bourbon then being prisoner in England; sir William Stewart constable of Scotland, a little before deliuered out of captivity, the earle of Derby, the lord John Maudslowe, the Widame of Chartres, the lord of Tournes, the lord of Lohar, the lord of Egler, the lord of Beauieu, the bastard Tremolle, and manie other valiant capitaine.

Wherefore sir John Fastolfe set all his companie in good order of battell, and pitched stakes before euerie archer, to breake the force of the horsemen. At their backes they set all the wagons and carriages, and within them they tied all their horses. In this manner stood they still, abiding the assault of their enemies. The Frenchmen by reason of their great number, thinking themselves sure of the victorie, eagerly set on the Englishmen, which with great force them received, and themselves manfully defended. At length, after long and cruell fight, the Englishmen drove backe and vanquished the proud Frenchmen, a compelled them to flee. In this conflict were slain the lord William Stewart constable of Scotland, and his brother the lord Donalle, the lord Chateaubrian, sir John Baskot, and other Frenchmen and Scots, to the number of five and twentie hundred, and aboute eleuen hundred taken prisoners, although the French writers affirme the number lesse.

After this fortunate victorie, sir John Fastolfe and his companie (having lost no one man of any reputation) with all their carriages, vittels, and prisoners, marched forth and came to the English campe before Dyleance, where they were safely received, and highly commended for their valiance and worthy prowesse shewed in the battell; the which because most part of the carriage was herring and lenton stiffe, the Frenchmen called it the battell of herrings. The earle of Suffolke being thus vittelled, continued the siege, and euerie daie almost skirmished with the Frenchmen within, who (at length being in despair of all succours) offered to treat, and in conclusion, to save themselves and the citie from captivity of their enemies, they desired to submit the citie, themselves, and all theirs under the obedience of Philip duke of Burgogny, because he was extract out of the stocke and blood roiall of the ancient kings of France, thinking by this means (as they did in deed) to breake or diminish the great amitie betweene the Englishmen and him.

This offer was signified by them unto the duke of Burgogny, who with thanks certified them againe, that he would gladly receive them, if the lord regent would therewith be contented. Whereupon he dispatched messengers to the duke of Bedford, who though some counselled that it should be verie good and necessarie for him to agree to that manner of yielding; yet he and other thought it neither convenient nor honourable, that a citie so long besieged by the king of England, should be deliuered unto any other prince, than to him, or to his regent, for that might be a verie bad president to other townes in any like case. Whereupon the regent answered the Burgognyan ambassadoys: that after so long a siege on his part, and obstinate resistance of theirs, he might not receive rendering and conditions at their appointment. At this answer the duke being the groine, as concluding that our side should envie his glorie, or not to be so forward in advancing his honour as he would have it.

In time of this siege at Dyleance (French writers saye) the first weeke of March 1428, unto Charles the Dolphin, at Chinon where he was in verie great care and studie how to winne against the English nation, by one Peter Badiouart capitaine of Gasconie, (made after marshall of France by the Dolphin's creation) was carried a pretty French of an eightieth yeeres old, called Jone Dompzin, the name of his father (a soyle shepheard) James of Arc, and Isabell his mother, brought up by peltrie in their trade of keeping cat-tell, borne at Dompzin (wherefore reported by Bale Jone Dompzin) upon Denise in Lorraine within the diocesse of Thoul. His name was the counted like some, of person stronglike made and manlie, of courage great, hardie, and stout withall, an understander of counsels though he were not at them, great semblance of chastitie both of bodie and behaviour, the name of Jesus in his mouth about all his businesses, humble, obedient, and fasting diuerse daies in the weeke. A person (as their bookes make him) raised up by power diuine, onely for succour to the French estate then depelle in distresse, in whom, for planning a credit the rather, first the companie that toward the Dolphin did conduct him, through places all dangerous, as holden by the English, where the neuer was afore, all the waie and by nightertale safely did the lead: then at the Dolphins sending by his assignement, from saint Batharins church of Fierbois in Touraine (where the neuer had bene and knew not) in a secret place there among old iron, appointed the his sword to be sought out and brought him, that with five shoures delices was grauen on both sides, therewith he fought & did manie slaughters by his owne hands. On what far rode he in armour cap a pie & mulleted as a man, before him an ensigne all white, wherein was Jesus Christ painted with a shoure delice in his hand.

Unto the Dolphin into his gallerie when first he was brought, and he shadowing himselfe behind, setting other gate lords before him to trie his cunning from all the companie, with a salutation (that indeed marvell all the matter) he pickt him out alone, who thereupon had him to the end of the gallerie, where he held him an houre in secret and private talke, that of his private chamber was thought verie long, and therefore would have broken it off; but he made them a signe to let him see on. In which (among other) as likelike it was, the Satour unto him the singular feats (for sooth) given him to understand by revelation diuine, that in vertue of that sword he should achieve, which were, how with hono: and victorie he would raise the siege at Dyleance, set him in state of the crowne of France, and drive the English out of the countie, thereby he to intole the kingdome alone. Whereupon he hartens at full, appointed him a sufficient armie with absolute power to lead them, and they obedientlie to do as he had them. Then fell he to worke, and first defeated indeed the siege at Dyleance, by and by encouraged him to crowne himselfe king of France at Reims, that a little before from the English he had wonne. Thus after pursued the manie bold enterprises to our great displeasure a two yeares together, for the time he kept in state until he were taken and for herse and withcherte burned: as in particularities hereafter followeth. But in his prime time he armed at all points (like a folie capitaine) roade from Poitiers to Blois, and there found men of warre, vittels, and munition, readie to be conueied to Dyleance.

Here was it knowne that the Englishmen kept not so diligent watch as they had bene accustomed to do, and therefore this man (with other French capitaine) comming forward in the dead time of the night night, and in a great raine and thunder entred into the citie with all their vittels, artillerie, and other necessaries provisions. The next daie the Englishmen boldie assaunted the towne, but the Frenchmen defended the walles so, as no great feat worthe of memorie chanced that daie betwixt them, though the Frenchmen were amazed at the valiant attempt of the Englishmen, wherupon the baron of Orlance gaue knowledge to the duke of Alanson, in what danger the towne stood without his present helpe, who comming within two leagues of the citie, gaue knowledge to them within, that they should be ready the next daie to receiue him.

This accordingly was accomplished: for the Englishmen willingly suffered him and his armie also to enter, supposing that it should be for their advantage to haue so great a multitude to enter the citie, wherby their vittels (whereof they within had great scarcitie) might the sooner be consumed. On the next daie in the morning, the Frenchmen altogether issued out of the towne, wone by assault the bastille of saint Lou, and set it on fire. And after they likewise assaulted the tower at the bridge foot, which was manfully defended. But the Frenchmen (more in number) at length took it, yet the lord Talbot could come to the succours, in the which William Gladel dale the capteine was slaine, with the lord Hollins, and lord Poinsings also.

The Frenchmen pushed vp. with this good lucke, fetched a compass about, and in good order of battell marched toward the bastille, which was in the keeping of the lord Talbot: the which upon the enemies approach, like a capteine without all feare or dread of that great multitude, issued forth against them, and gaue them so sharpe an encounter, that they not able to withstand his puissance, fled (like sheepe before the wolfe) againe into the citie, with great losse of men and small artillerie. Of Englishmen were lost in the two battiles, to the number of six hundred persons, or thereabout, though the French writers multiplie this number of hundreds to thousands; as their manner is.

The earle of Suffolke, the lord Talbot, the lord Scales, and other captains assembled together in counsell, and after causes shewed to and fro, it was amongst them determined to leaue their fortresses and battiles, and to assemble in the plaine field, and there to abide all the daie, to see if the Frenchmen would issue forth to fight with them. This conclusion taken was accordingly executed: but when the Frenchmen durst not once come forth to shew their heads, the Englishmen set fire of their lodgings, and departed in good order of battell from Orlance. The next daie, which was the eight daie of Maie, the earle of Suffolke rode to Jargeaur with foure hundred Englishmen, and the lord Talbot with an other companie returned to Mehun. And after he had fortified that towne, he went to the towne of Lauall, & towne it, together with the castell, for punishing the townsmen for their cankered obstinacie against them.

Thus when the Englishmen had severed themselves into garrisons, the duke of Alanson, the baron of Orlance, Jone le Pussell, the lord Gaiw court, and diuerse other captains of the Frenchmen, came the twelfth daie of June, before the towne of Jargeaur, where the earle of Suffolke and his two brethren sojourned, & gaue to the towne so fierce an assault on thre parts, that Poiton de Sentrailes, perceiving an other part bold of defendants, scaled the wals on that side, and without difficultie took the towne, and slue sir Alexander Poole, brother to the earle, and manie other, to the number of two hundred. But the Frenchmen gained not much thereby, for they lost thre hundred good men and more. Of the Englishmen fortie were taken, with the earle and his other brother named John.

The Frenchmen, as they returned to Orlance, fell at variance for their prisoners, and slue them all, saving the earle and his brother. Shortly after, the same French armie came to Mehun, where they took the tower at the bridge foot, and put therein a garrison. From thence they remoued to Baugencie, and constrained them that were within the towne to yeld, upon condition they might depart with bag and baggage. At the same place there came to the duke of Alanson, the new constable Arthur of Britaine, and with him the lord Walbret, and other. Also after this the earle of Wandosme came to them, so that by the daile repaire of such as assembled together to strengthen the French part, they were in all to the number betwene twentie and thre and twentie thousand men.

All which being once ioined in one armie, shortly after fought with the lord Talbot (who had with him not past six thousand men) nere vnto a village in Beaulle called Pataie: at which battell the charge was giuen by the French so vpon a sudden, that the Englishmen had not leisure to put themselves in a rate, after they had put up their stakes before their archers, so that there was no remedie but to fight at aduventure. This battell continued by the space of thre long houres: for the Englishmen, though they were overpressed with multitude of their enemies, yet they neuer fled backe one foot, till their capteine the lord Talbot was sore wounded at the backe, and so taken.

When their hearts began to faint, and they fled, in which flight were slaine aboue twelue hundred, and fortie taken, of whome the lord Talbot, the lord Scales, the lord Hungerford, & sir Thomas Kampston were chiefe. Diuerse archers, after they had shot all their arrowes, hauing onelie their swords, defended themselves, and with helpe of some of their horsemen came safe to Mehun. This overthrow, and specially the taking of the lord Talbot, did not so much reioice the Frenchmen; but it did as much abash the Englishmen: so that immediatlie thereupon, the townes of Jennie, Mehun, Fort, and diuerse other, returned from the English part, and became French. From this battell departed without anie stroke striken sir John Fastolfe, the same yeare for his valiantnesse elected into the order of the garter. But for doubt of misdealing at this hunt, the duke of Bedford took from him the image of saint George, and his garter; though afterward by meanes of friends, and apparant causes of good excuse, the same were to him againe deliuered against the mind of the lord Talbot.

Charles the Dolphin that called himselfe French, perceiving fortune to smile thus vpon him, assembled a great power, and determined to conquer the citie of Reimes, that he might be there sacred, crowned, and anointed, according to the custome of his progenitors, that all men might iudge that he was by all lawes and decrees a iust and lawfull king. In his waie thitherwards he besieged the citie of Arrerre, the citizens whereof compounded with him to yeld, if they were not rescued within certeine daies. From thence he came before Trois, and after twelue daies siege had that citie deliuered vnto him, by composition, that the capteine sir Philip Hall (with his people and moneables) might depart in safetie. After that Trois was yelded, the communalte of Chaalons rebelled against sir John Aubemond their capteine, and constrained him to deliuer the towne vpon like composition. In semblable manner did they of Reimes, desiring him to giue safe conduct to all the Englishmen safelie to depart. When Reimes was belonging. They of Aurere, when the terme of their appointment was expired, submitted themselves to him; and so likewise did all the cities and townes ad-

The duke of Bedford advertised of all these doings, 10 assembled his power about him, and having together ten thousand good Englishmen (beside Normans) departed out of Paris in warlike fashion, & passing through Byie to Mondreault Ponne, sent by his herald Bedford, letters to the French king, signifying to him; that where he had (contrarie to the small conclusion accorded betwene his noble brother H. Henrie the sixt, & king Charles the first, father to him that was the usurper) by allurement of a di-velly witch, taken upon him the name, title, & dignitie of the king of France; and further had by mur-ther, stealing, craft, and deceitfull meanes, violent-lie gotten, and wrongfullie kept diuerse cities and townes belonging to the king of England his nephew; for proofe thereof he was come downe from Paris with his armie, into the countrie of Byie, by dint of sword and stroke of battell to proue his writing and cause true, willing his ennemie to chuse the place, and in the same he would giue him battell.

The new French king being come from Reimes 30 to Dampmartine, studieng how to compasse them of Paris, was halfe abashed at this message. But yet to let a good countenance on the matter, he answered the herald, that he would sooner seeke his master, than his maister should need to pursue him. The duke of Bedford hearing this answer, marched toward the king, and pitched his field in a strong place. The French king though at the first he meant to haue a bidden battell; yet when he understood that the duke was equall to him in number of people, he changed his purpose, and turned with his armie a little out of the waile. The duke of Bedford, perceiuing his faint courage, followed him by the hills and dales, till he came to a towne not far from Senlis, where he found the French king and his armie lodged; wherefore he ordered his battels like an expert chesseine in mar-tiall science, setting the archers before, and himselfe with the noblemen in the maine battell, and put the Normans on both sides for wings. The French king also ordered his battels with the aduise of his captains.

The French

Boheme.

Thus these two armies late two daies and two nights either in sight of other, without anie great doing, except a few skirmishes, wherein the dukes light horsemen did vertie valiantlie. At length in the dead of the night (as yf it were as might be) the French king brake up his campe, and fled to Byie. The duke of Bedford had much adoe to staie his people in the morning from pursuit of the French armie: but for that he mistrusted the Parisiens, he would not depart farre from that citie, and so returned thither againe. ¶ In this season pope Martin the first of that name, meaning to subdue the Bohemers that dissented from the church of Rome in matters of religion, appointed Henrie Beaufort Bishop of Winchester & cardinal of saint Eusebie, to be his legat in an armie that should invade the kingdome of Boheme, and to bring a power of men with him out of England. And because the warre touched religion, he licenced the cardinall to take the tenth part of euery spirituall dignitie, benefice, and promotion.

This matter was opened in the parlement house, and assented to: whereupon the bishop gathered the monie, and assembled foure thousand men & above, not without great grudge of the people, which daile were with tallages and aids wearied and sore burdened. As this bishop was come to Douer ready to passe the seas over into Flanders, the duke of Glocester hauing receiued letters from the duke of Bedford, containing an earnest request to releue him with some speedie aid of men of warre, was constrained to write vnto the bishop of Winchester, willing him in time of such need, when all stood upon losse or gaine, to passe with all his armie toward the duke of Bedford, to assist him against his aduersaries; which thing done, and to his honour achieved, he might performe his iourne against the vngardians Bohemers. The cardinall (though not well contented with this countermand) yet least he should run into the note of infamie, if he refused to aid the regent of France in so great a cause, passed over with his power, and brought the same vnto his cosine to the citie of Paris.

About the same season, the French king, in hope to be receiued into the townes of Campaigne and Beauuois (by reason of the fauour and good will which the inhabitants bare towards him) was come with an armie towards Campaigne. Whereof the duke of Bedford being advertised, and hauing now his host augmented with the new supplie, which the cardinall had of late brought vnto him, marched forward with great speed toward the place where he understood the French king was lodged: and coming to Senlis, he perceiued how his enemies were in-camped upon the mount Blioth, betwene Senlis and Campaigne.

Here might either armie behold the other: whereupon for the avoiding of dangers that might insue, the campes were fenced, and the battels pitched, and the fields ordered as though they should haue tried the matter by battell: but nothing was done except with skirmishes, in the which the Normans sore vexed the Frenchmen; and therefore receiued great commendations & praises of the lord regent: who undoubtedly determined to haue giuen battell to his enemies if they would haue abidden it. But after the armies had thus lien either in sight of other, for the space of two daies together, the French king not determining to aduenture in an open battell the whole chance of the game, least he might thereby receiue a perpetuall checkmate, in the night season remoued his campe, and fled to Crespe, though his number was double to the English armie. The duke of Bedford, seeing that the French king was thus cowardlie recoiled with all his power and armie, returned againe to Paris, euer suspecting the deceitfull faith of the Parisiens.

The bishop of Winchester, after that the French king was retreated backe, went into Boheme, and there did somewhat, though hostlie after without anie great praise or gaine he returned into England, more glad of his coming backe than of his aduan-cing forward. Anon after the pope vblegated him, and set an other in his place, whereof he was nothing contented. On the first daie of Nouember, being the daie of saint Leonard, king Henrie in the eight yeare of his reigne was at Westminster with all pompe and honour crowned king of this realme of England. In the same yere the French king was receiued into the towne of Campaigne, and hostlie after were the townes of Senlis and Beauuois reudered to him. And the lord Longueuall toke by selfe the castell of Amarie, and due all the Englishmen within it.

Also about the same time, the Frenchmen recoured castell Gallard south of the Englishmens hands, where the lord Barbacon was found in a dungeon, inclosed within a great grate of iron like to a little chamber, and forthwith they brake open the grate: but Barbason would not come forth; because he had given his faith and promise to one Kingston that was capteine of that fortresse for the king of England, to be true prisoner, untill the Frenchmen had sent to the same Kingston (that was departed upon such covenants as they were agreed upon at the belluerie of that fortresse) willing him to come backe againe upon safe conduct. Which at their earnest request he did, and withall discharged the lord Barbason of his oath; and so then he came forth, and remained at his libertie, to the great reioicing of the Frenchmen, which iudged that he had bene rather dead than alive all that time of his imprisonment.

About the same time also the French king sought by all meanes possible to breake the amitie betwixt the realme of England, and the house of Burgognie. Whereof the duke of Bedford having intelligence, thought it stood him upon the more earnestlie to looke to his charge; and namelie as it were an anchorhold, he determined to provide that he might defend and safelie keepe the duchie of Normandie, and therefore appointing the bishop of Terrowen and Elie, named Elwes of Lutzenburgh, chancelor for king Henrie of the realme of France, to remaine at Paris upon the defense of that citie, with a convenient number of Englishmen, he departed into Normandie, and coming to Rone, called a parlement there of the three estates of the duchie, in the which he declared manie things unto them, touching the happie life, and great freedom which they might be assured to enjoy, so long as they continued under the English obedience: and therefore he exhorted them to abide constant in their allegiance, faith, and promise made and swoyne to his noble brother king Henrie the sixt.

Whilste the duke of Bedford was busie to retaine the Normans in their due obedience, the French king departed from Senlis; and coming to the towne of Saint Denis, found it in maner desolate, so that he entered there without resistance, and lodged his armie at Mount Martyr and Amberguilliers, nere unto the citie of Paris; and from thence sent John duke of Alanson, and his sorerelle Jone la Pucelle, with three thousand light horsemen to assault the citie, and followed himselve, in hope to get it, either by force or treatie. But the English captains, everie one keeping his ward and place assigned, so manfully defended themselves, their walles and towers, with the assistance of the Parisiens, that they repelled the Frenchmen, and theyr doone Jone their great goddesse into the bottome of the towne ditch, where the lay behind the backe of an asse sore hurt in the leg, till the time that she (all filthie with urine and durt) was draine out by Gulschard of Thienzone, servant to the duke of Alanson.

The French king, perceiuing that he could not prevaile in this enterprise, left the dead bodies behind him, and taking with him the wounded captains, returned into Berrie. But in the meane waie, the inhabitants of Laigrie submitted themselves unto him. The duke of Bedford being in Normandie, hearing of this sudden attempt, with all hast possible came to Paris, where he gave manie great thanks, with high commendations unto the captains, soldiers and citizens for their assured fidelitie, great hardihood and manlie doing. Which his gentle words so encouraged the hearts of the Parisiens, that they swore, promised and concluded, to be friends for ever to the king of England and his friends, and enemies allwaies to his foes and aduersaries, making proclamation by this stile: Friends to K. Henrie, friends to the Parisiens, Enemies to England, enemies to Paris. Marie whether this was uttered from their hearts, it is hard so to saie, for the sequela of their acts seemed to proue the contrarie.

Some after these doings, came to Paris with a great companie Philip duke of Burgognie, and then upon long consultation had for the recouerie of their losses, it was agreed that the duke of Bedford should raise an armie, & that the duke of Burgognie should be his deputie, and tarie at Paris for the defense of the citie. The duke of Bedford then without any great resistance recouered againe the towne of Saint Denis, with diuerse other fortresses. And after this he sent the bastard of Clarence to laie siege to the castell of Lozlie, the which (notwithstanding the great strength thereof) after six moneths siege, was rendered by into his hands. During the siege of this castell, sir Thomas Iairrell knight, with foure hundred Englishmen departed from Courneie in Normandie, and rode by Beaunois, spoiling and waisting the countie to the suburbs of Cleremont. Whereof the earle of that towne having aduertisement, assembled all the men of warre of the garrisons adjoining, and with the same set forward to fight with the Englishmen, whom he found in a streit place nere to Beaunois.

The earle of Cleremont, perceiuing that he could not hurt them with his men of armes, by reason of the strength, came doone on foot with all his companie, and fiercelie set on the Englishmen: but by the terrible shot of the English archers, the Frenchmen in the end were constrained to flie; and the Englishmen perceiuing the matter, straight leapt on horsebacke and followed the chase. In the which were taken two hundred prisoners, and thise as manie slaine. The earle escaped by the swiftnesse of his horse. At the same season the earle of Suffolke besieging the towne of Aumarle (whereof was capteine the lord of Hambures) after foure and twentie great assaults, had the towne and castell simplie to him rendered. Thus by little and little the Englishmen recouered manie townes which before they had lost. Wholbeit about the verie same time, the Frenchmen scale the towne of Laual, by treason wrought by a miller, which keeping a mill that ioined to the wall, suffered the French to passe through his mill into the towne. Shortly after also sir Steuen de Vignolles, surnamed la Hire, toke by scaling the towne of Louiers in Normandie. The Englishmen in the cold moneth of December besieged the towne of Laigrie in the which was the Pucelle, and diuerse other good captains.

[In the moneth of Maie 1430, with a valiant man in feats of armes on the duke of Burgognions side, one Franquet and his band of three hundred soldiers, making all towards the maintenance of the siege, the Pucelle Jone and a foure hundred with hir did meet. In great courage and force did she and hir people sundrie times assaile him, but he with his (though much vnder in number) by meanes of his archers in good order set, did so hardlie withstand them, that for the first and second push the rather lost than won: Whereat this captiuesse striken into a fretting chafe, called out in all hast the garrison of Laigrie, and from other the forts thereabout, who thicke and threefold came doone with might and maine, in armour and number so far exceeding Franquets, that though they had done hir much hurt in hir horsemen; yet by the verie multitude were they oppressed, most in hir furie put to the sword; & as for Franquet that woorthie capteine himselve, hir rage not appeased, till out of hand she had his head stroken off: contrarie to all manhood (but she was a woman, if she were that) & contrarie to common right & law of armes. The man for his merits was verie much lamented, and she by hir mallice then found of what spirit besieged.

After this the duke of Burgognie accompanied with the earles of Arundell, and Suffolke, and the lord John of Lutzenburgh besieged the towne of Campieigne with a great puissance. This towne was well walled, manned, and bittelled, so that the besiegers were constrained to cast trenches, and make mines, for otherwise they saw not how to compasse their purpose. In the meane time it happened in the night of the Ascension of our Lord, that Ponton de Saintreilles, Jone la Pusell, and five or six hundred men of armes issued out by the bridge toward Pont-decier, intending to set fire in the tents and lodgings of the lord Batodo de Poelle.

In this yeare of our Lord, among diuerse notable men of learning and knowledge, one Richard Fleming, English borne, a doctor of diuinitie professed in Orford, did flourish: who by the prouidence of God grew in such fauour with this king Henrie the first, & the nobles nere & about him, that he was preferred to the bishops see of Lincolne. This man founded Lincolne college in Orford, in which vniuersitie he had bene a profitable student. Diuerse bookes he wrote (as the vniuersitie librarie doth beare witness) whereof these following haue bene scene under their names and titles: to wit: A protestation against the Spaniards, the Frenchmen, and the Scots, made in the general counsell holden at Sens: one booke of the Etymologie of England; besides diuerse other treatises, as Gefner reporteth Ex bibliotheca Oxonijs, aforesaid.]

At the verie same time that Campieigne was besieged (as before is said) sir John of Lutzenburgh, with eight other gentlemen, chanced to be nere unto the lodging of the said lord Batodo, where they espied the Frenchmen, which began to cut downe tents, overthrow paullions, & kill men in their beds: whereupon they with all speed assembled a great number of men, as well English as Burgognions, and courageously set on the Frenchmen, and in the end beat them backe into the towne, so that they fled so fast that one letted another, as they would haue entered. In the chase and pursute was the Pusell taken, with diuerse other, besides those that were slaine, which were no small number. Diuerse were hurt also on both parts. Among the Englishmen, sir John Pontgomerie had his arme broken, and sir John Steward was shot into the thigh with a quarell.

Chroniques
de Britaigne.

[As before ye haue heard somewhat of this damselfs strange beginning and proceedings, so with the ending of all such miraclemongers doth (for the most part) plainelie decipher the vertue and power that they worke, by hir shall ye be aduertised what at last became of hir; cast your opinions as ye haue cause. Of this louers (the Frenchmen) reporteth one, how in Campieigne thus besieged, Guillaume de Flaue the capteine hauing sold hir aforesaid to the lord of Lutzenburgh, under colour of halting hir with a band out of the towne towards their king, for him with speed to come and leaue the siege there, so gotten hir forth he shut the gates after hir, when anon by the Burgognians set upon and overmarcht in the conflict she was taken: marie yet (all things accounted) to no small maruell how it could come so to passe, had she bene of any deuotion or of true beleefe, and no false miscreant, but all holie as she made it. For earlie that morning she gat hir to saint James church, confessed hir, and receiued hir maker (as the booke formes it) and after setting hir selfe to a pillar, manie of the townemen that with a five or six score of their children stood about there to see hir, unto them (quod she) Good children and my dere friends, I tell you plaine one hath sold me. I am betrayed and horrible shall be deliuered to death; I beseech you praye to

God for me, for I shall neuer haue moze power to do service either to the king or to the realme of France againe.

Saith another booke, she was intrapt by a Picard capteine of Spoilons, who sold that citie to the duke of Burgognie, and he then put it ouer into the hands of the lord of Lutzenburgh, so by that meanes the Burgognians appoched and besieged Campieigne, for succour whereof as damself Jone with hir capteins from Laigrie was thither come, and daile to the English gaue manie a hot skirmish, so happened it one a daie in an outfallie that she made by a Picard of the lord of Lutzenburghs hand, in the fiercest of hir fight she was taken, and by him by and by to his lord presented, who sold hir ouer againe to the English, who for witchcraft and sorcerie burnt hir at Rone. Tillet telleth it thus, that she was caught at Campieigne by one of the earle of Aigneis soldiers, from him had to Beaurevoir castell, where kept a thre months, she was after for ten thousand pounds in monie and thre hundred pounds rent (all Tillet) sold into the English hands.

In which for hir pranks so vnconuoth and suspicious, the lord regent by Peter Chauchon bishop of Beanois (in whose diocesse she was taken) caused hir life and beleefe, after order of law to be inquired upon and examined. Wherein found though a virgin, yet first shamefullie reuealing hir sex abominable in acts and apparell to haue counterfeited mankind, and then all damnable faithlesse, to be a pernicious instrument to hostilitie and bloudshed in diuelish witchcraft and sorcerie, sentence accordingly was pronounced against hir. Holbeite upon humble confession of hir iniquities with a counterfeit contrition pretending a carefull sorrow for the same, execution spared and all mollified into this, that from thenceforth she should cast off hir vnnatural wearing of mans abilliments, and keepe hir to garments of hir owne kind, abjure hir pernicious practises of sorcerie and witcherie, and haue life and leasure in perpetual prison to bewaile hir misdeeds. Which to performe (according to the manner of abjuratioun) a solemn oath verie gladlie she toke.

But herein (God helpe vs) she fullie afoze possessed of the fiend, not able to hold hir in anie towarde of grace, falling straight waie into hir former abominations (and yet seeking to eetch out life as long as she might) stak not (though the shift were shamefull) to confesse hir selfe a strumpet, and unmarried as she was) to be withchild. For trial, the lord regents lenitie gaue hir nine moneths staie, at the end whereof the found herein as false as wicked in the rest, an eight daies after, vpon a further definitive sentence declared against hir to be relapse and a renouner of hir oath and repentance, was she thereupon deliuered ouer to secular power, and so executed by consumption of fire in the old market place at Rone, in the selfe same stead where now saint Michaels church stands, hir ashes afoztoward without the towne walls shaken into the wind. Now recounting altogether, hir passioall bringing by, rude without any vertuous instruction, hir campestrall conuersation with wicked spirits, whome in hir first salutation to Charles the Dolphin, she offered to be our Ladie, saint Katharine, and saint Annes, that in this behalfe came and gaue hir commandments from God hir maker, as she kept hir fathers lambs in the fields (where saints in warres among christen men were (be true) neuer so parciatall patrons or partners to maintenance of horrible slaughters, rapines and bloudshed) hereto hir murderous mind in killing of Franquet hir owne prisoner, hir two yeares continuance in hir abominations and deadiie mischief without anie hir trauell or motion betwene the princes for peace, hir relapse relapse at last & falling againe into his abjured iniquities, by his virginities (if it were ante) by his holie words, his fasting and prayers that they might be, with satan (after St. Paule) can change himselfe into an angell of light, the deapler to deceiue.

These matters may verie rightfullie denounce vnto all the world his execrable abominations, and well iustifie the iudgement he had, and the execution he was put to for the same. A thing yet (God wot) verie smallie shadowed, and lesse holpen by the verie trauell of the Dolphin, whose dignitie abroad foulie spotted in this point, that contrarie to the holie degree of a right christen prince (as he called himselfe) for maintenance of his quarels in warre would not reuerence to prophane his sacred estate, as dealing in diuelish practises with misbelievers and witches. Which malicie he full foolishly salued (like one that to kill the strong sent of onions would cheate a cloude of garlike) so a sic and twentieth yeares after, he pact with pope Calixt the third, by whose mandat directed to his three delegats, the bishops of Paris, Reims, and Constance, at the cathedrall church of Paris, in presence of Jone (the pufels mother) John and Peter his brethren, the seven and twentieth daie of November 1455, the validitie and goodnesse of the proccesse and sentence upon him was called in question, and in great solemnitie sit vpon.

Wherein the cause was so sincerelie canuassed among them, that afterward, on the eight of Julie 1456, a quite contrarie sentence was there declared: of effect, that this Jone (forsooth) was a damsell diuine, no fault in the Dolphin for his counsell and witcherie practises with him; the proccesse, iudgement, and condemnation against him all wrong and iniurions. And for iustificacion and remembrance aswell of his innocencie in life and death, as also of the sinceritie of his later sentence, a new crosse in that old market to be reared. In this tale of Tillers is the further likened to Deboza, Isabell, and Judith, and vnto Romanee Clelia compared by Polydor, that shames not somewhat also to carpe at his iudgment, and much pitieth his paine. But what puritie or regard of deuotion or conscience is in these writers trow yee, who make no consideration of his heinous enormities, or elsse any difference betwene one stirred by by merie diuine, or naturall loue, and a damnable forcerer suborned by satan? And thus much of this gentle Jone, and of his god oratours that haue said so well for him: now iudge as ye list.]

After the bestowing of this Pusell in fort as yee haue heard, the siege still continued before Campsie, and the duke of Bedford sent to the duke of Burgognie lieng at the siege, the earle of Huntingdon, and sir John Robbert (two tollie gentlemen, of no lesse prudence to parte with the enemie, than puissance to encounter them) with a thousand archers (whose actiuitie, I warrant you, stood not then vpon the first triall) which daillie skirmished with them within, and made such bassiles & fortresses, that the towne had bene rendred into their hands, but that the duke of Burgognie departed from the siege to go into Babant, to receiue the possession of that duchie, by the death of his cousin Philip the duke of that countrie, as then departed this world.

Sir John de Lutzenburgh was left by the duke of Burgognie as generall of the siege before Campsie, the which he raised within a short space after, contrarie to the minds of the Englishmen, which were verie desirous to haue lien there till the towne had bene rendered, which if the siege had bene continued but eight daies longer, must needs haue come to passe; by reason that pestilence and famine had almost consumed all the souldiers within the towne, so that it remained in maner without defense. After the breaking by of this siege, John duke of Norfolk toke againe the townes of Dampmartine, and the Chasse Pongaise, with diuerse other townes. Also the earle of Stafford toke the towne of Winton countie Robert, and from thence foraged all the countrie to Sens, and after toke Queinoie in Brie, Grand Puis, and Kampellon.

During this time, the Frenchmen on the other side toke Louiers, and Villeneuf. Then also did the towne of Melun rebell, and had such aid of other townes adioining, that the English souldiers were faine to leaue Melun, Bozret, and Corbell. Thus did things wauer in doubtful balance betwixt the two nations English and French. But because the English fore mistrusted further danger, it was concluded, that king Henrie in his totall person with a new armie should come into France, partlie to visit and comfort his owne subiects ther, and partlie either by feare or fauour (because a child of his age and beautilie doth commonlie procure them loue of elder persons) to moue the Frenchmen to continue their due obediens to towards him.

Wherefore after a great host conuenient for that purpose assembled, and monie for maintenance of the warre readie gathered, and the realme set in an order vnder the gouernement of the duke of Glocester protectour (which during the kings absence appeared diuerse riots, and punished the offenders) the king with a great power toke shipping at Douer on saint Georges euen within night, and landed at Calis on the morrow being saint Georges daie, and sundate, by seven of the clocke in the morning. He remained in Calis a good space, and from thence he remoued to Rone, being there receiued with all triumph. He tarried in that citie a long time, his nobles daillie consulting on their great businesse & weightie affaires.

In this kings time, & somewhat about this yeate, a certeine Breton, whose a good honest widowe had receiued into his house, and concerned well of him in opinion, was by him mainteined of his owne purse, & (as Polychronicon saith) she found him of almes and for Gods sake. This charitable deed of hers deserued a deuout mind to God ward, and a thankful hart to him. But (good soule) how was she recompensed? Euen murdered in his bed by the hands of that villaine whose so bountifullie she succoured, and motherlike tendered. Vnto which bloudie fact (which was a preparatiue to a further mischance byed in his vnnaturall hart) he added another offense: for when he had dispatched the woman, vnto the riddance of his to his aduantage, and as he had obtained oportunitie (to his thinking) he conueied all that she had a waite with him for his owne release. When being persecuted with guiltinesse of conscience, which troubleth offenders with ceaselesse verasions, and forceth them from place to place to seeke corners of euasion and shift, he toke priuilege of holie church at saint Georges in Southwarke, where lateng hands on the crosse, as a shield of sufficient safegard, he abjured this land, and by that meanes thought himselfe free from afterclaps.

Neuertheless, God (whose mercifull nature abhorreth the effusion of mans blood) prepared a punishment for the malefactor, who passing through the suburbs of London, without Algate (the place where he had committed the murder) the women of the same parish and street (as it were intraged) came out with stones, staves, kenell dong, and other things, wherewith they so bethwacht him on all parts of his bodie, that they laid him a stretching, and rid him quite of life. In the working of this their teene they were so fell and fierce, that the constables with their assistants (which were no small number) doing what they could by their authoritie and maine strength, were not able to rescue him out of the womens hands; who had sworne in their hearts (as it seemed by the manner of their reuenge which was void of all mercie) to see the end of such a villaine as most unnaturalie had laine a woman, a neighbour, a widow, a pitifull woman, a good neighbour, an honest widow; the wretch himselve being a fugitive, a stranger boine, a begger, and he to whome she shewed hir selfe the staffe of his support. A singular ingratitude which nature abhorreth, law disalloweth, heauen disclaimeth, God detesteth, humanitie condemneeth, and euerie god bodie to the verie death detesteth; as the old distichon excellentlie and with good sense noteth;

Lex & natura, calum, Deus, omnia iura Dammant ingratum, merent illum quos, natum.

But to returne to the affaires of king Henrie, who in the moneth of Nouember remoued from Rone to Pontoise, and so to saint Denis, to the intent to make his entrie into Paris, and there to be sacred king of France. There were in his companie of his owne nation, his vncle the cardinall of Winchester, the cardinall and archbishop of Poike, the dukes of Bedford, Poike, and Norfolk, the earles of Warwicke, Salisburie, Orenford, Huntington, Dymond, Powisaigne, and Suffolke. Of Gascoignes, there were the earles of Longuille and Marche, besides manie other noble men of England, Guier, and Normandie. And the chiefe of the French nation were the dukes of Burgognie, and Leues of Lutzenburgh, cardinall and chancelor of France for king Henrie: the bishops of Beauuois and Poion, both pères of France, beside the bishop of Paris, and diuerse other bishops; the earle of Wandemount, and other noble men, whose names were superfluous to rehearse. And he had in a gard about his person three thousand pike archers, some on horsebacke, and part on foot.

To speake with what honour he was receiued into the citie of Paris, what pageants were prepared, and how richlie the gates, streets, and bridges on euerie side were hanged with collie clothes of arras & tapestrie, it would be too long a procelle, and therefore I doe here passe it ouer with silence. On the seventeenth daie of December, he was crowned king of France, in our ladies church of Paris, by the cardinall of Winchester, the bishop of Paris not being contented that the cardinall should doe such an high ceremonie in his church and iurisdiction. After all the ceremonies were finished, the king returned toward the palace, hauing one crowne on his head, and another boine before him; and one scepter in his hand, and the second boine before him. As touching other the roiall seruices and princelie appointments, they are verie diligentlie & at large set out in the French chronicle of that time. This coronation of the king, Anglorum prelia as manie other good and memorable matters, so this also he hath noted, saleng thereof in comelie breuitie and truth, as after followeth:

Parisis, diadema vias & compita circum

This high and tofous feast passed not without some spot of displeasure among the English nobilitie: for the cardinall of Winchester, which at this time would haue no man be equall with him, commanded the duke of Bedford to leaue off the name of regent, during the time that the king was in France, affirming the chiefe ruler being in presence, the authoritie of the substitute to be clerelie detogate, according to the common saleng; In the presence of the higher power, the smaller giueth place. The duke of Bedford took such a secret displeasure with this doing, that he neuer after fauoured the cardinall, but stood against him in all things that he would haue forward. This was the root (as some haue thought) of that diuision amongst the English nobilitie, where through their glorie within the realme of France began first to decline.

The next daie after the solemn feast of the kings coronation, were kept triumphant iusts and toernies, in the which the earle of Arundell, and the bastard of S. Waile, by the iudgement of the ladies wone the pize. The king kept open hall the space of five daies to all commers, and after (because the aire of Paris seemed contrarie to his pure complexion) by the aduise of his counsell, he remoued to Rone, where he kept his Christmase. But before his departure from Paris, the noble men as well of France and Normandie did to him homage, and the common people sware to him fealtie. In this meane time, sir Francis called the Aragoignois, a noble capteine of the English part in Normandie, took by force and policie the towne of Pontargis, with a great pize of treasure and prisoners, and put therein a garrison, leauing it well furnished with vittels and munition.

About the same time, the earle of Arundell, being truelie informed that the lord Boufanc marshall of France was come to Beauuois, intending to doe some feat in Normandie, assembled the number of three and twentie hundred men, and comming nere to the said towne of Beauuois, sent a great number of light horsemen to run before the towne, to traîne out the Frenchmen within; the which issuing out and following the English horsemen vnto their scale, were so inclosed and fought with, that in maner all the number of them, save a few which fled backe into the towne with the marshall, were laine or taken. Amongst other of the chiefe prisoners, that dailant capteine Ponton de Santrails was one, who with out delaie was exchanged for the lord Talbot, before taken prisoner at the battell of Patie. There was also taken one called the shepheard, a simple man, and a filie soule; but yet of such reputation for his supposed holinesse amongst the Frenchmen, that if he touched the wall of any of their aduersaries townes, they beleued verelie it would incontinentlie fall downe.

This chance succeeded not fortunatlie alone vnto the English nation, for Richard Beauchampe earle of Marbolke had a great skirmish before the towne of Gournie, where he discomfited and repelled his enemies: and beside those that were laine, he took fortie horsemen, all being gentlemen of name and armes. Like chance happened to the friends of king Charles, towards the marches of Lozraine, where Keigner duke of Bar besieged the towne of Wandemont pertaining to the earle thereof named Anthoine, coufine to the same duke Keigner. This earle, before the dukes approaching, left a conuenient crue within the towne to defend it, and with all speed rode to the dukes of Bedford and Burgognie, being then at the foresaid great triumph at Paris, where he purchased such fauour at their hands, because he had euer taken their parts, that not onelie sir John Falstolf was appointed to go with him, hauing in his companie sir hundred archers, but also the duke of Burgognies marshall named sir Anthoine Coulon-gon, accompanied with fiftene hundred other men of warre.

When the duke of Bar heard that his enemies were thus comming towards him, like a hardie capteine he raised his siege, and met face to face with the earle and his companie, betwene whome was a cruell and mortall battell. The horsemen of the French side endured long, but in conclusion the English archers so galled their hostes, and so wounded the men, that the Barrois, Almaines, and other of duke Keigners side were compelled to flee. hen the duke of Bar, the bishop of Metz, the lord of of Roquemaque, sir Guerard of Salceburgh, the Viscount of Arcie, and two hundred other, beside three thousand which were flaine.

In this luckie time also, no lesse occasion of victorie was offered to the Englishmen in an other part, if they could haue vsed it with such circumspect warrenesse as had bene expedient. For Robert lord Willoughbie, and Matthew Gough, a valliant Welshman, with fiftene hundred Englishmen, laid siege to a towne in Anton called saint Severine. Whereof Charles the French king being aduertised, sent with all speed the lord Ambrose de Loze, with manie noble men to the succours of them within the towne, whereof the same lord Ambrose was capitaine: and therefore made the more hast to releue his deputie, and the other being streiallie besieged, but yet staied at the towne of Beaumont, till his whole power might come to him.

The Englishmen aduertised of this intent of the capitaine, came vpon him in the night, and found the Frenchmens watch so out of order, that a thousand men were entered into the campe before they were espied; by reason whereof the Englishmen found small resistance. But when the daie began to appeare, and that the sunne had set forth his bright beames abroad, that all things might be seene, the Englishmen giuen wholie to spoile, followed not their enemies in chase, but being contented with their preie and gaine, began to retreat toward the siege againe, which the lord Willoughbie still maintained with a part of the armie.

But see the chance. The Frenchmen which were coming after, hearing by the noise of the people that some traie was at hand, put spurs to their horses, and set on the Englishmen pestered with bag and baggage of the spoile to spoile, followed not their enemies in chase, but being contented with their preie and gaine, began to retreat toward the siege againe, which the lord Willoughbie still maintained with a part of the armie.

About this season, Nicholas the cardinall of the holie crosse was sent into France, as a legat from Eugenie the fourth as then bishop of Rome, to treat a peace betwene the Englishmen and Frenchmen. But when after great instance and labour made betwene the parties, he saw their obstinate and forward minds, nothing inclined to anie agreement, he wan so much at their hands by earnest sute, that a truce was granted to indure for six yeares to come: but as the same was hardlie granted, so was it of the Frenchmen sone and lightlie broken. For the bastard of Orleans newlie made earle of Dunois, took by treason the towne of Chartres from the Englishmen, affirming by the law of armes, that stealing or buieng a towne, without inuasion or assault, was no breach of league, amitie, or truce. In which towne he slue the bishop, because he was a Burgonian. Whereby did new malice increase, and mostall warre began effsones to be put in vze.

Whilist these things were doing in France, the cardinall of Winchester was come backe againe into England, to appease certeine commotions and sturres attempted by sundrie persons vnder colour of religion: but after that William Pandenle, and John Sharpe the chiefe authours thereof were appe-bended and executed by the gouernour and the kings iustices, the residue yelded and confessed their offences, whereof two articles were these (as some write) that priests should haue no possessions, and that all things by the order of charitie among christian people should be in common. Other thought their opinions were not such errors, but that their enemies spread abroad such rumors of them, to make them more odious to the people.

After that, a parlement was called by the duke of Glocester, in the which monie was assigned to be leuied, and men appointed, which should passe ouer into France to the aid of the duke of Bedford, for the maintenance of the warres: because it was suspected the truce would not long continue. During this parlement, James the king of Scots sent ambassadours to conclude a peace with the duke of Glocester, who (because the king was absent) referred the matter to the three estates. After long consultation, not without great arguments, a peace was concluded. When the parlement was ended, the cardinall well furnished with men & monie, departed out of England, and came to Rome to the king, to whome also resorted the duke of Bedford from Paris, to consult of things not vnlikelie to follow.

Herevpon a great councell was kept in the castell of Rome, and manie doubts moued, and few weightie things out of hand concluded. At length, after great disputation, with manie arguments ended, the dukes of Bedford and Porke, and Edmund late earle of Mortaigne, and now (by the death of John duke of Summerfet, leauing behind him a sole daughter and heire, married to the earle, and called Margaret after the countesse of Richmond) attained to the name and title of duke of Summerfet, approved the reason of those, that held it expedient to haue an armie in a readinesse for defense, least the Frenchmen suddenlie should attempt anie enterprize to the danger of the Englishmen, and losse of those townes and countries that were vnder them.

When all things were agreed, king Henrie came to Calis, from thence to Douer; and so by easie courtesies the one and twentieth daie of Februarie to London, where he was triumphantlie receiued, and richlie presented, as in the chronicles of Robert Fabian it more at large appeares. After that the king was departed into England, the duke of Bedford regent of France, and capitaine of Calis, taried behind in the marches of Picardie, where he was informed certeine souldiers of Calis grudging at the restraint of twolles, began to murmur against the king and his councell, to some danger of the towne. The duke vpon due examination had, caused diuerse to be put to death, and manie banished that towne and marches for euer.

In the meane time, the ladie Anne duchesse of Bedford departed this life at Paris, by whose death the fast knot of faithfull friendship betwixt the duke of Bedford and his brother in law the duke of Burgonie began somewhat to slacken. Shortly after, to wit, about the beginning of the next yeare 1433, the said duke of Bedford being thus a widower, through the perswasion of the lord Lewis of Lutzenburgh bishop of Teruine and Cle, and chancelor of France for king Henrie, agreed to marrie the ladie Jaquet, daughter to Peter earle of saint Paule, and nece to the said bishop, and to the lord John of Lutzenburgh.

The marriage was solemnized at Teruine with great triumph. Which ended, the duke with his new spouse (being about the age of seauentene yeares) came vnto Calis, and so into England, from whence in the moneth of August next he returned to Paris. The duke of Burgonie, though nothing pleased with this new alliance contracted by the duke of Bedford, with the house of Lutzenburgh, but yet not able to do anie thing to let it; because of the marriage communitie yet he could find any power or knowledge to hinder it. Whilste these things were a doing, in some places the French souldiers of the Dolphins, lacking wages (as the time serued) take both Englishmen and Burgognians, ransoming and spoiling them at their pleasure. Herewith the regent much moued, prepared for warre after six moneths the truce had bene taken: and so the warre againe was renewed.

The Frenchmen anon as open truce-breakers, raised a crue, and suddenlie took the towne of saint Valerie in Normandie, nere to the mouth of the riuer of Some. An other armie, under the leading of sir Ambrose de Loze, wasted and destroyed all the countrie about Caen. The duke of Bedford on his part sent the earle of Arundell, the earle of Marwickes sonne, the lord Lisle Adam marshall of France for king Henrie, and twelue hundred men of warre with ordinance and munition to besiege the towne of Laigrie vpon the riuer of Sarne. The earle with shot of canon brake the arch of the bridge, and got from the Frenchmen their bulwourke, and set it on fire. Diuerse assaults were attempted, but the towne was well defended: for there were within it an eight hundred men of armes, besides other meane souldiers.

Laigrie besieged.

The duke of Bedford herewith gathered an armie of six thousand men, whereof were capitaines; Robert lord Willoughbie, sir Andrieu Ogard chamberlaine to the duke, sir John Saluaine bailiffe of Rone, sir John Montgomerie bailiffe of Caer, sir Philip Hall bailiffe of Bernoull, sir Richard Katcliffe deputie of Calis, sir Rafe Beuill, sir Rafe Standish, sir John Hanford, sir Richard Cuthin, sir Richard Harington bailiffe of Euxeur, sir William Fulthorpe, sir Thomas Griffin of Ireland, Dault Hall, Thomas Stranguish, Leonard Dymstone esquiers, and Thomas Gerard. All gentlemen of courage, and as forward to giue the French the foile, as the French for their liues to giue them the discomfiture. But vnto which side the victorie should befall, wicerteine it was before the trial of both their chancas had determined the doubt by the euent of the conflict.

The duke of Bedford furnished with this armie and companie of worthie capitaines came to the siege before Laigrie, where he made a bridge of boats, and brought his ordinance so nere the towne, that to all people it seemed not long able to resist. But the earle of Dunois, otherwise called the bastard of Orleans, with diuerse hardie capitaines, as valiantlie defended as the Englishmen assaulted. At length the French king, perceiuing this towne to be the three cornerd keie betwene the territories Burgognion, English, and French, and the losse thereof should turne him to irreuocable damage, sent the lord of Rieux, Poiton, the Hure, the lord Caluocourt, and sir thousand men, with great plentie of vittels, to the intent either to raise the siege, or else to vittell the towne.

The Frenchmen made a brag, as though they would haue assailed the Englishmen in their campe, but when they perceiued the courage of the lord regent, and the desire he had to fight, they framed themselves so in order of battell, as though they could do all things, and yet in effect did nothing: but that whilst part of them maintained a skirmish, a sort of rude & rusticall persons were appointed to conueie into the towne thirtie oren, and other small vittels. But this sweet gaine was derelie paid for, if the losse with the gaine be pondered in equal balance: for hauing regard to their 30 leane oren, in the skirmish were slain the lord Saintrelles brother to that valiant capitaine Poiton de Saintrelles, also capitaine John brother to the lord Caluocourt, and fiftie other noble and valiant personages.

The Frenchmen thus politickie hauing done their feat, in the beginning of August, removed their armie vnto Fort vnder Per, where, by a bridge of tuns they passed into the Ile of France. The duke of Bedford (like a wise prince) not minding to leave the more in ieopardie for hope of the lesse, nor the accident for the substance, raised his siege, and returned to Paris, nothing more minding than to trie his quarrell with dint of sword against the enemies, if they would thereto agree. And hereupon sent Bedford his herald to the lord Caluocourt and other capitaines of the French armie, offering them battell and a pitched field within a conuenient time, and where they would appoint. The French capitaines answered the English herald, that there was time to gaine, and time to lose: and for choise of times they would vse their owne discretions.

Shortlie after, Piers Audebeuse constable of the castell of Rone, corrupted with monie, suffered the marshall of France, with two hundred other, as persons disguised to enter the place by stealth: but they were soone espied, and diuen to the dungeon, where they were constrained to yeld themselves prisoners: of the which some were hanged, some beheaded, and some ransomed, at the pleasures of the regent. This pageant thus played, the lord regent sent the earle of saint Paule, and Robert lord Willoughbie, with a competent number of men to besiege the towne of St. Valerie, which the Frenchmen a little before had taken. This siege continued the space of three weeks; at the end whereof the Frenchmen within yelded the towne, and departed with their horse and harnesse onelle to them saved.

The earle put there in garrison fresh and valiant souldiers, and appointed capitaine there, sir John Aubemond. In the same towne (whether by infection of aire, or by corrupt vittels, which the townsmen did eat) a great pestilence shortly after happened, which consumed within a small time two parts of the people. The earle of saint Paule, and the lord Willoughbie returning backe to the regent, were tollallie receiued, and within a while after, the earle departed from Paris to laie siege to the castell of Pouchas. But being incamped nere the towne of Blangie, he by a sudden maladie departed this life, the last of August, leaving his seignories to Helwes de Lutzenburgh his sonne and heire. Because this dead earle was father in law to the regent, solemne obsequies were kept for him both in Paris and in London.

In the meane season, the Frenchmen entering into high Burgognie, burnt, took, and destroyed diuerse townes; whereupon the Burgognians assembled a great armie, both to reuenge their quarrels, and to recouer their townes taken from them. To whom as to his friends the duke of Bedford sent the lord Willoughbie, and sir Thomas Kiriell, with a conuenient number of souldiers, which entering into the lands of Laonnais, were encountered with a great power of their enemies. But after long fight, the Frenchmen were ouerthrowne, and of them left dead in the field an hundred and fiftie horsemen, beside prisoners, which after vpon urgent cause were all killed.

Whilste these things happened thus in France, John lord Calbot gathered together a crue of chosen men of warre in England, to the number of eight hundred, and sailed into Normandie, and passed by Rone to Paris. In his waie he took the strong castell of Joing betwene Beauuois and Gisors, and caused caused all the Frenchmen within to be taken and hanged, and after rased and defaced the castell. After he had rested himselfe a while at Paris, and taken advise with the counsell there, what waie it should be best for him to take, without prolonging time; he with the lord de Alie Adam and others, departed from thence, having in their retinues sixtene hundred men of warre. And coming to the castell of Amadour upon Dife, thereof was capteine sir Amadour de Cignois brother to the Hirc, they found it abandoned by them that had it in keeping, who were withdrawne to the towne of Creill.

Either therefore the lord Talbot followed, who being in a skirmish the said Amadour, he was at length the said towne of Creill, and after the townes of Pont St. Sparence, Beusille in Cimoie, la Rouge maison, Crespie in Walois, & Cleremont in Beauvois, and after with great riches and good prisoners returned to Paris. Neither had the lord Talbot such good and prosperous successe alone, but the earle of Arundell also at the verie same season took the castell of Somelme, & rased it to the ground, after he got by force the castell of Doyle, & from thence came to S. Selerine, where the lord Ambrose de Loze, being capteine, issued out and fought with the Englishmen so egerlie, that he drove them backe an arrowe shot by fine force: but the earle so encouraged his men, that they gaue a fresh onset upon the Frenchmen, and followed it so fiercelie, that they slue a great number of them, and drove the residue into the towne.

After this victorie, he besieged Louiers, whereof was capteine the Hirc, and his brother, who rendered the towne without assault. Then the earle assembling together a great armie, returned againe to S. Selerine, & intoned the towne with a strong siege. When he had lien there almost thre moneths, euerie daie attempting or doing somewhat, he finally gaue so fierce an assault, that by force he entered the towne, and slue John Almaine, and Guilliam saint Albine, the chiefe capteins, and eight hundred other men of warre. The children of le seigneur de Loze were taken prisoners. The earle put new men of warre into the towne, and made capteine there sir John Cornemall. After this, he beset the strong towne of Sillie pitched his campe. The inhabitants terrified at the losse of saint Selerine, delivered him pledges, upon condition; that if they were not rescued within thirtie daies next, then they (their liues saued) should render the towne into his possession: which offer was received.

The French king, being aduertised hercof, by a post, appointed (as some saie) Arthur earle of Richmont (or as other write, John duke of Alanton) with a great companie of men of warre to go to the rescue of this towne. But whether it was the earle or duke, certeine it is at his approaching to the siege, he incamped himselfe by a brooke side, ouer the which a man might haue striden, & perceiving how stronglie the English were incamped against him, he thought it not for his profit to giue battell; & so in the night season rased & went his waie without further attempt. When they within the towne knew that their succours failed, they rendered themselves to the mercie of the earle of Arundell, who gentlie received them, and leauing a garrison in the towne, departed to Spais, and in his waie took the castles of Spallate, and saint Laurence. About this time the lord Willoughbie & sir Thomas Isrich, returning with great victorie out of Burgognie, passing by the towne of Louiers, latelie reduced to the English obedience, furnished it both with men and munition.

Among so many good chances, some euill are accustomed to happen, or else the gairners would not know themselves. And so at this time it happened, that a great number of the common and rusticall people in Normandie dwelling by the sea coast; either prouoked by the French king, or desirous of alteration and change (which thing the commons much comēt and desire) made an insurrection, put on harnesse, and by force expelled certeine English garrisons out of their holds, publishing and proclaiming openlie, that their onelie purpose and intent was to expell and banish the whole English nation out of their countries and coasts. Wherefore it maie be likelie, that the blacke Norman will sooner become white, than the people bred in France will heartilie loue an English bozne. For it standeth not with their enuious nature, to alter their malicious manners; as the old prouerbe saith truelie of them:

Celica natura semper sequitur sua iura.

These rebels thus fantastickly assembled, with all speed marched toward Caen, to the intent thre both to increase their number, and also to consult what waie they should follow in their new begun enterprise. But the dukes of Yorke and Summerset, then lieng in Normandie, having perfect knowledge hereof, immediatlie sent forth the earle of Arundell, and the lord Willoughbie with six thousand archers, and thirtene hundred light horsemen, to staie and keepe them from making anie further progresse. The earle of Arundell appointed the lord Willoughbie, with two thousand archers, and certeine horsemen to go afoze him, and lie in a skale within some couert place. Which done, the earle followed; & so keeping in the multitude at the backe, drove them before him as deere into a buckesale: and when the miserable wretches came nere to the skale, the earle made a token, whereat a gun shot off for a signe. Therewith the lord Willoughbie set on them before, and the earle behind, shooting so fiercelie, that the poore catlines, wounded and galled with the shot of arrowes, threw awaie their harnesse, and cried out instantlie for mercie.

The earle of Arundell moued with compassion, caused his souldiers to staie from further slaughter, and apprehending those that were knownen to be stirrers and leaders of the rest, let the other returne home without further damage: but yet, per the souldiers could be brought backe under their standards, there were about a thousand of the rebels slaine. And this commotion thus appeased, upon inquirie of the principall offenders, such as were found guiltie were put to terrible executions; as they had well deserved. During which rebellion, Peter Wakeford and his companie gat by treason the towne of Diepe, and diuerse other holds thereto adioining. After the earle of Arundell had obtained so good successe in his enterprises (as partlie ye haue heard) he attempted another, which was the last tooke and small labour of his liuing daies. For the duke of Bedford, being informed that his aduersaries had gotten the towne of Rye, and therein put a garrison, which soze vered the countries of Panthien, Arthois, and Bolenois, sent word to the earle, that he without delay should besiege the said towne.

The earle obeleng his commandement assembled his people, and came to Courneie, where he heard tell how there was a castell nere to Beauuois called Gerberois, the which being fallen in decaye, Charles the French king had appointed sir Stephan de Wigmois, commonlie called the Hirc, to repaire and mende it to fortifie, because it stood commodiously to serue as a countergarrison against the English townes and fortresses on those frontiers. The earle aduertised hercof, and perceiving that this new building would be greatlie prejudiciall to the Englishmen, determined first to dispossesse his enemies of that place, supposing to find small resistance: but he was deceived. For there was the said Wyre, and three thousand men of warre with him. The erle comming thither, incamped himselfe with five hundred horsemen in a little close not farre from the castell.

The Frenchmen, perceiuing that the earle and his horses were wearie, and that his archers were not yet come, determined to set vpon him before the coming of his footmen, the which they knew to be little more than a mile behind. Wherefore for a policie, they set forth fiftie horsemen, as though there had bene no moe within the castell. The earle perceiuing this, sent forth sir Randolfe Standish to encounter them, hauing with him an hundred horses. The Frenchmen fought couragiously a while, and suddenly came out all the remnant, and due sir Randolfe Standish and all his companie, and boldly set on the earle and his band, which manfully resisted the Frenchmen, till at length the Wyre caused three culuerings to be shot off amongst the Englishmen, whereof one strake the earle on the ancle, and so brake his leg, that for paine he fell from his horse.

When the Frenchmen entered amongst the Englishmen, took the earle lieng on the ground, with sir Richard Woodville, and sir scoe more, and there were slaine almost two hundred. The residue saved themselves as well as they might. The earle was caried to Beaunois, where of his hurt he shortly died, & was buried in the frier priours. He was a man of singular vertue, constancie, and grauitie, whose death in so troublous a season did sore appall the hearts of the English people. Thus oftentimes varied the chance of doubtful warre, so that one time the Englishmen got by assault, and yielded diuerse strong townes, castels, and piles: and at another season the French people, sometime by bargaine, sometime by assault obtained the same againe, or other in their stead.

About the moneth of June in this twelfth yeare, John duke of Bourbon and Auvergne, taken prisoner at the battell of Agincourt eightene yeeres past (as before ye haue heard) now paying his ranfome, which was eightene thousand pounds sterling, was taken with a most sore and grievous feuer, the which made an end of his life in the citie of London, on the same daie that was appointed for his departure towards France, whose corpse was interred in the grate friers of the same citie. This yeare also about the latter end of Aprill, was a meeting appointed to be had at saint Omers betwixt the dukes of Bedford and Burgognie, for the qualifieng of certeine displeasures and grudges betwixt them kindled and maintained by some flattering tale-tellers, who raising matters of reproch touching their honors, bred such grudges, that all loue betwixt them ceased, all amitie reiected, and all old friendship forgotten; such enuie insuech where enmitie once hath princes hearts possessed.

These two dukes come into the towne of saint Omers, the duke of Bedford being then regent of France, some, brother, and uncle to kings, thought that the duke of Burgognie should haue come and visited him in his lodging. The duke of Burgognie on the other part, being lord and soueraigne of the towne, iudged it as much vniuersall for him to go to the regent where he was lodged. Whobeyt by intreatie of friends, to meet in a place indifferent betwixt them both their lodgings was appointed; which offer not accepted, both parties departed discontent, and neuer after saw no communed together. Thus by the proud disdain & enuious discord of these two high stomached princes, Bedford not minding to haue a nie pèere, and Burgognie not willing to abide a nie superiour, shortly after England much lost, and Burgognie greatlie gained not, as by the sequale may appeare.

The bastard of Orleans, called the earle of Dunois, the lord Rochford marshall of France, with others, in the beginning of this thirteenth yeare, took the towne of S. Denis by treason, furnished with them of Paris, and leauing behind them a great garrison, took the towne of Houdoune, and Pont saint Epreme by composition. And at the same time was the towne of Pont Aenian taken by the sudden scaling of two fisher men, who entered by at a common priuie standing in the wall. Thus warre continually lasted betwixt these two mightie nations, English and French, within the realme of France (than which therefore no countrie thought more miserable.) And though the poore people and inhabitants of the good townes and villages, sustained most losse in their substance, yet the men of warre oftentimes paid dearely for the bargaine, being daily slaine, wounded, and taken prisoners: for warre seldom beareth any other fruit.

[It may serue verie well here to recount, how somewhat before these dates, Martin the first, in the sixteenth yeare of his pope dome, An. 1431, agreeing vpon a generall councell to be holden at Basill the same yeare, did anon after decesse: whom Eugenie the fourth succeeding, and liking right well of the time and place, by his authoritie signified and sent with Julian Cesarine his legat, did confirme the choise. Whereupon as the councell the nineteenth of Iulie the same 1431 was there begun, and his holiness soon after aduertised how malapertlie his ghostlie children had imbusied themselves in deuiling at their holie fathers faults, and about reformation of his church at Rome; his sublimitie therat highlie offended (for great cause it had) commanded his legat by and by to dissolve that synod, and in his name to appoint a new at Ferrar, and so come his waie: vnder colour forsooth how that place was meetest for the prelats of the Graeke church, who had to confer with the Latine councell about points of religion, wherein they long had remained at square.

But these Basillien clerks, there still fastlie contending themselves, so smallie regarded this summons of Eugenie (who then with his prelats, as the time was run on, vpon propagation from Ferrar kept an other councell at Florence 1439) as by a confident countermand cited Eugenie & all his cardinals to come to them at their solemne set councell at Basill. Which his supremacie (for so best became it, notwithstanding sundrie citations) utterly contemning to do, they soon after like verie impious imps, first for contumacie accursed his holie fatherhood, then depriued him of his papacie, and out of hand chose another in his office, one Amedeus late duke of Savoye, who afore that time hauing giuen by his possessions & dignitie vnto his children, became an heremite in a monastrie of his owne building by mount Ceuenna in Savoye nigh the lake Aeman, where he by title of Decanus militum Iesu Christi, and ten more of nobilitie with him, had settled themselves to liue.

The vertuous minded man thus chosen pope by spirituall counsell inuigiled, lest the holie life (such as it was) that he had profest, take the papacie vpon him the same 1439, and called Felix the first, which promotion yet he not long inioied. For after, by his successeur Nicholas the firsts ambition, that had suborned emperor Frederike to be a toocher in the matter, this little Amedeus was confined of his popes golden crowne for a cardinals felt hat. Then (good man) at last could he find, whether were nearer to christen profession, the life of a vertuous prince ruling in iustice, of a solitarie heremite vertuously occupied, of an imperious pope that may know no pèere, or of a licentious cardinal to liue as he list. This poore prince had experience of all, & then knew the

the best: when well might he lament him, but too late repent him.

And in the fift yeare of this Basillen counsell that had a continuance of eleuen yeare (whereof an eight were run per Felix was chosen, in which Eugene remaining pope still, though of curst hart he neuer came at them) motion was made among Sigismund the emperour and other christen kings (who for appealing this schisme betwene the pope and his prelates, were all present by person or pporie) that sith such horroz of bloudshed betwene the two nations continuallie so lamentable raged in France, some mediation might be made for accord: whereof one thing seemed to minister occasion of the more hope, because the duke of Burgognie was willing (so that it were not of his owne late) to returne and reconcile himselfe with the French king his mortall enemye and ancient aduersarie.]

Whereupon by authoritie of this generall counsell, two graue prelates, the one Nicholas Albergat a Carthusian frier, intituled a preest cardinall of the holie crosse; the other Hugh Lusignan a Cyprian, Crake, bishop cardinall of Venece in Italie, came to the towne of Arras in Arthois, whither were sent from the king of England, Henrie Beauford cardinall of Winchester, Henrie archbishop of Yorke, William de la Pole earle of Suffolke, and John Holland earle of Huntingdon, with diuerse other knights and esquires. And for the French king were there present Charles duke of Bourbon, Letes erle of Wandosme, Arthur of Britaine constable of France, the archbishop of Reimes, and sir Phillip Harecourt. The duke of Burgognie was there in proper person, accompanied with the duke of Guelders, and the earles of Estampes, Lignie, S. Paule, Claudemont, Peures, and Daniell sonne to the prince of Orange, with a great gard and a gallant companie.

Upon the date of the first session, the cardinall of S. Crosse declared to the thre parties the innumerable mischaeses, that had followed to the whole state of the christian common-wealth by their continuall dissention and daileie discord, exhorting them for the honour of God, & for the loue which they ought to beare towards the aduancement of his faith and true religion, to conforme themselves to reason, and to late aside all rancor, malice and displeasure; so that in concluding a godlie peace, they might receive profit and quietnesse here in this world, and of God an euerslasting reward in heauen. After this admonition, and diuerse dates of communication, euerie partie brought in their demands, which were most contrarie, and farre from anie likelihood of coming to a god conclusion.

The Englishmen would that king Charles should haue nothing but what it pleased the king of England, and that not as dutie, but as a benefit by him of his more liberalitie giuen and distributed. The Frenchmen on the other part would that B. Charles should haue the kingdome franklie and frelie, and that the king of England should leave the name, armes, and title of the king of France, and to be content with the dukedomes of Aquitaine and Normandie, and to forsake Paris, and all the townes which they possessed in France, betwene the rivers of Some and Loire, being no parcell of the duchie of Normandie. To be bréfe, the demands of all parts were betwene them so farre out of square, as hope of concord there was none at all.

The cardinals seeing them so farre in sunder, minded not to dispute their titles, but offered them reasonable conditions of truce and peace for a season, which notwithstanding, either of stowardnesse, or of disdain on both parts, were openlie refused. And much that the Englishmen in great displeasure, departed to Calis, and so into England. ¶ One writer affirmeth, that they being warned of a secret conspiracie moued against them, suddenly departed from Arras, and so returned into their countrie. But what cause so euer hindered their accord and bntie (sith this and that may be surmized) certene it is, that the onelie and principall cause was, for that the God of peace and loue was not among them, without whom no discord is quenched, no knot of concord fastened, no bond of peace confirmed, no distracted minds reconciled, no true friendship maintained: for had he bene among them, their dissenting and wastward willes had sounded the sweet harmonie of amiable peace, which of all things that God hath bestowed vpon man is the verie best, and more to be set by than manie triumphs, as the poet excellentlie well saith:

pax optima rerum Quas homini nouisse datum: pax una triumphis Innumeris potior: pax custodire salutem Et cines equare potens.

Sil. Ital. lib. 11.

Now whiles this treatie of peace was in hand, the lord Talbot, the lord Willoughbie, the lord Scales, with the lord Lisle Adam, and five thousand men of warre, besieged the towne of saint Denis with a strong band. The earle of Dunois hearing hereof, accompanied with the lord Lohac, and the lord Bueil, with a great compante of horsemen halsted thitherwards to raise the siege, and by the waie encountered with sir Thomas Kirtell, and Mattheu Cough, riding also toward saint Denis, betwene whom was a great confliat. But suddenly came to the aid of the Frenchmen the garrison of Pont Auelan, which caused the Englishmen to returne without anie great harme or damage: saving that Mattheu Cough by foundering of his horse was taken, and carried to Pont Auelan.

* Or rather Goche.

* Or Goche.

In the meane time was the towne of saint Denis rendered to the Englishmen, the which raced the walles and fortifications, sauing the walles of the abbete, and of the towne called Wenin. Shortly after the towne of Pontois, where sir John Kuppelleie was capteine, rebelled; and by force the Englishmen were expelled, the inhabitants yielding themselves to the French king. This towne was small, but the losse was great, because it was the keie that opened the passage betwixt the cities of Paris and Rone. But now to returne to the communication at Arras, which after the departure of the English commissioners held betwixt the Frenchmen & Burgognians, at length a peace was concluded, accorded, and sworn betwixt king Charles and duke Philip of Burgognie, vpon certeine conditions, as in the French histories more plainlie appeareth.

A peace betwixt Charles of France and the duke of Burgognie.

And after, the duke of Burgognie, to set a vesse before the king of England, sent Wholson Dore his cheefe herald to king Henrie with letters, excusing the matter by way of information, that he was constrained to enter in this league with B. Charles, by the daileie outcries, complaints, and lamentations of his people; alledging against him, that he was the onlie cause of the long continuance of the wars, to the bitter impoverishing of his owne people, and the whole nation of France. Therefore sith he could not otherwise do, but partlie to content his owne people, and chéeflie to satisfie the request of the whole generall counsell, was in manner compelled for his part to growe vnto a peace and amitie with king Charles.

He likewise wished that king Henrie, vpon reasonable and honozable conditions of agreement offered, should in no wise refuse the same: whereby the long continued warre at length might cease and take end, to the pleasure of almighty God, which is

This letter was much maruelled at of the counsell, after they had thoghlie considered all the contents thereof, & they could not but be much disquieted, so far forth that diuerse of them offended so much with the vntrusty of the duke, that they could not temper their passions, but openlie called him traitoꝝ.

Henry sixth.

But when the rumoꝝ of the dukes revolting was published amongst the people, they left wordes, and fell to bestowing of stripes: for being pricked with these euill tidings, they ran in great outrage vpon all the Flemings, Hollanders, and Burgognions, which then inhabited within the citie of London, and the suburbs of the same, and slue and hurt a great number of them before they, by the kings proclamation, could be staied from such iniurious doing: for the king nothing more minded than to saue innocent blood, and to defend them that had not offended. The officer at armes was willed to tell his maister, that it stood not with his honoꝝ to be enemie to the English nation; and that his dutie had bene to keepe his ancient truth and allegiance, rather than to be occasion of new warre. And what a new reconciled enemie was in respect of an old tried friend, he might shortly find. [When the messenger with this answer was dispatched, and vpon consultation found, a matter standing both with good policie in forcing the proud subiect to know his obedience, and also with great equitie to twitche aquareller with such pinfars as where with afore he had nipt an other, so was it anon brought about, that sundrie of his good townes and citie rebelled against him, whereby (lesse to his liking than to his deseruing) he was verie well made to bite of a chokepeare of his owne grafting.]

This yeaere the fourteenth date of September died John duke of Bedford, regent of France, a man both politike in peace, and hardie in warre, and yet no more hardie than mercifull when he had the victorie, whose bodie was with all funerall solemnities buried in the cathedrall church of our ladie in Rone, on the north side of the high altar, vnder a sumptuous and costlie monument. Which some when king Edward the eleauenth, by certeine vndiscreet persons was counselled to deface, affirming that it was a great dishonour both to the king and to the realme, to see the enemie of his father and theirs to haue so solemne and rich a memorie: he answered saleng, What honour shall it be to vs, or to you, to breake this monument, and to pull out of the ground the dead bones of him, whome in his life neither my father noꝝ your progenitours, with all their power, puissance, and friends were once able to make flee one foot backward; but by his strength, wit, and policie, kept them all out of the principall dominions of the realme of France, and out of this noble and famous duchie of Normandie: Wherefore I saie, first, God haue his soule, and let his bodie now lie in rest, which when he was alive, would haue disquieted the proudest of vs all. And as for the tome, I assure you, it is not so decent noꝝ conuenient, as his honour and acts deserued, although it were much richer, and more beautiful.

The frost was so extreame this yeaere, beginning about the five and twentieth date of Nouember, and continuing till the tenth of February, that the ships with merchandize arriving at the Thames mouth, could not come by the riuer: so their lading there saine to be discharged, was brought to the citie by land. After the death of that noble prince the duke of Bedford, the bright sunne in France toward Englishmen, began to be cloudie, and daile to darken, the Frenchmen began not onelie to withdraue their obedience by oth to the king of England, but also toke sword in hand & openlie rebelled. Notwith all these mishaps could not anie thing abate the valiant courages of the English people: for they hauing no mistrust in God and good fortune, set vp a new saile, began the warre afresh, and appointed for regent in France, Richard duke of Yorke, sonne to Richard earle of Cambridge.

Although the duke of Yorke was worthe (both for birth and courage) of this honoꝝ and preferment, yet so disdained of Edmund duke of Summerfet being couline to the king, that by all means possible he sought his hinderance, as one glad of his losse, and sozie of his well doing: by reason whereof, per the duke of Yorke could get his dispatch, Paris and diuerse other of the cheefest places in France were gotten by the French king. The duke of Yorke perceiving his euill will, openlie dissembled that which he inwardlie minded, either of them working things to the others displeasure, till through malice & diuision betweene them, at length by mortall warre they were both consumed, with almost all their whole lines and of spring.

The Normans of the countrie of Caen, being heartened by the death of the duke of Bedford, began a new rebellion, slue diuerse Englishmen, robbed manie townes that were under the English obedience, and toke the towne of Harfleur by assault, and diuerse other townes. But the lord regent being aduertised, sent forth the lord Scales, sir Thomas Ruffell, and the lord How, which so afflicted those rebels of Caen, that they slue aboue five thousand persons, and burnt all the townes and villages in the countrie, not being walled: so that in that part was neither habitation noꝝ tillage, for all the people fled into Britaine, and all the beasts of the countrie were brought to Caudebecke, where a good shepe was sold for an English penie, and a Cow for twelue pence. Daile was skirmishing and fighting in euerie part, in so much that the lord Scales at the Rie beside Rone, discomfited the hire, and fiftene hundred ballant Frenchmen, of the which, aboue three hundred were taken prisoners, beside the gaine of seauen faire countres.

Amongst other of the prisoners, were sir Richard Reginald de Fontaines, sir Alain Gerond, Alain Monlaie, and Gessie Grame, capteine of the Scots. But yet this victorie and others the like, staied not the Frenchmen from working treason daile, in so much that diuers townes turned to the part of R. Charles, and some were taken by practise, as Diepe, Bois, Vincennes, and others. So that here partlie was accomplished the prophesie of Henrie the sixt, giuen out in the ninth yeaere of his reigne when he laie at siege before Heaur, that Henrie of Windsoꝝ should lose all that Henrie of Monmouth had gotten (for so they are named according to the place of their natiuitie) and this prediction was complet and full by that time the yeaeres of his regiment were expired.

But here is one chiefe point to be noted, that either the disdaine amongst the cheefe peeres of the realme of England (as yee haue heard) or the negligence of the kings counsell (which did not foresee dangers to come) was the losse of the whole dominion of France, betweene the riuers of Sone and Marne, and in especiall, of the noble citie of Paris. For where before, there were sent ouer thousands for defense of the holds and fortresses, now were sent hundreds, yea and scores, some rascals, and some not able

York made regent of France.

able to draw a bowe, or carrie a bill: for the lord Willoughbie, and the bishop of Terwine, which had the governance of the great cite of Paris, had in their companie not two thousand Englishmen.

Which weakenesse king Charles well perceived, and therefore by authoritie appointed the constable, Arthur of Britaine, the earle of Dunois, the lords de la Roch, and Lile Adam, with other valiant captains and men of warre, as well Burgognions as French, to go before Paris, trusting by favour of certaine citizens, with whome he had intelligence, thortlie to be lord of the cite, without great losse or battell. So these captains came before the cite of Paris. But perceiuing that all things succeeded not according to their expectation, they returned to Spont Party, and the next daie suddenlie set on the towne of Saint Denis, and constrained the Englishmen that kept it, to flee into the abbeie, and into the tower Menin. In this conflict two hundred Englishmen were slaine, the residue vpon reasonable composition rendered by the place, and departed to Paris.

Thomas lord Beaumont, who of late was come to Paris with eight hundred men, issued forth with six hundred souldiers, intending to view the doings and number of the French armie; but suddenlie compassed about, within a small space was discomfited and taken, with him fourescore prisoners, beside two hundred slaine in the field, the remnant chased to the verie gates of the cite. The Parisiens, and especiallie the maister of the halles, and some of the vniuersitie, and Michaell Lallier, and manie notable burgesses of the cite (who euer with an English countenance couered a French hart) perceiuing the weakenesse of the Englishmen, and force of the French; signified to the French captains their toward minds willing them with all diligence to come & receiue so rich a preie without anie difficultie, readie to be giuen and deliuered into their hands.

The constable delaing no time, came with his power, lodged by the charter house: and the lord Lile Adam, approaching to the walles, shewed to the citizens a charter, sealed with the great seale of king Charles, by the which he had pardoned them their offenses, and granted to them all their old liberties, and ancient priuileges, so that they would hereafter be to him true and obedient: which thing to them declared, they ran about the towne, crying; S. Denis, live king Charles. The Englishmen perceiuing this, determined to keepe the gate S. Denis, but they were deceived: for the cheines were drawne in euerie street, and women and children cast downe stones and scalding water on the Englishmens heads, and the citizens in armour fought with them and chased them from street to street, and from lane to lane, and slew and hurt diuerse and manie of them.

The bishop of Terwine, chancelor there for king Henrie, the lord Willoughbie, and sir Simon Moruier, toke great paine to appease the people: but when they saw that all auailed not, they withdrew into the basilie of saint Anthonie, which fortresse they had well vittelled, and furnished with men and munitions. Whilst this rumor was in the towne, the earle of Dunois and others scaled the walles, and some passed the riuer by botes, and opened the gate of saint James, by the which the constable with his banner displayed, entered, at whose entrie the Parisiens made great ioy. The bishop and the lord Willoughbie, with their small companie, defended their fortresse ten daies, looking for aid: but when they saw that no comfort appeared, they yelded their fortresse, so that they and theirs, with certaine baggage, might peaceably returne to Rone. Thus was the cite of Paris brought into the possession of Charles the French king, through the vntrue demeanour of the citizens, who contrarie to their othe, and promised allegiance, like false and inconstant people, so reuolted from the English.

After this glorious gaine, the Frenchmen besieged the towne of Craill vpon Oise, wherof sir William Chamberlaine was capteine, the which with five hundred Englishmen issued out of the towne, and after long fight, discomfited his enemies, & slew two hundred, and toke a great number prisoners: the remnant not liking the market, departed to Campaigne, and other townes adioining. During which season, twelue burgesses of the towne of Gisors sold it for monie vnto Poiton de Vantrailes. But he had not the castell deliuered, & therefore with all his power, he besieged the same; wherof the lord Talbot being aduertised, sent for the lord Scales, and they both with eightene hundred men rescued the castell, toke the towne, and discomfited their enemies, and slew of them aboue foure hundred persons.

Now according to the old saieing (when the steed is stolen that the stable doze) the duke of Yorke appointed at the last parlement to be regent of France (after that Paris, Saint Denis, Saint Germans in Laie, and diuerse other townes in France were taken and betrayed for lacke of conuenient succours) was sent ouer into Normandie with eight thousand men, and in his companie, the earles of Salisburie, and Suffolke, and the lord Fauconbridge, and diuerse other valiant captains. When he was landed, the earle of Salisburie besieged the castell of Chambois, which thortlie was to him rendered. Then the duke removed to Rone, where he set good orders, and did great iustice to the countrie; wherefore the Normans in their chronicles highlie extoll him for that point. Whobest they saie, that he gat by long siege the towne and abbeie of Jfecampe, and did none other notable act, during the time of his rule and gouernment.

In this fourteenth yeare, the duke of Burgognie determined by the aduise of his counsell, to attempt the winning of Calis. The prouision was wondrous great which was made for the atchiuing of this enterpryse: wherof sir John Katcliffe, deputy of the towne of Calis, hauing perfect intelligence, aduertised king Henrie, and his counsell, who incontinently sent thither the earle of Poitaigne, sonne to the duke of Summerfet, and the lord Camois, with fiftene hundred men, and great foison of bittels, that issued out of Calis, and came before Crauelin, where they were encountered with a great number of Flemings, who were thortlie discomfited, foure hundred of them slaine, and six score taken prisoners. Within two daies after, the Englishmen droue by fine force the lords of Warren and Bado to the barriers of Ard, and discomfited their whole companie, to the number of fiftene hundred, slew seauen valiant captains, and toke manie gentlemen prisoners.

The duke of Burgognie, remaining still in his former purpose, assembled together, of Flemings, Picards, Hollanders, and Venelouers, a great armie, to the number of fortie thousand, so well armed, so well vittelled, so well furnished with ordnance, and garnished in all things, that they thought and blazed amongst themselves, that the Calissians would leaue their towne desolate, and flee for their safegard, hearing onelie of the dukes approach: but they reckoned without their host; and so paid a dearer shot than they looked for. Now when this mightie armie was past the water of Crauelin, the duke intending to begin his feats, assaulted the little poxe castell of Die, which hauing in it but fiftie souldiers, wherof twelue sold their liues deuelie; the remnant (compelled by necessitie) yelded themselves to the dukes mercie.

mercie. Which to please the Gantois (being of number most puissant in all the armie) liberrallie gaue to them, both the castell and prisoners, who (rude & cruell people) not onelie rased the castell, but also hanged nine and twentie of the captiues, and had so done with the residue, if the duke, offended at their cruelty, had not willed a staie.

Calis besieged by the duke of Burgogne.

After this feat done, the Picards besieged the castell of Marke, & gaue thre assaults to it. The Englishmen within, being in number two hundred and sir, under the gouernement of their capteine sir John Ceding, balliantlie defended the place; untill at length, despairing of succours, they yelbed themselves (their liues & lims saued.) The castell of Marke being thus deliuered, was rased to the ground. When the duke, accompanied with the duke of Clences, the earle of Stamper, the lord of Dantoing, Croie, Criquite, Humiers, and manie other barons and knights, with his great armie, came before Calis, & placed his siege about the same, most to his advantage: he gaue thre assaults, and gained nothing by them, but constrained to keepe them further off. At the first assault, the hire which was come to see the duke of Burgogne, was sore wounded and hurt. A coling card it was also vnto them, still to see ships arriued in the haven out of England, openlie before their faces, laden with vittels, munition and men.

The dukes enterprise to bar the haven.

The duke on a daie riding about to vieto the situation of the towne, to the intent to take his most advantage (either by assault or otherwise) was quickelie espied, and with the shot of a canon, a trumpet, which rode next before him, and thre horses in his companie were slaine out of hand. The lord of Croie, and a conuenient number with him, was appointed to besiege the castell of Guisnes, where he got little profit, and did lesse harme. Moreover, for the better aduancing of his enterprise, the duke minded to stop by the haven; so that no succours should enter there. Whereupon, he caused foure great hulkes to be fraught with great square stones, cemented and joined together with lead, to the intent they should lie still like a mount, and not seuer in sunder.

These ships, with the residue of the dukes nauie, were conueied into the mouth of Calis haven, and at a full sea, by craft and policie, were sonke downe to the ground. But whether God would not that the haven should be destroyed, either the conueiers of the hulkes knew not the verie chanell; these foure great ships, at the low water, late openlie vpon the sands, without hurting the rode or chanell. Which when the souldiers perceived, they issued out of the towne, brake the ships, and caried both the stones and timber into the towne. An other deuise the duke had, which was the building of a strong bassile vpon a little mountaine, which he furnished with foure hundred men, and much artillerie, that did impeach the Englishmen from issuing forth of the towne, to their great displeasure.

Whilist these things were adoming, there came to the duke an herald called Benbroke, belonging to the duke of Glocester, who declared to the duke of Burgogne, that the protector of England his master (if God would send him wind & weather) would giue him battell, either there, or in anie other place within his owne countrie, where he would appoint, and that with speed, if God vouchsafed him wind and weather. The duke answered the herald; Sir, saie to your master, that his challenge is both honorable and reasonable: howbeit, he shall not need to take the paines to seeke me in mine owne countrie, for (God willing) he shall find me here, till I haue my will of the towne, ready to abide him and all the power he can bring. After the herald had receiued this answer, he was highlie cheered, and had a cup and an hundred guildens to him given in reward, and so he returned to Calis.

After whose departure, the duke called a council in the chiefe pavilion of the Gantois, about this message of the English herald, where it was determined with great courage, that they would abide the battell, if the duke of Glocester came to offer it. Whilist this great matter was in consultation, the Calisians, not well content with the bassile which the duke had newlie builded, issued out of the towne in great number, part on horsebacke and part on foot. The footmen ran to assault the bassile, and the horsemen went betwene the armie & the assailants, to stop the aid and succours that might come. Upon the sounding of the alarme, the duke himselfe in person was comming on foot, to releue his men: but being kept backe a space by the English horsemen, in that delay of time, the bassile was wone by fire force, and eight score persons of those that kept it slaine, beside the residue which were taken prisoners, and led to Calis, with all the ordinance and artillerie, to the high displeasure of the duke and his prudent council. The next daie after, there sprang a rumour in the armie (no man could tell how) that the duke of Glocester with a great puissance was already imbarcked, and would arriue at the next tide. The same night the duke fled awaie, and sent in all hast to the lord of Croie, to raise his siege before Guisnes, which tidings were to him verie iolous, for he neither got nor saued. So these two capteins departed, leauing behind them, both ordinance, vittels, & great riches.

The French writers (to saue the honor of the duke of Burgogne) saie, that there was a certeine discord and commotion amongst the Flemings and Dutch nation, affirming, that the great lords and the Picards (whome the Frenchmen greatly extoll) would betraye and sell the Flemings and their friends, and that for the same cause in a great furie they cried; Home, home: and would not carrie for anie request that the duke could make, and so by their misgouernance, the duke was inforced to raise his siege, and to depart. The Flemish authors affirme the contrarie, saing, that they were ready to abide the coming of the duke of Glocester: but the duke of Burgogne fearing to be intrapped betwene the English armie without, and the garrison within the towne of Calis, fled awaie in the night, giuing to them no warning thereof before, so that for lacke of time, and conuenient space to lade and carrie their stuffe, and being commanded vpon the sudden to dislodge with all speed, they left behind them their vittels, tents, and other things, to their great losse and detriment.

Howseuer the matter was, the truth is, that he fled the six and twentieth daie of Iulie, in the night. And the next daie in the morning, the duke of Glocester landed in Calis haven; & straight went into the campe, where his enemies the night before were lodged, and there he found manie faire peeces of ordinance, and speciallie one called Digeon: so named, after the chafe towne of Burgogne; beside pavilions, wine, beere, meale, and innumerable vittels. The duke of Glocester, seeing his enemies reueled, hauing in his companie five and twentie thousand men, entered into slanders, burning houses, killing such as made resistance, destroying the countrie on euerie part, setting fire in the townes of Popertind, Baillieu, and others. Also, they wasted the suburbs of diuerse closed townes, and after passed by Fleu castell, Aimefure, and Malon chapel: and then entering into Artois, they came to Arques and Blaydesques, setting fire in euerie part where they came. Thus they passed by saint Omers, and finally by Arde returned to Guisnes: and so to Calis at the six weeks end, with great booties of cattell and riches.

Catharine mother to King Henrie married Owen Tudor.

In all this their iournie, they had but small stocks of bread, which caused much faintnesse and diuerse di-scases in the armie, whereof a greater number died than did of the enemies sword: and yet the Flemings wrote, that they of Bruges distressed to the number of two thousand Englishmen in this iournie. Howbeit, the French writers affirme, that the Englishmen lost more of their companie in the marches about Ard, than they did in all other places where they had bene before, hauing passed through the parties of Flanders, without encounter, or any damage done to them by the enemies. After that, the duke of Glocester returned into England, where he was aduertised, that James king of Scots had besieged the castell of Rochesburgh with thirtie thousand men: but the capitaine thereof, sir Rafe Greie defended it so manfullie, for the space of twentie daies, that king James being then aduertised, that the earle of Portumberland was comming to fight with him, fled with no lesse losse than dishonour, and enough of both.

Shoorte after that the duke of Burgognie had bene before Calis, at the desire of princes, a truce for a time was moued to be had betwene the king of England & the said duke. For which cause were sent to Grauelin for the king of England, Henrie Beauforde cardinall of Winchester, John lord Botvort duke of Northfolke, Humfreie earle of Stafford, and diuerse other well learned & honorable personages. And for the duke of Burgognie, there appeared the duchesse his wife, the bishop of Arras, the lord of Croie, and diuerse other. At this treatie, a truce was taken for a small time, and for a lesse obserued, which was concluded betwene the king of England, and the duchesse of Burgognie (interlacing the duke and his name.)

Some thinke, that the king of England would neuer enter in league with him, because he had broken his promise, and waxing sealed to him, and to his father. Other imagined this to be done of a cattell, to cast a mist before the French kings eyes, to the intent he should beleue that this feat was wrought by the duchesse, without assent or knowledge of the duke or his counsell; and so he was not bound to accomplish anie act or thing done in his twines treatie. Thus may you see, that princes sometime with such vaine glosses and scoznesfull expostitions will hide their doings, and cloke their purposes; to the intent they would not either be espied, or else that they may plucke their heads out of the collar at their pleasure. But (as the common opinion goeth) he which is a promise-breaker escapeth not alwaies with impunity. For it is well sene by daillie and vsuall euents both in princes and priuat persons, that for violating their faith, and breaking of promise, manie discomforts arise, and inconueniences not a few do follow. To the due keeping whereof the heathen bare such a religious confidence, that a prophane man in respect of others, preferreth it before sacrifice, the sentence is of great excellencie out of a pagans mouth:

Non boue mactato cœlestia numina gaudent,

About this season, queene Batharine mother to the king of England departed out of this life, and was buried by hir husband in the abbeye of Westminster. This woman, after the death of king Henrie the sixth hir husband, being young and lustie, following more hir owne wanton appetite than frendlie counsell, and regarding more private affection than princelike honour, toke to husband ysallie a galant gentleman and a right beautifull person, inducd with manye goodlie gifts both of bodie & mind, called Owen Teufler, a man descended of the noble lineage and ancient line of Cadwallader last king of the Britains. By this Owen he brought forth three goodlie sonnes, Edmund, Jasper, and another that was a monke in Westminster, and liued a small time: also a daughter which in hir youth departed out of this transitorie life.

King Henrie, after the death of his mother, because, they were his brethren of one wombe, created Edmund earle of Richmund, and Jasper earle of Penbrooke: whiche Edmund of Margaret daughter and sole heire to John duke of Summerfet begat Henrie, who after was king of this realme, called Henrie the seuenth, of whome ye shall heare more in place conuenient. This Ewen, after the death of the quene his wife, was apprehended and committed to ward, because that (contrarie to the Statute made in the first yeare of this king) he presumptuously had married the quene, without the kings especiall assent, out of which prison he escaped, and let out other with him, but was againe apprehended, and after escaped againe. ¶ Polychronicon saith that he was a squier of low birth and like degree, the same author also reporteth that he was commanded to Heligate by the duke of Glocester then lord protector of the realme: out of which prison he brake by the helpe of a priest that was his chapline. Neuerthelesse he was apprehended afterwards by the lord Beaumont, & brought againe to Heligate, whence (when he had remanied there a while) he was deliuered and set at libertie.]

The duchesse of Bedford also, sister to Lewes erle of S. Paule, more for affection than increase of honour, without counsell of hir friends, married a lustie yong knight, called sir Richard-Module, to the great displeasure of hir uncle the bishop of Teruine, and the earle hir brother. This sir Richard was made baron of Alizers, and after earle, and had by this ladie manie noble sonnes, and saite daughters, of the which one was the ladie Elizabeth, after queene of England, by reason she was married vnto Edward the fourth. ¶ Whilste this marriage was a celebrating, Jane late queene of England, and before duchesse of Britaine, daughter to the king of Spaurre, and wiffe to king Henrie the fourth, died at the manor of Hauering, and was buried by hir husband at Canturbrie. ¶ About the same time, deceased also the countesse of Marworke, and Henrie archbishop of Yorke.

In all this their tourne, they had but small store of bread, which caused much faintnesse and diuerse diseases in the armie, whereof a greater number died than did of the enemies sword: and yet the Flemings write, that they of Burges distressed to the number of two thousand Englishmen in this tourne. Holbeitt, the French writers affirme, that the Englishmen lost more of their companie in the marches about Ard, than they did in all other places where they had bene before, hauing passed through the parties of flanders, without encounter, or any damage done to them by the enemies. After that, the duke of Glocester returned into England, where he was aduertised, that James king of Scots had besieged the castell of Rockeburgh with thirtie thousand men: but the captaine thereof, sir Rafe Greie defended it so manfully, for the space of twentie daies, that king James being then aduertised, that the earle of Northumberland was comming to fight with him, fled with no lesse losse than dishonour, and inough of both.

Shortly after that the duke of Burgogonie had bene before Calles, at the desire of princes, a truce for a time was moued to be had betwene the king of England & the said duke. po:mandie, he not onlie lost this towne of Harfluc, but also the cite of Rone, and the whole duchie of po:mandie, whereas now (being but a depatie) he got it to his high praise and glorie. In this peare was James king of Scots murdered by certeine traitors of his owne subiects: euen in his bedchamber by night, which king (saith Polychr.) had bene prisoner in England fiftene yeares, the murderers of whom being afterwards taken, were terrible executed.]

The lord Talbot besieged Tankersle, and after foure moneths had it simple to him rendered. This towne was no great gaine to the Englishmen, for in the meane season, the French king in his owne person besieged the strong towne of Pontreueault Vonne; whereof Thomas Gerard being capteine, more for desire of reward, than for feare of enemies, sold the towne to the French king, and had of him great gifts and intertainment, as afterwards was openlie known. This towne had bene rescued of the French king fought withall, if one chance had not happened. For the duke of Borke about that time was discharged of his office, and the earle of Warwicke preferred to the same, so that the duke of Borke, lieng as then at Rone, would haue gladlie rescued the towne, if his authoritie had not surceased; and the earle of Warwicke could not come in time, for the wind was contrarie to him.

The earle of Warwicke
made regent of France.

This present peare was a parlement holden at Westminster, in the which manie god and profitable acts for the preservation of concord at home, and defence against the enemies abroad, were ordeined and deuised. Arthur of Britaine constable of France, and John duke of Alanson, were sent by the French king into po:mandie, with a great armie, to besiege the towne of Auranches, standing vpon the knop of an hill: where after they had laien a certeine space without gaine, the lord Talbot with a valiant companie of men came thither, and offered the enemies battell. Which when they at all hands refused, the lord Talbot perceling their faint hearts, raised his field, and in the open sight of them all, entered into the towne, and the next daie issued out; and finding the Frenchmen riding abroad to destroye the plaine countrie, he compassed them about, and slue manie of them, and toke diuers prisoners. Although the Frenchmen got neither hono: nor profit by this iourne, yet they enterprised a greater matter, as the winning of Rone; in so much that Douton de Sanctreils, and the Bre, with manie other notable captains, hauing promise of certeine burgeses of that cite to haue entrie made them, secretlie in the night came forwarde to a towne called Kise or Kiz, not past foure leagues from Rone, and there lodged.

The lord Talbot, the lord Scales, and sir Thomas Biriell hearing of their approach, set out of Rone at midnight, & with great paine came to Kise so couertlie in the morning, that the French suddenlie surprised and set vpon, like men all amazed ran awaie and fled. In the chase were taken the lord of Fontaines, sir Aleine Geron, sir Lewes de Walle, and threescore knights, and esquires, beside others; and there were slaine two hundred and moze. The Bre escaped verie narrowlie, by swiftnesse of his horse, though not unwounded. The Englishmen returned to the towne of Kise, and found there great number of horses & other baggages, which they solowlie brought with them to Rone.

Anno Reg. 16.
Warwicke regent came into France.

On the first daie of Nouember this present peare, the earle of Warwicke, as regent of France, passed the sea, after he had bene seuen times shipped and unshipped, and landed at Bomflue with a thousand fresh souldiers, and came to Rone, and then the duke of Borke returned into England. Betwene the change of these two captains, the duke of Burgognie (which foze enuied the glorie of the Englishmen) besieged the towne of Crotoy, with ten thousand men and moze, hauing with him great plentie of guns and goodlie ordinance. The earle of Warwicke aduertised hereof, sent the lord Fauconbridge, sir Thomas Biriell, sir John Spantgoneric, Thomas Limbrike, Thomas Chandois, David Hall, and diuerse other knights and esquires, and an host of five thousand men, which passed the river of Some, beside the towne of saint Valerie, landing in the water by to the chin, so glad were they to rescue their felowes.

When the duke of Burgognie was informed of the approaching of the lord Talbot, he with all his power (sailing foure hundred, which were left in a baskille by him, were netwile buidged) fled to Abuille, the battell was none gained by the Englishmen, and those within either slaine or taken. After this, the lord Talbot sent to the duke of Burgognie, signifying that except he would come forth, and bide by a battell, he would bitterlie wast his countrie of Picardie. According whereunto (the duke of Burgognie spinning) he burnt townes, spoiled and slue manie people in Picardie. But for all those his doings, the duke of Burgognie appeared not, but got him from Abuille to Amiens, so that the lord Talbot abode twentie daies full in Picardie and Arthois, destroying all afore him, and after returned vntouched. In the meane season, sir Thomas Biriell had gotten all the dukes carriages and ordinance, and left as much bittell in the towne of Crotoy, as would serue sir hundred men a whole peare, and conueied the residue to the earle of Warwicke, who highlie praised them for their hardie doings.

After this, Henrie earle of Po:taigne, sonne to Edmund duke of Summerfet, arrived at Chierburgh with foure hundred archers, & three hundred speares, and passed through po:mandie, till he came into the countie of Paine, where he besieged a castell called saint Anian, in the which were three hundred Scots, besides Frenchmen. This castell he toke by assault, slue the Scots, and hanged the Frenchmen, because they were once sworn English. After this he got also another castell, two miles from saint Julians, called Alegerche, which was shortly after recovered; and the lord of Camelwis, which came to the rescue of the same, in the meane waie was intraped and taken. Thus flowed the victorie, some time on the one partie, and sometime on the other. For about the same time the townes of Odeur in Wyre, and saint Susan were sold and deliuered to the French part, by the vnt ruth of the burgeses and inhabitants of the same townes, about the latter end of this sixteenth peare.

This peare (by reason of great tempests) raging winds, and rain, there rose such scarlitie, that wheat was sold at three shillings foure pence the bushell, wine at twelue pence the gallon, bassalt at fourtene pence the bushell, and malt at thirtene shillings foure pence the quarter, and all other graines at ex cessiue prices above the old rate. Wherevpon Steven Wolone (saith Polychronicon) at the same season mai:or of London, tendering the state of the cite in this want of breadcorne, sent into Poulse certeine ships, which returned laden with plentie of rie: wherewith he did much good to the people in that hard time, speciallie to them of the cite, where the want of corne was not so extream as in some other places of the land, where the poze distressed people that were hungerbitten, made them bled of ferne rots, and by other hard shifts, till God provided remedie for their penurie by good successe of husbandrie.]

In the moneth of June, the earle of Huntingdon (as Steward of Guien) with two thousand archers, and foure hundred speares was sent into Gascoigne, as a supplie to the countrie and comons of the same:

bastille. If he had tarried still at Hainboulton, the lord Talbot which had passed the river of Dife in two small leather botes, had either taken or slaine him the same night. The Englishmen the next daie in good order of battell came before the towne of Donthoife, thinking there to haue found the French king, but he was gone: and in his lodging they found great riches, and much stuffe which he could not haue space for to carrie awaie for feare of the sudden invasion.

Then the duke with his power entred into the towne, and sent for new vittels, and repaired the towers and bulwarks about the towne, & diuerse times assaulted the bastille of the Frenchmen, of the which he made no great accompt, because they were not of power either to assault or stop the vittels or succors from the towne. After this, the duke intending once againe to offer the French king battell, left behind him at Donthoife for capteine there, sir Geruais Clifton, sir Nicholas Burdet, Henrie Chandos, and a thousand soldiers, and therewith remouing with his whole armie, came before Poisse, where he set himselfe and his men in good order of battell readie to fight. There issued out some of the French gentlemen to skirmish with the Englishmen, but to their losse: for diuerse of them were slaine, and foure valiant horsemen taken prisoners. The duke perceiving the faint hearts of the Frenchmen, and that they durst not encounter in field with the English power, dislodged from Poisse, and came to Maunt, and some after to Rone.

Anno Reg. 20.

slaine.

When the regent and the lord Talbot were returned againe into Normandie, the French king considering how much it should rebound to his dishonour to let rest the towne of Donthoife in his enemies hands, sith he had bene at such charges and trauele about the winning thereof, he assembled all his puissance. And returning suddenlie vnto Donthoife, he first by assault got the church, and after the whole towne, took the capteine, and diuerse other Englishmen, and due to the number of foure hundred, which sold their liues dearelie: for one French writer affirmeth, that the French king lost there three thousand men; and the whole garrison of the Englishmen was but onelie a thousand. Among other that were slaine here of the defendants, was sir Nicholas Burdet knight, chiefe butler of Normandie. After this hot tempest, the weather began somewhat to wate more calme: for king Henrie and king Charles agreed to send ambassadors to comen of some good conclusion of peace: so that king Henrie sent the cardinall of Winchester, with diuerse other noble personages of his counsell to Calis, with whom was also sent Charles duke of Oyleance yet prisoner in England, to the intent that he might be both author of the peace, and also procurer of his owne deliuerance.

The French king sent the archbishop of Reimes, and the earle of Dunois; and the duke of Burgognie sent the lord de Creuecueur, and diuerse other. All these met at Calis, where the duke of Oyleance courtlesly receiued the earle of Dunois (his bastard brother) thanking him greatly for his paines taken in gouerning his lands & countrie, during the time of his captiuitie and absence. Diuerse communications were had, as well for the deliuerance of the duke as for a small peace; but nothing was concluded, saving that an other meeting was appointed, so that in the meane season the demands of either partie might be declared to their soueraigne lords and maisters: and hereupon the commissioners brake vp their assembly, and returned into their countries. The Englishmen (as the French writers record) required not onelie to possesse peaceable the two duchies of Aquit-taine and Normandie, discharged of all resort, supererogitie, & soueraintie against the realme of France, the kings and gouernours of the same; but also to be restored to all the townes, cities, and places, which they within thirtie yeares next before gone and past, had conquered in the realme of France. Which request the Frenchmen thought verie unreasonable, and so both parties, minding rather to gaine or saue than to lose, departed for that time, as yet haue heard.

After this meeting thus prozaged, Philip duke of Burgognie, partly moued in conscience to make amends to Charles duke of Oyleance (as yet prisoner in England) for the death of duke Lewis his father, whome duke John, father to this duke Philip, cruelly murdered in the citie of Paris; and partly intending the aduancement of his nece, the ladie Marie, daughter to Adolfe duke of Cleue (by the which alliance, he trusted, that all old rancor should cease) continued wates to haue the said duke of Oyleance set at libertie, vpon promise by him made to take the said ladie Marie vnto wife. This duke had bene prisoner in England euer since the battell was fought at Agincourt, vpon the daie of Crispine and Crispinian, in the yeare 1415, and was set now at libertie in the moneth of Nouember, in the yeare 1440, caleng for his ransome foure hundred thousand crownes, though other saie but three hundred thousand.

The cause whie he was detained so long in captiuitie, was to pleasure thereby the duke of Burgognie: for so long as the duke of Burgognie continued faithfull to the king of England, it was not thought necessarie to suffer the duke of Oyleance to be ransomed, least vpon his deliuerance he would not cease to seeke meanes to be reuenged vpon the duke of Burgognie, for the old grudge and displeasure betwixt their two families, and therefore such ransome was demanded for him as he was neuer able to pay. But after the duke of Burgognie had broken his promise, and was turned to the French part, the counsell of the king of England deuided how to deliuer the duke of Oyleance, that thereby they might displeasure the duke of Burgognie. Which thing the duke of Burgognie perceiving, doubted what might follow if he were deliuered without his knowledge, and therefore to his great cost practised his deliuerance, paid his ransome, and ioined with him amitie and alliance by marriage of his nece.

This duke being now deliuered, and speaking better English than French, after his arriual in France, repaired to the duke of Burgognie, and according to his promise and conuention, married the ladie Marie of Cleue, in the towne of saint Omers, on whome he begat a sonne, which after was French king, and called Lewis the twelfth. [Fettered for Lewis the twelfth.] That ranke inward, as they may perchance be palliated by sleight of surgerie; so sildome come they to sound cure, but often do burst out againe to greater paine and perill of patient than euer afore: and so befall it betwixt these two noble houses of Oyleance and Burgognie, who for all this marriage and plausible peace (that continued a twentie yeares) still out yet after at square vnattainable: their children and cousins, to the great vniquieting of much part of christendome, speciallie in the times of king Francis the first, and his sonne Henrie the second, heires of the house of Oyleance. For John earle of Angoulesme, vncle to this duke Charles, begat Charles, father to the said king Francis: which earle John had bene as pledge in England for the debt of Lewis duke of Oyleance, from the last yeare of king Henrie the fourth; till that now his nephew being deliuered, made thist for monie, and ransomed him also, and at at length refused him to his countrie.

In the beginning of this twentieth yeare, Richard duke of Poike, regent of France, and gouvernour of Normandie, determined to invade the territories of his enemies both by land and by sea, and in severall places, and thereupon without delay of time he sent the lord Willoughbie with a great cru of soldiers to destroye the countrie of Amiens, and John lord Talbot was appointed to besiege the towne of Diepe; and the regent himselfe accompanied with Edmund duke of Summerfet, set forward into the duchie of Anjou. The lord Willoughbie, according to his commission, entred into the countrie of his enemies in such wise upon the sudden, that a great number of people were taken yet they could withdraw into any place of safeguard.

The Frenchmen in the garrisons adjoining, assisted with the clamour and crye of the poore people, issued out in good order, and manfully fought with the Englishmen. But in the end, the Frenchmen seeing their fellows in the forefront slaine downe, and killed without mercie, turned their backs, and fled: the Englishmen followed, and slew manie in the chase; and such as escaped the sword, were robbed by the earle of saint Paule, who was comming to aid the Englishmen. In this conflict were slaine aboute six hundred men of armes, and a great number taken. The dukes of Poike and Summerfet likewise entered into Anjou and Maine, and there destroyed townes, and spoiled the people, and with great prizes and prisoners repaired againe into Normandie, whither also the lord Willoughbie withdrew, after his valiant enterpryse achieved (as before ye have heard) with rich spoiles and good prisoners.

The duke of Summerfet upon further valiance, entered into the marches of Britaine, and toke by force assault a towne named la Cerche, appertaining to the duke of Alanson, spoiling and burning the same. This done, he went to Bonzaie, where he sojourned two moneths, sending forth daile his men of war to destroye the countries of Anjou, Craonnois, and Chatraonnois. The French king sent the marshall Blach with foure thousand men to resist the invasions of the duke of Summerfet, which marshall intended to have set on the duke in his lodgings in the dead time of the night: but that (as by a wise and hardie captaine) well foresaw, he marched forward, and met the Frenchmen halfe the waie, and after long fight, discomfited them, slew an hundred of the marshalls men, and toke thre score and two prisoners, wherof the chiefe were the lord Dauphine, sir Letwes de Suell, all the other (almost) were knights and esquires.

After this encounter, the duke toke the towne of Beaumont le vicount, and manned all the fortresses on the frontiers of his enemies, and with rich booties and prisoners returned againe to the duke of Poike. In this meane time the lord Talbot, besieging the towne of Diepe, intrenched it with deepe trenches; building also upon the mount Paulet a strong and noisome bastille. But at length perceiving the towne to be strongly defended, and that he lacked such furniture of men, vittels, and ordnance, as was necessarie for the winning of it, he delivered the custody of the bastille, with the governance of the siege to his bassard sonne, a valiant young gentleman, and departed to Rone for aid, monie, and munition. The French king advertised hereof, sent his sonne the Dolphin of Vienne with the earle of Dunois, and sixtine thousand men to raise the siege from Diepe.

Three daies they assailed the bastille, in the which six hundred Englishmen were inclosed, and at length because powder and weapon failed them within, the Frenchmen won it, and toke the bassard Talbot prisoner, with sir William Betsford, and sir John Keyleie, which shortly after were redeemed. The other English soldiers, seeing the bastille wonne by the Frenchmen, stood all a daie in good order of battell, and in the night following, politickly saved themselves and returned to Rone, without losse or damage. In the assaulting of the bastille, the Frenchmen saie, they slew two hundred Englishmen; and denie not but that they lost five hundred of their owne men, beside those that were hurt. Whilste these things were a doing, Philip duke of Burgognie made sharpe warre against the earle of saint Paule, in taking from him his townes and castels, that made him to renounce his allegiance sworn and promised to the king of England, and returned to the French part.

The English captaine in Guen besieged the strong towne of Tartas, belonging to the lord Dalbryeth their old and ancient enemy. The towne perceiving that it was not able to resist the force of the Englishmen any long time, toke appointment, that the towne should remaine neuter. For assurance thereof, they delivered Cadet the sonne of the lord de la Bzeth in pledge, upon this condition; that if the said lord de la Bzeth would not assent to the agreement, then he should signifie his refusal to the English captaine within thre moneths next ensuing, and he to have his pledge, and they to do their best. The French king, at the request of the lords of Guen, caused the lord de la Bzeth to signifie his disagreement unto the earle of Huntington, as then lieutenant to the king of England in the duchie of Aquitaine. And therewith to gratifie the lords of Guen, he assembled an armie of threescore thousand men, & came to Tholouse, and so to Tartas, to whom the chiefeins of the towne, seeing no succours comming from the king of England, rendered the towne: and Cadet de la Bzeth, which was left there as a pledge, was also delivered.

The French king, after the yielding of Tartas, removed to saint Severine, which towne he toke by force, slew thre hundred persons, and toke sir Thomas Kampston prisoner. After this, he came to the citie of Arques, toke a bulwourke by force, and had the towne yielded to him by composition. The captaine, which was the lord of Montferant, departed with all the English cru to Burdeaur, where he found the earle of Longue, the Capdau de Beuse, and sir Thomas Kampston, which was a little before delivered. After this, the fortresses of the Kiell and Ghermandie were also yielded to the French king: who notwithstanding at length was constrained for lacke of vittels (which were cut off by the Englishmen, that laie abroad in diverse fortresses for the purpose) to breake up his armie, & to retire into France. And then after his departure, the Englishmen recovered againe the citie of Arques, & the other townes by the French king gained, and toke prisoner his lieutenant called Reginald Guillian the Burgognion, and manie other gentlemen, and all the meane soldiers were either slaine or hanged.

While the French king was in Guen, the lord Talbot toke the towne of Conchet, and after marched toward Gallardon, which was besieged by the bassard of Dileance, otherwile called the earle of Dunois: which earle hearing of the lord Talbots approach, raised his siege, and saved himselfe. The Frenchmen a little before this season, had taken the towne of Cureau by treason of a sisher. Sir Francis the Arragonois hearing of that chance, appareled six strong fellows like men of the countrie, with sacks and baskets, as carriers of corne and vittels, and sent them to the castell of Cornill, in the which diverse Englishmen were kept as prisoners, and he with an ambush of Englishmen late in a ballie nigh to the fostrell.

The six counterfet husbandmen entered the castell unsuspected, and straight came to the chamber of the captiue, & laing hands on him, gaue knowledge to them that laie in ambush to come to their aid. The which suddenlie made forth, and entered the castell, slue and toke all the frenchmen, and set the Englishmen at libertie: which thing done, they set fire in the castell, and departed to Rome with their bootie and prisoners. This exploit they had not achieved peradventure by force (as happilie they mistrusted) and therefore by subtiltie and deceit sought to accomplish it, which meanes to vse in warre is tollerable, so the same warre be lawfull; though both fraud & bloudshed otherwise be forbidden euen by the instinct of nature to be put in practise and vse; and that doth the poet insinuat in a proper sententious verse, saing:

But now to speake somewhat of the dowings in England in the meane time. Whilest the men of war were thus occupied in martiall feates, and daillie skirmishes, within the realme of France: ye shall vnderstand, that after the cardinall of Winchester, and the duke of Gloucester, were (as it seemed) reconciled either to other, yet the cardinall, and the archbishop of Poike ceased not to do manie things without the consent of the king or of the duke, being (during the minority of the king) gouernor and protector of the realme, whereas the duke (as good cause he had) greatlie offended, thereupon in writing declared to the king, wherein the cardinall and the archbishop had offended both his maiestie, and the lawes of the realme. This complaint of the duke of Gloucester was contained in foure and twentie articles, which chieflie rested, in that the cardinall had from time to time, through his ambitious desire to surmount all others in high degrees of honor and dignitie, sought to enrich himselfe, to the great and notorious hinderance of the king, as in defrauding him not onelie of his treasure, but also in doing and practising things greatlie preiudiciall to his affaires in France, and namelie by setting at libertie the king of Scots, vpon so easie conditions, as the kings maiestie greatlie lost thereby, as in particularities thus followeth.

A complaint made to king Henrie the sixt, by the duke of Gloucester, vpon the cardinall of Winchester.

Ex Ed. Hall.
143, 144, 145,

These be in part, the points and articles, which I Humfre duke of Gloucester, for my truth & acquittal, said late, I would giue in writing (my right redoubted lord) vnto your highnesse, aduertising your excellencie, of such things in part, as haue bene done in your tender age, in derogation of your noble estate, and hurt of both your realmes, and yet be done and bled daillie.

2 First, the cardinall then being bishop of Winchester, toke vpon him the state of cardinall, which was naied and denaied him, by the king of most noble memorie, my lord your father (whome God assoile) saing that he had as lefe set his crowne beside him, as see him weare a cardinals hat, he being a cardinall. For he knew full well, the pride and ambition that was in his person, then being but a bishop, should haue so greatlie extolled him into more intollerable pride, when that he were a cardinall: and also he thought it against his freedom, of the chiefe church of this realme, which, that he worshipped, as bylle as euer did prince, that blessed be his soule. And howbeit, that my said lord your father (whome God assoile) would haue agreed him to haue had certeine clearks of this land cardinals, and to haue no bishoprikes in England; yet his intent was neuer to do so great derogation to the church of Canturburie, to make them that were his suffragans, to sit above their ordinarie and metropolitan. But the cause was that in generall, and in all matters which might concerne the weale of him, and of his realme, he should haue protectors of his nation, as other kings Christen had, in the court of Rome, and not to abide in this land, nor to be in any part of his counsels, as bene all the spirituall and temporall, at parlements and other great counsels, when you list to call them. And therefore, though it please you to do him that worship, to set him in your priue counsell after your pleasure: yet in your parlement, where euerie lord both spirituall and temporall, hath his place, he ought to occupie but his place as a bishop.

3 Item, the said bishop, now being cardinall, was assoiled of his bishoprike of Winchester, whereupon he sued vnto our holie father, to haue a bull declaratorie, notwithstanding he was assumpt to the state of cardinall, that the see was not void, where in deed it stood void by a certeine time, yet the said bull were granted; and so he was exempt from his ordinarie, by the taking on him the state of cardinall, and the church bishoprike of Winchester, so standing void, he toke againe of the pope (you not learned thereof ne knowing whereby he was fallen into the case of prouision) so that all his good was lawfullie & cleerlie forfeited to you my right doubted lord, with more; as the statute declareth plainelie for your advantage.

4 Item, it is not vnknown to you (doubted lord) how thorough your lands it is noised, that the said cardinall and the archbishop of Poike had and haue the gouernance of you, and all your land, the which none of your true liege men ought to vsurpe nor take vpon them. And haue also estranged me your sole vnckle, my cosine of Poike, my cosine of Huntington, and manie other lords of your kin, to haue any knowledge of any great matter, that might touch your high estate, or either of your realmes. And of lords spirituall, of right, the archbishop of Canturburie should be your chiefe counsellor, the which is also estranged and set aside. And so be manie other right sad lords, and well aduised, as well spirituall as temporall, to the great hurt of you my right doubted lord, and of your realmes, like as the experience and workes shewen cleerlie and euidentlie, more harme it is.

5 Item, in the tender age of you, my right doubted lord, for the necessitie of an armie, the said cardinall lent you foure thousand pounds vpon certeine iewels, prised at two and twentie thousand markes, with a letter of sale, that and they were not quitted at a certeine date, you should leise them. The said cardinall seeing your monie readie to haue quitted your iewels, caused your treasurer of England, at that date being, to pade the same monie, in part of an other armie, in defrauding you my right doubted lord of your said iewels; keeping them yet alwaie to his owne vse, to your right great losse, and his singular profit and auaile.

6 Item, the said cardinall, then being bishop of Winchester, and chancellour of England, deliuered the king of Scots, vpon certeine appointments (as maie be the seed) presumptuouslie, and of his owne authoritie, contrarie to the act of parlement. I haue heard notable men of law say, that they neuer heard the like thing done among them: which was to great a defamacion to your highnesse, and also to wed his name to the said king, whom that my lord of notable memoire, your father, whome God assoile, would neuer haue so deliuered. And there as he should haue paid for his costs forty thousand pounds, the said cardinall, chancelour of England, caused you to pardon him thereof ten thousand marks, whereof the greater summe he paid you, right a little, what, I report me to your highnesse.

7 Item, where the said cardinall lent you, my redoubted lord, great and notable summes, he hath had and his assignes, the rule and profit of the port of Hampton, where the customers bene his seruants, where (by likelihood and as it is to be supposed) standing the chiefe merchant of the wools of your land, that you be greatlie defrauded, and vnder that rule, what wools and other merchandises haue bene shipped, and maie be from time to time, hard is to esteeme, to the great hurt and preiudice of you my right doubted lord, and of all your people.

8 Item, howbeit that the said cardinall hath diuerse times lent you great summes of monie, since the time of your reigne, yet his loane hath bene so deferred and delaied, that for the most part, the conuenient season of the imploing of the good lent was passed. So that little fruit or none came thereof, as by experience both your realmes haue sufficientlie in knowledge.

9 Item, where there was iewels and plate pressed at cleuen thousand pounds in weight, of the said cardinall, forfeited to you my right redoubted lord, he gat him a restorment thereof for a loane of a little parcell of the same: and so defrauded you wholie of them, to your great hurt, and his auaille, the which god might greatlie haue eased your highnesse, in sparing as much of the poore commons.

10 Item, the cardinall being seoff of my said lord your father (whome God assoile) against his intent, gaue Elizabeth Beauchampe, three hundred markes liuelihod, where that his will was, that and she were wedded within a yeare, then to haue it, or else not, where in deed it was two or three years after, to your great hurt, and diminishing of your inheritance.

11 Item, notwithstanding that the said cardinall hath no maner of authoritie nor interest in the crowne, nor none maie haue by any possibilitie, yet he presumeth and taketh vpon him in partie, your estate roiall, in calling before him, into great abusion of all your land, and derogation of your highnesse, which hath not bene seene nor vsed in no daies heretofore, in greater estate than he is, without your expresse ordinance and commandement.

12 Item, the said cardinall, nothing considering the necessitie of you my right doubted lord, hath sued a pardon of dismes, that he should paie for the church of Winchester, for terme of his life, giuing thereby occasion to all other lords spirituall, to draw their good will for any necessitie, to grant any disme: and so to laie all the charge vpon the tempozaltie, and the poore people.

13 Item, by the gouernance and labour of the said cardinall, and archbishop of Yorke, there hath bene lost and dispended much notable and great good, by diuerse ambassadoys sent out of this realme. First to Arras, for a feigned colourable peace, whereas by likelihood it was thought and supposed, that it should neuer turne to the effectuall auaille of you my right doubted lord, nor to your said realmes: but vnder colour thereof, was made the peace of your aduersarie, and the duke of Burgognie. For else your partie aduersie, & the said duke, might not well haue found meanes nor waies to haue communed together, nor to haue concluded with other their confederations and conspirations made and wrought there, then, at that time, against your highnesse, whereby you might haue (right doubted lord) the greater partie of your obedience, as well in your realme of France, as in your duchie of Normandie, and much other thing gone greatlie, as through the said colourable treatie, & otherwaies, since the death of my brother of Bedford (whome God assoile.)

14 Item, now of late was sent an other ambassadour to Calis, by the labour and counsell of the said cardinall, and archbishop of Yorke, the cause why of the beginning, is to me your sole uncle, and other lords of your kin and counsell unknowen, to your great charge, and against the publike good of your realme; as it openlie appeareth. The which god if it be imploied for the defense of your lands, the merchandises of the same might haue had other course, and your said lands not to haue stand in so great mischance as they do.

15 Item, after that, to your great charge, and hurt of both your realmes, the said cardinall & archbishop of Yorke went to your said towne of Calis, and diuerse lords of your kin, and of your counsell in their fellowship, and there, as there was naturall warre betwene the duke of Aleance, and the duke of Burgognie, for murder of their fathers, a capitall enimitie like to haue indured for ever: the said cardinall and archbishop of Yorke licenced and suffered the said duke of Aleance, to intreat and common apart with the counsell of your said aduersaries, as well as with the duchies of Burgognie: by which meane the peace and alliance was made betwene the two dukes, to the greatest fortiffing of your said capitall aduersaries that could be thought, and consequentlie (my dere redoubted lord) to your greatest charge, and hurt to both your realmes. Under colour of which treatie, your said aduersaries in meane time wan your cite of Spear, and the countrie thereabout, and manie diuerse roades made into your duchie of Normandie, to the great noisance and destruction of your people, as it sheweth openlie.

16 Item, the said archbishop of Yorke, sent with other into this your realme from the said cardinall, after communication had with your aduersie partie, at your said towne of Calis, made at his coming into your notable presence at Windsor, all the traicsons and colour, all motions in the most apparent wise that he could, to induce your highnesse to your agrement, to the desires of your capitall aduersaries, as I saw there in your noble presence of his writing, at which time (as I vnderstood) it was his singular opinion, that is to saie: that you should leave your right, your title, and your honour of your crowne, and nomination of you king of France, during certeine yeares, & that you should utterlie absteine you and be content onelle in writing, with Rex Anglia, &c. to the great note of infamie that ever fell to you or any of your noble progenitours, since the taking of them first, the said title and right of your realme and crowne of France. To which matter in your presence there, after that it had liked your said highnesse, to aske mine aduise therevpon, with other of your blood and counsell; I answered and said, that I would neuer agre me thereto to die therefore, and of the same disposition I am yet, and will be while I live in conseruation of your honour, and of your oth made vnto your said crowne, in time of your coronation there.

17 Item, the said cardinall and archbishop of Yorke, haue so laboured vnto your highnesse, that you should intend to a new daie of convention, in March or Aprill next comming, where it is noised to be more against your worship than with it. And where it was euident to all the world, that the rupture and breaking of the said peace, should haue fallen heretofore, of your aduersie partie; because of the great vntruths. Note by that meanes it is like peradventure to be laid vnto the verie great slander of you my righte lord, like to come to none of their purpose nor effect, than other conuersions haue done afore time: and so by subtilties and counsell of your said enemies, your land (they in hope and trust of the said treatie) not withstanding nor puissantlie purchased for) shall be like vnder the colour of the same treatie to be burnt up and destroyed, lost, and bitterlie turned from your seruance.

18 Item it is said, that the deliuerance of the said duke of Breance, is bitterlie appointed by the mediation, counsell, and stirring of the said cardinal and archbishop of Yorke; and for that cause diuerse persons haue come from your adversaries, into this your realme, and the said duke also brought to your citie of London, where as my lord your father (whom God assoile) perishing so greatlie the inconueniencies, and harme that might fall, onlie by his deliuerance, concluded, ordeined, and determined in his last will, bitterlie in his wisdome, his conquest in his realme of France. And yet then it is to be done, by as great deliberation, solemnitie and suertie, as may be deuised or thought. And seeing now the disposition of your realme of France, the puissance and might of your enemies, and what aid they haue gotten against you there, aswell vnder the colour of the said treatie, as otherwise; what may or ought to be thought or said, for that laboring the said duke (all things considered) by such particular persons, the lords of your blood not called thereunto, I reposit me vnto your noble grace and excellencie, and vnto the said wise true men of this your realme.

19 Item, where that euerie true counsellor, speciallie vnto anie king or prince, ought of truth and of dutie, to counsell, promote, increase, prefer, and aduance the weale and prosperitie of his lord: the said cardinal, being of your counsell (my right doubted lord) hath late purchased of your highnesse, certeine great lands and liuelode: as the castell and lordship of Chirke in Wales, and other lands in this your realme; vnto which I was called suddenly, and so in eschewing the breaking and losse of your armies then againe, seeing none other remedie, gaue thereunto mine assent, thinking that who that euer laboured moued or stirred the matter first vnto your lordship, counselled you neither for your worship nor profit.

20 More, the said cardinal hath you bound a part, to make him a sure estate of all the said lands, by Charter next comming, as could be deuised by anie learned counsell; or else that suertie not made, the said cardinal to haue and reioy to him, and his heirs for euermore, the lands of the duchie of Lancaster, in Dorsethe, to the value of seuen or eight hundred marks by yeare. Which thing seemeth right strange and vnsene, and vnhard waies of anie liege man, to seke vpon his soueraigne lord, both in his inheritance and in his iewels and goods. For it is thought, but if right and extreame necessitie caused it, there should, nor ought no such things to be done: from which necessitie God (for his mercie) euer preserue your noble person. Wherefore my redoubted lord, seeing that ye should be so counselled, or stirred to leaue your crowne and inheritance in England; and also by fraud and subtil meanes, as is afore rehearsed, so to lose your iewels: in my truth and in mine acquit all (as me seemeth) I may not nor ought not counsell so great an hurt to you and to all your land.

21 Item, it is not vnknown to you my right doubted lord how oftentimes I haue offered my seruice, to and for the defense of your realme of France, and duchie of Normandie, where I haue bene put thereto by the labour of the said cardinal, in preferring other after his singular affection: which hath caused a great part of the said duchie of Normandie, aswell as of your realme of France to be lost; as it is well known. And what good (my right doubted lord) was lost on that account as thus last sent thither, with the epistle of Pope Martin, your counsell of France, hath well & clarelie declared to your highnesse here before.

22 Item, my right doubted lord, it is not to be known, that it had not bene possible to the said cardinal, to haue come to his great riches, but by such meanes, for of his church it might not rise, and inheritance he had none. Wherefore my right doubted lord, sith there is great god behoouefull at this time, for the weale and safeguard of your realmes, the pouertie, necessitie, & indigence of your liege people; in highnesse vnderstand, like it vnto your noble grace, to consider the said lurre of the said cardinal, and the great receipts that you be receiued in by the labour of him & of the archbishop, aswell in this your realme as in your realme of France and duchie of Normandie, where neither office, liuelode, nor capteine may be had, without to great god given vnto him, whereby a great part of all the losse that is lost, they haue bene the causers of; for who that would giue most, his was the price, not considering the merits, seruice, nor sufficiency of persons. Furthermore, it is greatlie to be considered, how, when the said cardinal had forfeited all his goods, because of prouision, as the statute there vpon more plainelie declareth; by hauing the rule of you my right doubted lord, purchased himselfe in great defraudation of your highnesse, a charter of pardon, the which god and it had be well gouerned, might manie yeares haue suffeined your warres, without anie tallage of your poore people.

23 Item, my redoubted lord, whereas I wrote much thing for the weale of you and of your realmes, peradventure some will saie and vnderstand, that I would or haue written by waile of accusement of all your counsell, which God knoweth, I do not: for your highnesse may well see, that I name them that be causers of the said inordinate rule. Wherefore, considering that the said cardinal and archbishop of Yorke bene they, that pretend the gouernance of you, and of your realmes and lordships: please it vnto your highnesse, of your rightfulnessesse to estrange them of your counsell, to that intent, that men may be at their freedom, to say what they thinke of truth.

24 For truth, I dare speake of my truth, the poore dare not do so. And if the cardinal and the archbishop of Yorke, may afterward declare themselves, of that is, and shalbe said of them; you my right doubted lord may then restore them againe to your counsell, at your noble pleasure.

When the king had heard the accusations thus laid by the duke of Gloucester against the cardinal, he committed the examination thereof to his counsell, whereof the more part were spirituall persons; so that what for feare, and what for fauour, the matter was winked at, and nothing said to it: onelie faire countenance was made to the duke, as though no malice had bene conceived against him. But benem will breake out, & inward grudge will some appeare, which was this yeare to all men apparant: for diuers secret attempts were aduanced forward this season against this noble man Humfries duke of Gloucester a far off, which in conclusion came so nere, that they bereft him both of life and land; as shall hereafter more plainelie appeere.

For first this yeare, dame Eleanor Cobham, wife to the said duke, was accused of treason; for that she by sorcerie and inchantment intended to destroye the king, to the intent to aduance his husband vnto the crowne.

buttillie kept, and wrongfullie withhelden them.

This offer seemed so profitable and also honorable to king Henrie and the realme, that the ambassa-dours were well heard, honourable received, and with rewards sent home into their countie. After whome were sent for the conclusion of the marriage into Witen, sir Edward Hall, sir Robert Ros, and John Grafton deane of S. Severines, the which (as all the chronographers agree) both concluded the ma-riage, and by protest affied the young ladie. The French king not a little offended herewith, sent his eldest sonne Lewis the Dolphin of Venne into Rouergue with a puissant armie, which toke the earle and his youngest sonne, with both his daughters, and by force obtained the countie of Arminache, Louvergne, Rouergue, and Spoulesonols, beside the cities Souerac & Caboc, chasing the bastard of Arminache out of his countie, and so by reason hereof, the concluded marriage was deferred, and that so long that it neuer toke effect; as hereafter it may appeare.

In this yeare was an act made by authoritie of the common counsell of London, that upon the sundaye no manner of thing within the franchises and liberties of the said citie should be bought or sold; neither vittels nor other thing. It was also enacted by the same common counsell with full consent, and ratified by the authoritie of the law-makers, that no artificer or handicrafts man should bring his wares, commodities, or woxke, unto any person or persons to be woxne or occupied on that daye: because it was tuged a foule profanation thereof. And peoples minds given to countenellence, make no exception of times or places in a case of advantage and gaine. In consideration thereof, and for the suppressing of this abuse, this law was ordeined and made: the force whereof did principallie extend to tailors and shomakers (who as on that daye bring home their garments and shoes to the parties for whome they are made) and likewise to all other occupations and trades. But this ordinance (saith mine author) was too good for so bad an age, and therefore died within a short time after the magistrate had given it life.

On Candlemasse eue this yeare by lightning ma-tempest that fell with claps of thunder at afternone, Pauls steeple was set on fier in the midst of the spere or that in the verie timber woxke; which was quenched by the painfulnesse of diuerse persons, and specialie by the diligent labour of a priest of Wote in Cheape. Howbeit the same was thought impossible to be quenched, but that the grace of God was cheefe worker in the same. This steeple hath diuerse times bene ouerthrowne and defaced, partlie by winds, and partlie by lightning, as may be obserued in the reading of this volume: yea when the same hath bene repaired by the choicest workemen, and of the substantiallest stutte, and all meanes that stand with the deepe deuile of man) used to make it so sure that it might continue, as a monument of perpetui-tie for posteritie to wonder at and admire. But to returne to the historie.

Whilste England was vniquieted (as you haue heard) and France by spoile, slaughter, and burning force defaced (a mischefe in all places much lamented) therefore to agree the two puissant kings, all the princes of christendome travelled so effectually by their oratours and ambassadors, that a diet was appointed to be kept at the citie of Tours in Louraigne; where for the king of England appeared William de la Pole earle of Suffolke, doctor Adam Spolins keeper of the kings priuie seale, also sir Robert Ros, and diuers other. And for the French king were appointed Charles duke of Orleans, Lewis de Bourbon earle of Wandosme, great maister of the French kings household, Piers de Baille steward of Poulton, and Bertram Beaulieu lord of Poulton.

There were also sent other ambassadors from the emper, from Spaine, from Denmarke, & from Hungarie to be mediators betwixt the two princes. The assemblie was great, but the cost was much greater, inasmuch that euery part for the honour of themselves, as well in face as apparell, set forth most. Spaine's meetings were had, and manie things moued for a small peace; but in conclusion, by reason of manie doubts which rose on both parties, no full concord could be agreed upon; but in hope to come to a peace, a certaine truce, as well by sea as by land, was concluded by the commissioners for eightene moneths, which afterward againe was prolonged to the yeare of our Lord 1449.

In treating of this truce, the earle of Suffolke adventuring somewhat upon his commission, without the assent of his associates, imagined, that the next waie to come to a perfect peace, was to contriue a marriage betwene the French kings kinselooman, the ladie Margaret daughter to Keiner duke of An-iou, and his soveraigne lord king Henrie. This Kei-ner duke of Anion named himselfe king of Sicill, Naples, and Jerusalem, hauing onlie the name and title of those realmes; without anye penie, profit, or foot of possession. This marriage was made strange to the earle at the first, and one thing seemed to be a great hinderance to it; which was, because the king of England occupied a great part of the duchie of Anion, and the whole countie of Spaine, appertaining (as was alledged) to king Keiner.

The earle of Suffolke (I cannot saie) either corrupted with bribes, or too much affectioned to this unprofitable marriage, condescended, that the duchie of Anion and the countie of Spaine should be delivered to the king the brides father, demanding for his mariage neither penie nor farthing: as who would saie, that this new assentie passed all riches, and excelled both gold and pretious stones. And to the intent that of this truce might issue a small concord, a date of enterdwelt was appointed betwene the two kings in a place convenient betwene Chartres and Rome.
When these things were concluded, the earle of Sub-folke with his companie returned into England, where he forgot not to declare what an honourable truce he had taken, out of the which there was a great hope that a small peace might growe the sooner for that honorable marriage, which he had concluded, omitting nothing that might extoll and set forth the personage of the ladie, or the nobilitie of his kinred.

But although this marriage pleased the king and diuerse of his counsell, yet Humfrie duke of Glou-ster protector of the realme was much against it, alledging that it should be both contrarie to the labors of God, and dishonorable to the prince, if he should breaks that promise and contract of marriage, made by ambassadors sufficientlie thereto instructed, with the daughter of the earle of Arminache, upon conditions both to him and his realme, as much profitable as honorable. But the dukes words could not be heard, for the earles doings were onelie liked and allowed. So that for performance of the conclusions, the French king sent the earle of Wandosme, great maister of his house, and the archbishop of Keines first peer of France, and diuerse other into England, where they were honorable received; and after that the instruments were once sealed and deliue-red on both parts, the said ambassadors returned againe into their countie with great gifts and rewards.

When these things were done, the king both for honour of his realme, and to assure to himselfe his friends, created John Holland earle of Huntington duke of Excester as his father was: Humfrie earle of Stafford was made duke of Buckingham: and Henrie earle of Warwike was cleated to the title of duke of Warwike, to whome the king also gaue the castell of Bristowe, with the Ile of Jerneiseie, and Carneseie. Also the earle of Suffolke was made marquesse of Suffolke, which marquesse with his wife and manie honorable personages of men and women richlie adozned both with apparell & iewels, hauing with them manie coslie chariots and gorgeous hazzlers, sailed into France for the conuenance of the nominated quene into the realme of England. For king Keiner hir father, for all his long stile had to short a purre to send his daughter honorable to the king hir spouse.

This noble companie came to the citie of Tours in Touraine, where they were honorable receiued both of the French king and of the king of Sicill. The marquesse of Suffolke as procurator to king Henrie, espoused the said ladie in the church of saint Spartins. At the which marriage were present the father and mother of the bzide; the French king himselfe, which was uncle to the husband; and the French quene also, which was aunt to the wife. There were also the dukes of Milance, of Calabze, of Alanson, and of Britaine, seauen earls, twelue barons, twentie bishops, beside knights and gentlemen. When the feast, triumph, bankets and iusts were ended, the ladie was deliuered to the marquesse, who in great estate conueied hir through Normandie vnto Diepe, and so transported hir into England, where she landed at Portemouth in the moneth of Aprill. This ladie excelled all other, as well in beautie and fauour, as in wit and policie, and was of stomach and courage more like to a man than a woman.

Shortlie after hir arriuall, she was conueied to the towne of Southwike in Hamshire, where she with all nuptiall ceremonies was coupled in matrimonie to king Henrie the first of that name. ¶ On the eighteenth of Maie she came to London, all the lords of England in most sumptuous sort meeting and receiuing hir vpon the waie, and speciallie the duke of Gloucester with such honour as stood with the dignitie of his person. Now when she came to Blackheath, the maiors, aldermen, and men of occupations, in blew gownes imbodered with some deuise, expressing their art and trades whereby to be knowne, did all shew themselves, with congratulation of hir comming; from whence they attended hir to London, where with goodlie pageants and sundrie gallant historicall shewes in diuers places erected, she was verie magnificallie welcomed. The manner and order of which pompe in sundrie places exhibited to the high honour of the king, quene, & states, is verie ample set forth by Fabian, pag. 423, 424, 425, 426, 427. Upon the thirtieth of Maie next following, she was crowned quene of this realme of England at Westminster, with all the solemnities thereto appertaining.]

Continuation
the sixt.

This marriage seemed to manie both infortunate and vnprofitable to the realme of England, and that for manie causes. First, the king had not one penie left hir; and for the fetching of hir, the marquesse of Suffolke demanded a whole fifteenth in open parliament. And also there was deliuered for hir the duchie of Anion, the citie of Spans, and the whole countie of Spaine, which countries were the verie stales and backstays to the duchie of Normandie. And furthermore, the earle of Arminacke toke such displeasure with the king of England for this marriage, that he became bitter enimie to the crowne of England, and was the cheefe cause that the Englishmen were expelled out of the whole duchie of Aquitaine.

But most of all it should seme, that God was displeased with this marriage: for after the confirmation thereof, the kings friends fell from him, both in England and in France, the lords of his realme fell at diuision, and the commons rebelled in such sort, that finally after manie fields foughten, and manie thousands of men slaine, the king at length was deposed, and his sonne killed, and this quene sent home againe, with as much miserie and sorow as she was receiued with pompe and triumph: such is the instabilitie of worldly felicitie, and so waucering is false flattering fortune. Which mutation and change of the better for the worse could not but nettle and sting hir with pensiuenesse, yea and anie other person whatsoeuer, that hauing bene in good estate, falleth into the contrarie: thereto the saying of the poet giueth credit, in these fewe wordes following;

*Quem res plus nimio delectauere secunde,

This yeare, after the decesse of Henrie Chicheleie archbishop of Canturburie, succeeded John Stafford in that see, being translated from Bath and Wells. He was the threescore and one archbishop, as Polydore noteth. During the time of the truce, Richard duke of Yorke and diuerse other capitains repaired into England, both to visit their wiues, children, and friends, and also to consult what should be done, if the truce ended. For the which cause a parlement was called, in the which it was especiallie concluded, that by good foresight Normandie might be so furnished for defense before the end of the truce, that the French king should take no aduantage through want of timelie prouision: for it was knowne, that if a peace were not concluded, the French king did prepare to imploie his whole puissance to make open warre. Whereupon monie was granted, an armie leuiued, and the duke of Summerfet appointed to be regent of Normandie, and the duke of Yorke thereof discharged.

of Yorke discharged.

I haue seene in a register booke belonging sometime to the abbey of saint Albons, that the duke of Yorke was established regent of France, after the decesse of the duke of Bedford, to continue in that office for the tearme of five yeares; which being expired, he returned home, and was iustlie receiued of the king with thanks for his good seruice, as he had full well deserved in time of that his gouernment: and further, that now when a new regent was to be chosen and sent ouer, to abide vpon safeguard of the countries beyond the seas as yet subiect to the English dominion, the said duke of Yorke was estimes (as a man most meet to supplie that ronne) appointed to go ouer againe, as regent of France with all his former allowances.

The duke of Yorke appointed to charge again.

But the duke of Summerfet still maligning the duke of Yorkes aduancement, as he had sought to hinder his dispatch at the first when he was sent ouer to be regent, as before we haue heard: he likewise now wrought so, that the king reuoked his grant made to the duke of Yorke for enioieng of that office the terme of other five yerres, and with helpe of William marquesse of Suffolke obtained that grant for himselfe. Which malicious beling the duke of Yorke might so euill beare, that in the end the heate of displeasure burst out into such a flame, as consumed at length not onelie both those two noble personages, but also manie thousands of others, though in diuers times and seasons, as in places hereafter (as occasion serueth) it shall more euidentlie appeare. But now to returne to the parlement.

June in the first session of this parlement, in the higher house openlie, eloquentlie, and boldlie declared his paine, trauell, and diligence susteined in his said legation, as well for the taking and concluding an abstinence of warre, as in the making of the marriage; remembryng them also that the said truce expired the first of Aprill next, except a small peace, or a further truce were concluded in the meane season: and therefore he advised them to provide and foresee things necessarie for the warre (as though no concord should succeed) least happlie the Frenchmen perceiving them unprompted, would take their advantage, and agree neither to peace nor amitie; saying unto them further, that sith he had admonished the king and them according to his dutie, if any thing happened otherwise than well, he was thereof innocent and guiltlesse, and had acquitted himselfe like a true and loving subject, and a faithfull counsellour, praieng the lords to have it in remembrance.

Likewise on the morow after, he descended into the common house, accompanied with certeine lords, and there declared the same matter to the knights, citizens, and burgeses, praieng the commons for his discharge, that as well all his doings and proceedings in the kings affaires beyond the sea, as also his advertisement and counsell opened to the lords and commons now together assembled, might be by the king and them inacted and inrolled in the records of the parlement. Whereupon the next daie after, the speaker William Burghleie, and the companie of the lower house, repaired unto the kings presence, sitting amongst the lords of the upper house, & there humbly required that the request of the marquess might be granted. And so likewise the lords made the like petition kneeling on their knees, in somuch that the king condescended to their desires: and so the labours, demeanours, diligences, and declarations of the said marquess, together with the desires not onlie of the lords, but also of the commons, as well for the honour of him and his posteritie, as for his acquittal and discharge, were inacted and inrolled in the records of the parlement.

The marquess of Suffolk, cheifest in favour and authority with the king and quene.

By the quenes meanes shortly after also was the said marquess advanced so in authority, that he ruled the king at his pleasure, and to his high preferment obtained the wardships both of the bodie and lands of the countesse of Warwike, and of the ladie Margarete sole heire to John duke of Summerset, which ladie was afterward mother to king Henrie the seventh: and besides that, caused the king to create John de Foix, sonne unto Gaston de Foix, earle of Longue, and the Capdaun de Beuse earle of Kendall, which John had married his niece, and by his procurement the king elected to the order of the garter the said Gaston, and John his sonne, giving to the sonne towards the maintenance of his degree, lands and castles, amounting to the summe of one thousand pounds, which lands, name, and stile the issue and line of the said earle of Kendall at this daie have and enjoy.

These things being thus in doing, the French king, seeing that the towne of Mans was not delievered according to the appointment taken by force of the marriage, raised an armie for to recover the same. Whereof the king of England being advertised (least the breach of the truce should come by him) caused the towne to be delievered without any force.

A commotion in Norwich.

This yeare was a great commotion in Norwich against the prior of the place. At length the citizens opened the gates to the duke of Suffolke, who came thither to appeale the matter, though at the first they would not suffer him to enter. The cheefe offenders were (according to their demerits) greivously punished and executed, and the malor was discharged of his office, and sir John Clifton was made governor there, untill the king had restored the citizens to their ancient liberties. This commotion was begun for certeine new exactions which the prior claimed and took of the citizens, contrarie to their ancient freedom. But herein a wrong taken for getting of right was worthilie corrected.

In the foure and twentieth yeare of this kings reigne, the prior of Allmaine appeached the earle of Diamond of treason. For triall whereof the place of combat was assigned in Smithfield, & the barriers for the same there readie pitcht. Howbeit, in the meane time a doctor of divinitie, named master Gilbert Worthington, parson of saint Andrews in Holborne, and other honest men, made such sute with diligent labour and paines-taking to the kings counsell, that when the daie of combat approached, the quarrell was taken into the kings hands, and there ended. In the same yeare also, a certeine armourer was appeached of treason by a servant of his owne. For proofe thereof a daie was given them to fight in Smithfield, in somuch that in conflict the said armourer was overcome and slaine; but yet by misgoverning of himselfe. For on the morow, when he should come to the field fresh and fasting, his neighbours came to him, and gaue him wine and strong drinke in such excessive sort, that he was therewith disempered, and reeled as he went, and so was slaine without guilt. As for the false servant, he lived not long unpunished, for being convicted of felonie in court of assise, he was iudged to be hanged, and so was at Tiburne.

Whilste the warres betwene the two nations of England & France ceased (by occasion of the truce) the minds of men were not so quiet, but that such as were bent to malicious reuenge, sought to compass their preperend purpose, not against foren foes and enemies of their countrie, but against their owne countrie men, and those that had deserved verie well of the common-wealth; and this speciallie for overmuch mildnesse in the king, who by his authority might have ruled both parts, and ordered all differences betwixt them, but that in deed he was thought to loost for gouernor of a kingdome. The quene contrariwise, a ladie of great wit, and no lesse courage, desirous of honour, and furnished with the gifts of reason, policie, and wisdom; but yet sometime according to hir kind when she had bene fullie bent on a matter, suddenlie like a weather cocke, mutable and turning.

This ladie disdaining that hir husband should be ruled rather than rule, could not abide that the duke of Gloucester should do all things concerning the order of weightie affaires, least it might be said, that she had neither wit nor stomach, which would permit and suffer hir husband being of most perfect age, like a yong pupill to be gouerned by the direction of an other man. Although this toy entered first into hir braine thorough hir owne imagination, yet was she pricked forward to the matter both by such of hir husbands counsell, as of long time had borne malice to the duke for his plainnesse used in declaring their vntruth (as parties ye haue heard) and also by counsell from king Keiner hir father, aduising that she and the king should take upon them the rule of the realme, and not to be kept vnder, as wards and mastered orphans.

What needeth manie words: The quene persuaded by these meanes, first of all excluded the duke of Gloucester from all rule and gouernance, not prohibiting such as she knew to be his mostall foes to invent and imagine causes and grieues against him and his, in somuch that by hir procurement, diuerse noble men conspired against him. ters affirme the marquess of Suffolke, and the duke of Buckingham to be the cheefe, not vnprocured by the cardinall of Winchester, and the archbishop of Yorke. Diuerse articles were laid against him in open counsell, and in especiall one; that he had caused men abridged to die, to be put to other execution, than the law of the land assigned. Where the duke herie well learned in the law ciuill, detesting malefactors, and punishing offences in severity of iustice, gat him hatred of such as feared condigne reward for their wicked doings. And although the duke sufficiently answered to all things against him objected: yet because his death was determined, his wisdom and innocencie nothing auailed.

But to auoid danger of tumult that might be raised, if a prince so well beloued of the people should be openly executed; his enemies determined to worke their feats in his destruction, yet he should haue anie warning. For effecting thereof, a parlement was summoned to be kept at Berrie, whither resorted all the peers of the realme, and amongst them the duke of Gloucester; which on the second daie of the session was by the lord Beaumont, then high constable of England, accompanied with the duke of Buckingham, and others, arrested, apprehended, and put in ward, and all his seruants sequestred from him, and thirtie two of the cheefe of his retinue were sent to diuerse prisons, to the great admiration of the people. The duke the night after he was thus committed to prison, being the foure and twentieth of february, was found dead in his bed, and his bodie shewed to the lords and commons, as though he had died of a palsey, or of an impossme.

But all indifferent persons (as saith Hall) might well vnderstand that he died of some violent death. Some iudged him to be strangled, some affirme that an hot spit was put in at his fundament, other write that he was smothered betwene two featherbeds, and some haue affirmed that he died of verie griefe, for that he might not come openlie to his answer. His dead corpe was conueyed to saint Albons, and there buried. After his death, none of his seruants suffered: although sue of them, to wit, sir Roger Chamberline knight, Middleton, Herbert, Arlesse equiers, and Richard Bedham gentleman, were arrested, condemned, and drawn to a booke, where they were hanged, let downe quicke, and striped to haue bene bowelled and quartered; but the marques of Suffolke comming at that instant brought their pardons, shewed the same openlie, and so their liues were saued.

Some thinke that the name and title of Gloucester hath bene vnluckie to diuerse, which for their honours haue bene erected by creation of princes to that title and dignitie, as Hugh Spenser, Thomas of Woodstocke, sonne to king Edward the third, and this duke Humfrey: which three persons by miserable death finished their daies; and after them king Richard the third also duke of Gloucester in ciuill warre laime. So that this name duke of Gloucester is taken for an vnhappy stile, as the proverbe speaketh of Spenser's horse, whose rider was euer vnholled, & whose possessor was euer brought to miserie. But sterlie, by the pitifull death of this noble duke and politike gouernour, the publick wealth of the realme came to great decay, as by sequels here may more at large appeare.

At times it hapneth that a man in quenching of smoke, burneth his fingers in the fire: so the queene in casting how to keepe hit husband in honour, and hir selfe in authoritie, in making auaice of this noble man, brought that to passe, which she had most cause to haue feared, which was the deposing of hir husband, & the decay of the house of Lancaster, which of likelihood had not chanced if this duke had liued: for then durst not the duke of Yorke haue attempted to set forth his title to the crowne, as he afterwards did, to the great trouble of the realme, and destruction of king Henrie, and of manie other noble men beside. This is the opinion of men, but Gods iudgements are vnsearchable, against whose decree and ordinance preuaileth no humane counsell.

But to conclude of this noble duke: he was an bright and politike gouernour, bending all his indures to the advancement of the common wealth, verie loving to the poore commons, and so beloued of them againe; learned, wise, full of courtesie, void of pride and ambition (a vertue rare in personages of such high estate) but where it is most commendable. But sith the praise of this noble man deserueth a large discourse, and meet for such as haue cunning how to handle the same (sith the ornaments of his mind were both rare & admirable, the feats of chivalrie by him commended and atchieued, balliant and fortunate, his grauitie in counsell, and soundnesse of policie profound and singular, all which with a traine of other excellent properties linked together, requires a man of manifold gifts to aduance them according to their dignitie) I refer the readers vnto maister Foxes booke of Acts and Monuments. Onelie this I ad, that in respect of his noble indowments, and his demeanour full of decencie, which he daile bled, it seemeth he might well haue giuen this prettie poesie,

In this sixt and twentieth yeare of the reigne of this king, but in the first of the rule of the queene, I find nothing done worthy of reherfall within the realme of England; but that the marquess of Suffolke, by great fauour of the king, & more desire of the queene, was erected to the title and dignitie of duke of Suffolke, which he a short time intoted. For Richard duke of Yorke being greatly allied by his wife to the cheefe peeres and potentates of the realme, beside his owne progenie, perceiuing the king to be no ruler, but the whole burthen of the realme to rest in direction of the queene, & the duke of Suffolke, began secretlie to allure his friends of the nobilitie; and priuilie declared vnto them his title and right to the crowne, and likewise did he to certaine wise gouernours of diuerse citiees and townees. Which attempt was so politikelie handled, and so secretlie kept, that prouision to his purpose was ready, before his purpose was openlie published; and his friends opened themselves, yet the contrarie part could them espye: for in conclusion all hostlie in mischief burst out as ye may hereafter heare.

During these doings, Henrie Beauford bishop of Winchester, and called the rich cardinall, departed out of this world, & buried at Westmister. He was son to John Duke of Lancaster, descended of an honorable linage, but borne in hast, more noble in blood than notable in learning, haucie in stomach, and high of countenance, rich aboue measure, but not verie liberall, disdainfull to his kin, and deadfull to his louers, preferring monie before friendship, manie things beginning and few performing, saning in malice and mischief; his insatiable countenance and hope of long life made him both to forget God, his prince, and himselfe. Of the getting of his goda both by power legantine, and spiritual byberie, I will not speake; but the keeping of them, which he chiefelie gathered for ambitious purpose, was both great losse to his naturall prince and native countrie: for his hidden riches might haue well holpen the king, and his secret treasure might haue relieved the communitie, when monie was scant and charges great.

It was a fashion at those daies, long agoe, & since, from a learned spirituall man to take awaie the fathers surname (were it neuer so woorthipfull or ancient) and giue him for it the name of the towne he was borne in: and so was Richard Pottingham a learned frater minore in king Edward the seconds daies called of Pottingham where he was borne; John Clinie a learned monke in those daies also, named of an Iland where he was borne nie Gloucester; of Barton in Lincolnshire one William Barton in Richard the seconds reigne; for that time a famous doctor; and chancello; of Oxford; Walter Disse, of Disse in Suffolke a learned Carmelite frater, confessor to the duke and duchesse of Lancaster in king Henrie the fourths reigne; Richard Hampole of a towne in Yorkshire, a selous doctor; and after a ver-tuous heremit in king Henrie the firsts daies.

And after this sort manie hundreds more that had their names so altered; as euen in like maner vnto this reuerend prelat in the prime of his towardnesse was changed his fathers surname Paten to Wainfleet of the towne where hee was bozne in Lin-colneshire: a matter right pꝛoueable aswell by the records of the house there extant, as by a faire deed maintaining among other his proper evidences, in the hands of the worshipfull maister Thomas Fanshawe esquter, the quenes maiesties remembrance in the eschequer at Westminster. And as the names of Germin, German, Germt, are but for; one name though diuerselie twised, and all to remember Ger-manie, the countrie their ancestoꝛs came from; and also as Iute, Iud, and Chute, are all but for the race of Iutes, one of the thre first German nations that came in with Hozlus and Hengist; and Caltrap, Caltrap and Calthroꝝ was all but for Calthroꝝ that signifieth a cold towne; how euer it be otherwise twi-sed: euen so Paten, Patin, Patten, or Patent, is but a mention of the old Saron name, that trulie at first was Patan; of Pate, the sole of the foot, and thereof Patan to signifie flat footed, as among the Latines they were called Plantus or Plancus: so Cicero of a diche or tare; pafones, Labones and Labieni, well nosed and light; & manie moze after that sort in manie towns else fo deriued.

That right manie students skilfull in the profoundest sciences and learned tonges, manie venerable clerks, who in most weightie causes with singular wisdome, successe and faith, haue setued their prince and countrie this college hath brought forth: hereto that manie toward wits it still to haue, hath had the good hap (which happilie yet to it dooth reteine) may here withi moderate a litle be touched, neither to comparison that were contentious folle, no yet to seke glorie that cannot be but vaine, but onlie in stozie to mind, how vnto purposes vertuouslie deuised and iustelie pursued, Gods goodnesse alwaies giueth day uiuing and thurst accordinge.]

In this tenth and twentieth yeare of king Henries reigne, as witnesse the English chronicles, a knight of France called Sir Lewes de Bueil challenged an elquier of England, named Rafe Challons, to triall of certeine feats of warre. Hereupon (as was thought conuenient) a date was appointed them to make paise thereof; the place also was assigned to their meeting, to wit, at a towne in France called Gaunt or Gaunce, where the French king at the same time was personallie present. But fortune (saith mine author) was to Challons for fauourable, and leaniest to much to his side, that he ran the French knight thorough with the point of his fatall sweare:

Hunc illi finem lingua superba dedit.

The English helmer, seeing the unfortunate event of this trial, to fall to the shame of the challenger, was so far from reioicing at his overthrow, that he was touched with chriſtian compaſſion, & moored for his enemie, for whom alſo he kept an obſequie as if he had bene his owne naturall brother, and deſcended of the ſame parents. For which mercuriall motions of mind inwardlie working, and outwardlie appearing, he was of the king greatly commended. But doubtfull it is, whether the other, if he had lived, and got the upper hand, would haue had the like reuerend care of the Engliſhmans dead bodie, as to haue bought ſafed it a ſolemne interment.]

As the affaires in France now were neither well looked to, nor the governours there well abused, an English capitaine called sir Francis Surienne, named the Aragoniois, of the countie where he was borne, a man for his wit and activitie admitted into the order of the garter, took by scaling suddenlie in the night of the even of our ladie daie in Lent, a towne on the frontiers of Normandie, belonging to the duke of Brittain called Fougiers, spoiling the same, and killing the inhabitants. tainie, being hereof aduertised, sent word by the bishop of Beines to the French king, beseeching him of his aid and counsell in the matter.

The French king forthwith sent his caruer John Hauart, and John Cointet one of the maisters of his requests to the king of England: and to the duke of Sommerfet he dispatched Peter de Fontaines the maister of his house. To which messengers answer was made aswell by the king as the duke, that the fact was done without their knowledge. And for the truce to be kept, and not onelie restitution, but also amends to be made to the duke of Britaine, a daie of diet was appointed to be kept at Louiers, where the commissioners on both parts being assembled, the frenchmen demanded amends, with no small recompense. The Englishmen answered, that without offence, nothing by iustice ought to be satisfied; affirming the doing of sir Francis Sureinnes to be one-lie his act, without consent either of the king of England, or of the duke of Sommerfet his lieutenant and regent.

Philip Larch

sight.

But whiles with long delate they talked of this matter at Louiers, certeine Frenchmen by aduertisement of a waggoner of Louiers, vnderstanding that the towne of Pont de Larch was but slenderlie manned; the waggoner laded his wagon and passed for ward, hauing in his companie two strong barlets clad like carpentars, with great ares on their shoulders. And hereto ie seigneur de Bessie with a chosen companie of men of armes, lodged himselfe in ambushment nere to the gate of S. Andreu, and captaine Floquet, accompanied with sir James de Cleremont, and another great companie priuilie lurked vnder a wood toward Louiers. When all things were appointed for the purpose, earlie in a morning about the beginning of October, the waggoner came to the gate, and called the porter by name, praiesing him to open the gate, that he might passe to Rone, and returne againe the same night.

The porter (which well knew the voice of his customer) toke little heed to the other two companions, and so opened the one gate, and sent another fellow of his to open the foremost gate. When the chariot was on the draw-bridge betwene both the gates, the chariot-maister gaue the porter monie, and for the nonce let one peece fall on the ground: and while the porter stooped to take it vp, the waggoner with his dagger stroke him in at his throat, so that he cried for no helpe, and the two great lubbers slue the other porters, and with their ares cut the aretre of the wagon, so that the draw-bridge could not be shortly drawn vp. This done they made a signe to capitaine Floquet, which with all speed entered the towne, slue and toke all the Englishmen: and amongst other, the lord Fauconbridge capitaine of the said towne was taken prisoner. The losse of this place was of no small importance, being the verie heie and passage ouer the riuer of Seine, from France into Normandie, being distant from Rone onelie foure leagues.

When request was made to haue it restored againe to the Englishmen, answer was made, that if they restord, to the duke of Britaine, the towne of Fougieres with condigne amends for the damages done there, the towne of Pont de Larch should then be againe deliuered, or else not. And shortly after, in hope of like successe the French king assembled an armie, and diuiding the same in three parts, got by surrender (after sundrie assaults, and losse of diuerse of his men) the townes of Louiers, & Gerbois, whereof William Harper was capitaine. Also the towne, castell, and great tower of Verneuill in Perche were rendered into the French kings hands, after twentie daies of respite granted, to let if rescues would haue come. The French writers affirme the towne to be taken by assault.

Thus was the warre renewed before the terme of truce fullie expired, & the English captains brought to their wiits end, what with appeasing daile romors within the townes; and what with studie how to re-couer castels lost and taken: for while they studied how to keepe and defend one place, foure or fise other turned to the French part. The chiefe cause of which renolting was, for that it was blowen abroad thorough France, how the realme of England, after the death of the duke of Glocester by the seuerall factions of princes was diuided in two parts; and that William de la Pole latelie created duke of Sub-folke, and diuerse other, which were the occasion of the said duke of Glocesters death, vered and oppressed the poore people, so that mens minds were not intente to outward affaires: but all their studie giuen to keepe off wrongs offered at home.

The king little regarding the matter, & the queene led by enill counsell, rather furthered such mischiefes as daile began to grow by ciuill discords, than sought to reforme them: so that the Normans and Gascoignes vnderstanding in what state things stood here, turned to the French part, as hereafter it may appeare. About the same time also, began a new rebellion in Ireland; but Richard duke of Yorke being sent thither to appease the same, so alluaged the furte of the wild and sauage people there, that he wan him such fauour amongst them, as could neuer be separated from him and his linage, which in the sequele of this historie may more plainelie appeare.

The Frenchmen, hauing perfect vnderstanding of the vncreadinelle of the realme of England, displayed their banners, and set forth their armies, and in short space got (by yeelding) Constance, Cisors, castell Galliard, Pontean de Here, saint Lo, Je-stampe, Petucastell, Tonque, Pauleon, Argenton, Lisseur, and diuerse other townes and places within the countrie of Normandie. Likewise in Guien was the towne of Paulillon rendered to the earle of Fois. These townes were not yeilded voluntari-lie by the English souldiers: but they were compe-led thereto by the inhabitants of the townes, which hauing intelligence of the feeble estate of the realme of England, rose against the captains, opened the gates to the enemies, or constrained them to render upon composition. By which inforcement was the rich citie of Rone deliuered: for suerlie the duke of Sommerfet and the earle of Shrewsburie had well kept that citie, if they had bene no more vered with the citizens, than they were with their enemies.

For after that the French king had giuen summons to the citie, the inhabitants streightwaies did not onelie denie which waie they might betraie the citie, but also put on armor, and rebelled openlie against their captains: who perceiuing the vnt ruth of them, and their owne danger, retired into the castell or palace, where (for a certeine space) with arrowes & handguns they fore molested the vnt true citizens.
But at length, vnderstanding the great puissance of the French king at hand, and despairing of all aid and succour, they yeilded upon condition; that with all their goods and armour they should safelie depart to Caen, and that certeine townes should be deliue-red by a day. And till the same townes were rendred, the earle of Shrewsburie and the lord Butler, sonne to the earle of Ormond, were left behind as pledges, which were sent to the castell of Cursur, because they fore feared the malice of the citizens of Rone.

The Frenchmen, following the successe in hand, came to Harfue, and fiercelie assaulted the walles: but by the high prowesse and vndanted valiance of the capitaine, sir Thomas Curson, they were to their great losse manfullie by him repelled, and beaten. The frenchmen learning wit by this great perill, lest their scaling, and deuised daile how to batter the walles, & make the breaches reasonable for them to enter. This siege long continued to the great losse of both parties. When sir Thomas Curslon saw no likelihood of gaine, but great apperance of present losse, he fell at composition with the enemies, and so departed with all his goods. After which towne rendered, the fortreffe of Hundine was vpon like composition yielded. And beside these townes surrendered in Normandie, the duke of Britaine recovered a gaine fougiers, saint James de Beuron, and diuerse other.

In the meane season the king of England sent into Normandie (with a new supplie of a thousand five hundred men) a right valiant capitaine called sir Thomas Kiriell, who joining himselfe with other English captains recovered the townes of Lisieux and Falongnes, and hauing with him power sufficient (as he took it) to keepe the fields, he departed the twelue of Aprill from Falongnes, meaning to passe towards Baieur, and after to Caen. But the eighteenth daile of the same moneth, he was incountered at a place called Fozmignie betwixt Caranten and Baieur, by the earle of Cleremont, & other frenchmen with Scots. At the first onset, the Englishmen receiued their enemies with such manhood, that the frenchmen were driuen backe, and the Englishmen took from them two culuerings.

But yet in the end, by the comming of the constable of France, Arthur de Britaine earle of Richmond, who brought with him two hundred or twelue score men of armes, and an eight hundred archers or demilances, the Englishmen were discomfited, put to flight, and slaine, to the number of three thousand, seauen hundred, three score and thirtene, as Enguerrant noteth, beside prisoners, of whome there were diuerse personages of accompt, as the said sir Thomas Kiriell himselfe, sir Henrie Bozberie, sir Thomas Deyn, sir Thomas Kirklie, Christopher Auberton, Arpell, Helice, Alengour, Jennerquin, Macquiter, Gohart, Calcuille, and sundrie other. Sir Robert Wier, and sir Gough that valiant Welshman, and manie other escaped so well as they might, some to Baieur, some to Caen, and other to other places as best they could.

After this overthrow obtained, the french king assembled an armie roiall, and comming before Caen, besieged it on all sides: and after making his approaches, fiercelie assailed the walles. But the duke of Summerfet, and the other captains within the towne, manfullie withstood their enemies, shewing both force and great policie in defending and beating backe the assailants. The french king, perceiuing he could not preuaile that waie, sent for all his great ordinance to Paris, which being brought, he daile shot at the wals, and did some hurt: but to the castell which stood on a rocke, and in it a dungeon vnable to be beaten downe, he did no harme at all.

Though the duke of Summerfet was the kings lieutenant, yet sir David Hall, as capitaine of this towne for his maister the duke of Poike owner thereof, took vpon him the chiefe charge. Sir Robert Wier was capitaine of the castell, and sir Henrie Radford capitaine of the dungeon. Daile the shot was great, but more terrible than hurtfull: sauing on a daie a stone shot into the towne, fell betwene the chiefe of Summerfet, and his children, which being amazed with this chance, besought his husband kneeling on his knees, to haue mercie and compassion of his small infants, and that they might be deliuered out of the towne in safegard. Which intretie made with teares and submission, that eare could but listen to, that heart but yerne at; vntlesse both eare and heart were made of flint or marble, or betwen out of a hard rocke, and so void of all passions, of all remors, of all affections belonging to humanitie.

The duke pitifull, moued with the sorow of his wife, and loue of his children, rendered the towne against the mind of sir David Hall, whose counsell and faithfull diligence (in acquitting himselfe to answer the trust committed to him by his maister) if others had followed; the french had sustained more trauell and losse, yet they should haue so easilie attained their purpose. The conditions of the surrender were, that the duke of Summerfet and his might depart in safegard with all their goods and substance. Sir David Hall with diuerse of his trustie friends departed to Chierburgh, and from thence sailed into Ireland to the duke of Poike, making relation to him of all these doings, which thing kindled so great a rancoz in the dukes heart and stomach, that he neuer left persecuting the duke of Summerfet, until he had brought him to his fatall end & confusion. Such is the nature of rancoz and malice, of wrath and anger, which furthereth the hands euen of weaklings, on them to weake their teene, with whom they are offended & pricked to reuengment, as the poet saith:

Quaslibet infirmas adiuuat ira manus.

After the obtaining of Caen, the earle of Cleremont besieged the citie of Lisieux, whereof was capitaine Gough with three hundred Englishmen, who in the end deliuered that towne, vpon condition, that he and his people might depart to Chierburgh. Then was Falais besieged, whereof were captains for the earle of Shrewsburie (that was the owner) Andrew Trollop, and Thomas Cotton esquires, who being in despair of all succors, agreed to deliuer it vpon two conditions. The one was, that the earle their maister, which remained in pledge for the performance of certeine appointments, concluded at the deliuerie of Rone (as ye haue hard) should be set at libertie. The other, that if they were not rescued within twelue daies, that then they and theirs should depart with armes, and all their goods moneable, whither it pleased them.

At the daie appointed, the towne was rendered, and so likewise was the towne of Dampfront vpon the semblable agreement. Now rested onlie English the towne of Chierburgh, whereof was capitaine one Thomas Conuille, which merlie as long as vitels and munition serued, defended the towne right manfullie: but without hope of repaire, consumed, and he els destitute of all comfort and aid, vpon a reasonable composition, yielded the towne, and went to Calis, where the duke of Summerfet and manie other Englishmen then sojourned. Thus was Normandie lost clarelie out of the Englishmens hands, which after it had continued in their possession the space of thirtie yeares by the conquest of Henrie the sixt.

In this duchie were an hundred strong townes and fortresses, able to be kept and holden, beside them which were destroyed by the warres; and in the same is one archbishoppe, and six bishopps. Some saie that the Englishmen were not of puissance either to man the townes, as they should haue bene; or to inhabit the countrie, which was the cause they could not keepe it. Other saie, that the duke of Summerfet for his owne peculiar lucre, kept not halfe the number of soldiers for which he was appointed and allowed, but put the wages in his purse. But the chiefe and onlie cause vndoubtedlie, was the diuision within the realme, euerie great man desiring rather to be reuenged on his foe at home, than on the common enemy abroad, as by that which followeth you may plainelie perceiue.

[For whilest the french thus triumphed in Normandie, mandie, three cruell enemies among manie (as by ci-uill warre and sedition insuing appeared) for byged the bitter ruine of this reame at home. One was presumption in gouernance, by some that were most in-met to rule, as the queene with hir priuie counsel-lois and minions; then the deable malice and pride, with insatiable couetise in the states both spirituall and tempozall: and lastlie the generall grudge of the people, for the vniuersall smart that through misgo-uernment euerie where they suffered; who thus forueried with the pisse of burthens too heauie for them anie longer to beare.]

Here with perceiving how (through want of proudent wisdom in the gouernour) all things went to wacke, as well within the realme as without; they began to make exclamation against the duke of Suffolke, charging him to be the onelie cause of the deliuerie of Anjou, and Paine, the chiefe procuroz of the duke of Gloucesters death, the verie occasion of the losse of Normandie, the swallower vp of the kings treasure, the remouer of god and vertuous councillours from about the prince, and the aduancer of vicious persons, and of such as by their doings shewed themselves apparant aduersaries to the common-wealth.

The queene hereat doubting not onelie the dukes destruction, but also hir owne confusion, caused the parlement before begun at the Blackfriars, to be adiourned to Leicester, thinking there, by force and ri-go: of law, to suppress and subdue all the malice and euill will conceiued against the duke & hir. At which place few of the nobilitie would appeare: wherefore it was againe adiourned to Westminster, where was a full appearance. In the which session the commons of the nether house put vp to the king and the lords manie articles of treason, misprision, and euill demerito: against the duke of Suffolke: the effect whereof with his answers here insue.

Articles proponed by the commons against the duke of Suffolke.

First they alleged that he had traittozouslie excited, prouoked, and counsellid John earle of Dunois bastard of France, Bertram lord Presigne, William Cusinet, en-mies to the king, and frends and ambassadors to Charles, calling himselfe French king, to enter into this realme; and to leaue warre against the king and his people, to the intent to de-stroye the king and his frends, and to make John his sonne king of this realme, marieng him to Ma-garet, sole heire to John duke of Summerfet, pretending and declaring hir to be next heire inherita-ble to the crowne, for lacke of issue, of the kings bodie lawfullie begotten.

Item, the said duke, being of the kings priuie and nere counsell, allured by great rewards and false promises, made by the said earle of Dunois, caused the king to deliuer and set at libertie, Charles duke of Orleans, enemye to the king, and the kings noble father: which deliuerance was prohibited by expresse words, in the last will of the kings most victorious father.

Item, that before the departing of the said duke of Orleans, the aforesaid duke of Suffolke traittozouslie fast cleauing to Charles called the French king, counsellid, prouoked, and intised the said duke of Orleans, to moue the same king to make warre against England, both in France and Normandie.
According to which procurement & counsell, the said French king hath recovered the whole realme of France, and all the duchie of Normandie, and taken prisoners the earle of Arkelburie, the lord Fauconbridge, and manie other valiant captiues. These three articles aforesaid he denied, either for fact or thought.]

Further it was alleged, that he being ambassador for the king of England, to Charles calling himselfe the French king, promised to Kether king of Sicill, and to Charles d'Angiers his brother, enemies to the king, the release of Anjou, with the deliuerance of the countie of Paine, and the citie of Gaunt or Spans, without the knowledge of the other ambassadors with him accompanied. Which promise, after his returne, he caused to be performed, to the kings disinheritaunce and losse irrecoverable, and to the strength of his enemies, and sablissement of the duchie of Normandie. To this article he answered, that his commission was to conclude, and do all things according to his discretion, for the obtaining of a peace: & because without deliuerie of those countries, he perceiued that the truce could not be obtained, he agreed to the release and deliuerance of them.]

Also they had great cause to iudge by the sequels, that the said duke being in France in the kings seruice, and one of the priuie of his counsell there, traitozouslie declared and opened to the cap-teins and conductors of warre, appertaining to the kings enemies, the kings counsell, puruance of his armies, furniture of his towne, & all other ordinances, whereby the kings enemies (instructed aforehand by his traitozous information) haue gotten townes and fortresses, and the king by that meanes deprived of his inheritance.

Item, the said duke declared to the earle of Dunois, to the lord Presigne, and William Cos-net ambassadors for the French king lieng in London, the priuies of the kings counsell, both for the prouision of further warre, and also for the defense of the duchie of Normandie: by the disclosing whereof, the Frenchmen knowing the king secrets, defeated the kings appointments, and they obtained their purpose.

Item, that the said duke, at such time as the king sent ambassadors to the French king, for the intreating of peace, traitozouslie before their com-ming to the French court, certified king Charles of their commission, authoritie, and instructions: by reason thereof, neither peace nor amitie succeded, and the kings inheritance lost, and by his enemies possessed.

Item, the same duke said openlie in the Star-chamber before the lords of the counsell, that he had as high a place in the counsell-house of the French king, as he had there: and was as well trusted there as here, and could reioyne from the French king the priuies of his counsell, if he would.

Item, when armies haue bene prepared, and souldiers readie to passe ouer the sea, to deale with the kings enemies: the said duke, corrupted by rewards of the French king, hath refferred & staied the said armies to passe anie further.

Item, the said duke being ambassador for the king, compisled not in the league (as the kings alies) neither the king of Aragon, neither the duke of Britaine: but suffered them to be compisled on the contrarie part. By reason thereof, the old amitie of the king of Aragon is estranged from this realme, and the duke of Britaine became enemye to the same: Ciles his brother, the kings sure friend, cast in strong prison, and there like to end his daies.]

All these objections he bitterlie denied; or faintlie auoided: but none fullie excused. Diuerse other crimes

crimes were laid to his charge, as enriching himselfe with the kings goods and lands, gathering together and making a monopolie of offices, fees, wards, and farmes, by reason whereof, the kings estate was greatlie diminished and decayed, and he and his kin highlie exalted & enriched: with manie other points, which because they be not notable nor of great force or strength, I omit and ouerpasse.

The quene, which intierlie loued the duke, doubting some commotion and trouble to arise, if he were let go unpunished, caused him for a colour to be committed to the Tower: where he remained not past a moneth, but was againe deliuered and restored to the kings fauour, as much as euer he was before. This doing so much displeased the people, that if politike prouision had not bene, great mischefe had immediatlie ensued. For the commons in sundrie places of the realme assembled together in great companies, and chose to them a capteine, whome they called Blewebeard: but yet they had attempted anie enterprise, their leaders were apprehended; & so the matter pacified without anie hurt committed.

After this outrage thus alluaged, the parlement was adiourned to Leicester, whither came the king and quene in great estate, and with them the duke of Suffolke as chiefe counsellour. The commons of the lower house, not forgetting their old grudge, besought the king, that such persons as assented to the release of Anson, and deliuerance of Haine, might be duly punished. And to be proue to that fact, they accused as principall, the duke of Suffolke, with John bishop of Saltsburie, and sir James fines, lord Saie, and diuerse others. When the king perceived that there was no remedie to appease the peoples furie by anie colourable waies, shortlie to pacifie so long an hatred, he first sequestred the lord Saie being treasurer of England, and other the dukes adherents from their offices and homes, and after banished the duke of Suffolke, as the abhorred robe and common noiance of the whole realme, for tearme of sixe yeares, meaning by this exile to appease the malice of the people for the time, and after (when the matter should be forgotten) to reuoke him home againe.

But Gods iustice would not that so ingracious a person should so escape: for when he shipped in Suffolke, intending to transport himselfe over into France, he was encountered with a ship of warre, appertaining to the duke of Cresser, constable of the Tower, of London, called the Nicholas of the Tower. The capteine of that barke with small fight entered into the dukes ship, and perceiving his person present, brought him to Dover road, and there on the one side of a cocke hote caused his head to be stricken off, and left his bodie with the head lying there on the sands. Wherby corps being there found by a chapleine of his, was conuied to Wingham colledge in Suffolke, and there buried. This end had William de la Pole duke of Suffolke, as men iudge by Gods prouidence; for that he had procured the death of that good duke of Gloucester, as before is partly touched.

rebellion in Kent.

Some after an other disquiet befell here. Those that favoured the duke of Suffolke, and wished the crowne upon his head, for that (as they iudged) he had more right thereto than he that waied it, procured a commotion in Kent on this manner. A certeine yong man of a goodlie stature and right pregnant of wit, was intitled to take upon him the name of John Mortimer captain to the duke of York (although his name was John Cade, or (of some) John Spend-all) [an Irishman as Polychronicon saith] and not for a small policie, thinking by that surname, that those which favoured the house of the earle of March would be assistant to him. And so in deed it came to passe (as in such cases there is no breeder of a boile but he shall find adherents enow), no lesse forward to further his pernicious enterprise by their foolishhardnes, than himselfe was in the plot of his deuise (though in fine (as it is the unluckie lot of such tumults) their attempts were withstood, and their offense duly rewarded, as in proceesse of the storie shall more at large appeare; according to the wisemens sentence;

Sape in magistrum scelera redeunt sua.

This capteine assembling a great companie of tall personages, assured them, that the enterprise which he toke in hand, was both honourable to God and the king, and profitable to the whole realme. For if either by force or policie they might get the king and quene into their hands, he would cause them to be honourable vied, and take such order for the punishing and reforming of the misdeemeanours of their bad counsellours, that neither sickness should hereafter be demanded, nor once anie impositions or taxes be spoken of. The Kentish people moued at these persuasions & other faire promises of reformation, in good order of battell (though not in great number) came with their capteine vnto the plaine of Blackheath, betwene Eltham and Grænelwich, and there kept the field more than a month, pilling the cuntry about; to whome the citie of London at that time was verie fauourable. And the said capteine (as I find recorded saith Iohn Stow) sent for such citizens of London as it pleased him to command to repaire vnto him, vnder letters of safe conduct, as followeth.

The safegard and signe manuell of the capteine of Kent, sent to Thomas Cocke draper of London, by the capteine of the great assemble in Kent.

By this our writing insealed, we grant & will permit trulie, that Thomas Cocke of London draper, shall come in good suertie and in safegard to our presence, without anie hurt of his person, and so auoid from vs againe at his pleasure, with all other persons assigned at his denomination with him comming in likewise.

The commandement by the capteine of Kent, sent vnto Thomas Cocke aboue said.

Ever your instruction, first ye shall charge all Lumbards and strangers, being merchants, Genowais, Venetians, Florentines, and others, this daie to draw them together, and to ordaine for vs the capteine, twelue hatnesses complet of the best fashion, foure & twentie brigandins, twelue battell axes, twelue glaues, six hoes with sable and bridle completlie harnessed, and a thousand markes of readie monie. And if this our demand be not obserued & done, we shall haue the heads of as manie as we can get of them.

And to the intent the cause of this glorious capteins comming together, might be shadowed vnder a cloke of good meaning (though his intent nothing so) he sent vnto the king an humble supplication, affirming that his comming was not against his grace, but but against such of his counsellours, as were louers of themselves, and oppressors of the poore commonaltie; flatterers of the king, and enemies to his honor; suckers of his purse, and robbers of his subjects; partiall to their friends, and extreme to their enemies: thorough bribes corrupted, and for indifferencie doing nothing. ¶ Here, because a full report of this insurrection maie passe to the knowledge of the readers; it is necessarie to set downe the articles of the commons complaints touching the premisses, whereof a copie was sent to the parlement then hold-den at Westminster, with their bill of requests concerning abuses to be reformed.

The complaint of the commons of Kent, and causes of their assemblie on the Blackheath.

Ipprimis, it is openlie noised that Kent should be destroyed with a roiall power, made a wild forrest, for the death of the duke of Suffolke, of which the commons in ment thereof were neuer gilty.

2 Item, the king is stirred to lye onelie on his commons, and other men to haue the reuenues of the crowne, the which hath caused pouertie in his ex-cellencie, and great painments of the people, now late to the king granted in his parlement.

3 Item, that the lords of his roiall blood bene put from his daile presence, and other meane persons of lower nature exalted and made chiefe of his pryncie counsell, the which stoppeth matters of wrongs done in the realme from his excellent audience, and maie not be redressed as law will; but if bybes and gifts be messengers to the hands of the said coun-cell.

4 Item, the people of this realme be not paid of debts owing for stufte and puruiance taken to the use of the kings household, in vndoing of the said people, and the poore commons of the realme.

5 Item, the kings mentall seruants of household, and other persons, asken daile goods and lands, of impeached or indicted of treason, the which the king granteth anon, yer they so indangered be consuted.
The which causeth the receiuers thereof to inforce labours and meanes applied to the death of such people, so approached or indicted, by subtil meanes, for couetise of the said grants: and the people so impeached or indicted, though it be vnttrue, maie not be committed to the law for their deliuerance, but held still in prison, to their vttermost vndoing & destruction, for couetise of goods.

6 Item, though diuerse of the poore people and commons of the realme, haue neuer so great right, truth, and perfect title to their land: yet by vnttrue claime of infeofment made vnto diuerse states, gentles, and the kings mentall seruants in mainte-nances against the right, the true owners dare not hold, claime, nor pursue their right.

7 Item, it is noised by common voices, that the kings lands in France bene aliened and put awaie from the crowne, and his lords and people there destroyed with vnttrue meanes of treason; of which it is desired, inquiries thorough all the realme to be made how and by whome; & if such traitors maie be found gilty, them to haue execution of law without ante pardon, in example of others.

8 Item, collectors of the fifteenth penie in Kent be greatlie vexed and hurt, in payeing great summes of monie in the exchequer, to sue out a writ called Quorum nomina, for the allowance of the barons of the ports, which now is desired, that hereafter in the lieu of the collectors, the barons aforesaid maie sue it out for their ease at their owne costs.

9 Item, the thiriffes and vnderthiriffes let to farme their offices and bailiwikes, taking great suertie therefore, the which causeth extorsions done by them and by their bailiffes to the people.

10 Item, simple and poore people that vse not hunting, be greatlie oppressed by indictments feined & done by the said thiriffes, vnderthiriffes, bailiffes, and other of their assent, to cause their increase for payeing of their said farme.

11 Item, they retorne in names of inquests in writing into diuerse courts of the king not summa-ned nor warned, where through the people daile lese great summes of monie, well nigh to the vttermost of their vndoing: and make leuie of amercedments called the greene war, more in summes of monie than can be found due of record in the kings books.

12 Item, the ministers of the court of Dover in Kent ber and arrest diuerse people thorough all the shire out of Castle ward, passing their bounds and libertie used of old time, by diuerse subtil and vnttrue meanes and actions falselie feined, taking great fees at their lust in great hurt of the people on all the shire of Kent.

13 Item, the people of the said shire of Kent, maie not haue their free election in the choosing of knights of the shire: but letters bene sent from di-uerse estates to the great rulers of all the countrie, the which imbrace their tenants and other people by force to chose other persons than the commons will is.

14 Item, whereas knights of the shire should chose the kings collectors indifferentlie without any bybe taking, they haue sent now late to diuerse persons, notifieng them to be collectors; whereupon gifts and bybes be taken, & to the collectors office is bought and sold extortionoullie at the knights last.

15 Item, the people be sore vexed in costs and labour, called to the sessions of peace in the said shire, appearing from the furthest and vttermost part of the west vnto the east; the which causeth to some men, sue dates iourne: whereupon they desire the said appearance to be diuided into two parts; the which one part, to appeare in one place; an other part, in an other place; in releuing of the grieuances and intollerable labours & verations of the said people.

The requests by the capteine of the great assemblie in Kent.

Ipprimis, desireth the capteine of the commons, the welfare of our soueraigne our king, and all his true lords spirituall and temporall, desiring of our said soueraigne lord, and of all the true lords of his coun-cell, he to take in all his demaines, that he maie reigne like a king roiall, according as he is borne our true and christian king annointed: and who so will saie the contrarie, we all will liue and die in the quarell as his true liege men.

Item, desireth the said capteine, that he will auoid all the false progenie and assintie of the duke of Suff-folke, the which bene openlie knowne, and they to be punished after the custome and law of this land, and to take about his noble person the true lords of his roiall blood of this his realme, that is to saie, the high and mightie prince the duke of Poike, late exiled from our said soueraigne lords presence (by the motion and stirring of the traitorous and false disposed the duke of Suffolke and his assintie) and the mightie princes & dukes of Excester, Buckingham, and Dorset, and all the earles and barons of this land: and then shall he be the richest king christian.

Item, desireth the said capteine and commons punishment vnto the false traitors, the which contriued

ued and imagined the death of the high, mightfull and excellent pynce the duke of Glocester, the which is too much to rehearse; the which duke was proclaimed as traitor. Upon the which quarrell, we purpose all to live and die upon that that it is false.

Item, the duke of Cresser, our holie father the cardinall, the noble pynce the duke of Warwike, and also the realme of France, the duchie of Normandie, Gascoigne, and Calson, Anjou, and Spaine, were deliuered and lost by the meanes of the said traitors; and our true lords, knights, and esquires, and manie a good peoman lost and sold per they went, the which is grea t pite to heare, of the great and grievous losse to our soueraigne lord and his realme.

Item, desireth the said capteine and commons, that all extorsions plded daillie among the common people, might be laid downe, that is to saie, the greene war, the which is falselie bled, to the perpetuall destruction of the kings true commons of Kent. Also the kings Bench, the which is too greifefull to the thire of Kent, without pouision of our soueraigne lord and his true counsell. And also in taking of wheat and other graines, beefe, mutton, & all other vittels, the which is impossible to the said commons, without the breafe pouision of our said soueraigne lord and his true counsell, they maie no longer beare it. And also unto the statute of labourers, and the great extorsioners, the which is to saie the false traitors, Sleg, Cromer, Ale, and Robert Ck.

These billes when the counsell had well perused, they did not onelie disallow and condemne them and the authors, as proud and presumptuous; but also persuaded the king rather to suppress those rebels by force, than by faire promises. Whereupon the king remoued from Westminster unto Cheneuich, from whence he would haue sent certeine lords with a ppyer to haue distressed the Kentishmen, but the men said to their lords they would not fight against them that laboured to amend the common-weale: wherefore the lords were driuen to leaue their purpose. And because the Kentishmen cried out against the lord Saie the kings chamberline, he was by the king committed to the Tower of London. Then went the king againe to London, & within two daies after went against the Kentishmen with sixtene thousand men well prepared for the war: but the said Kentishmen fled the night before his comming into the wood countrie nere unto Senocke. Whereupon the king returned againe to London.

The quene (that bare rule) being of his retraits aduertised, sent sir Humfreie Stafford knight, and William his brother, with manie other gentlemen, to follow the Kentishmen, thinking that they had fled: but they were deceived, for at the first skirmish both the Staffords were slaine, & all their companie discomfited. The kings armie by this time comen to Blackheath, hearing of this discomfiture, began to murmur amongst themselves: some wishing the duke of York to come to aid the capteine his cousin: some vndisfultie coueting the ouerthrow of the king and his counsell: other openlie crying out on the quene and hir complices.

This rumoz published abroad, caused the king and certeine of his counsell (for the appealing thereof) to commit the lord Saie treasuroz of England to the Tower of London; and if other (against whome like displeasure was borne) had bene present, they had bene likewise committed. Jacke Cade upon vicorie against the Staffords, apparelled himselfe in sir Humfries bigarbaine set full of guilt nailes, and so in some glorie returned againe toward London; suruenticid and vagarant persons out of Suffre, Surrie and other places, still increasing his number.

Thus this glorious capteine, garded with a multitude of rusticall people, came againe to the plaine of Blackheath, & there stronglie incamped himselfe: to whome were sent from the king, the archbishop of Canturburie, and Humfreie duke of Buckingham, to common with him of his graces and requests.

These lords found him sober in talke, wise in reasoning, arrogant in hart, and stiffe in opinion; as who that by no means would grant to dissolue his armie, except the king in person would come to him, and assent to the things he would requere. The 14. upon the presumptuous answers & requests of this villanous rebell, beginning alinuch to doubt his done menial servants, as his vnknotwen subiects (which spared not to speake, that the capteins cause was profitable for the common-weale) departed in all hast to the castell of Killingworth in Warwicksheire, leauing onlie behind him the lord Scales to keepe the Tower of London. The Kentish capteine being aduertised of the kings absence, came first into Southwarke, and there lodged at the white hart, prohibiting to all his retinue, murder, rape, and robbery; by which colour of well meaning, he the more allured to him the harts of the common people.

After that, he entred into London, cut the ropes of the draw bridge, & strooke his sword on London stone; saing, Now is Mortimer lord of this citie. And after a glossing declaration made to the maior touching the cause of his thither comming, he departed againe into Southwarke, and upon the thirde daie of Julie he caused sir James Fines, lord Saie, and treasuroz of England, to be brought to the Guildhall, and there to be arraigned: who being before the kings iustices put to answer, desired to be tried by his peres, for the longer delate of his life. The capteine perceiving his dilatorie pla, by force toke him from the officers, and brought him to the standard in Cheape, and there (before his confession ended) caused his head to be stricken off, and pitched it upon an high pole, which was openlie borne before him thorough the streets.

And not content herewith, he went to Spile end, and there apprehended sir James Cromer then thirffe of Kent, and sonne in law to the said lord Saie, causing him likewise (without confession or excuse heard) to be beheaded, and his head to be fixed on a pole: and with these two heads this bloudie wretch entred into the citie againe, and as it were in a spite caused them in euerie street to kisse together, to the great detestation of all the beholders. After this succeeded open rapine, and manifest robbery in diuerse houses within the citie, and speciallie in the house of Philip Palpas alderman of London, and diuerse other; ouer and beside ransoming and fining of diuers notable merchants, for the suertie of their liues and goods; as Robert Hoyme alderman, which paid five hundred marks. He also put to execution in Southwarke diuerse persons, some for breaking his obedience, and other being of his old acquaintance, lest they should betraie his base linage, disparaging him for his blarped furnayne of Mortimer.

The maior and other the magistrates of London, perceiving themselves neither to be sure of gods, nor of life well warranted, determined to repell and keepe out of their citie such a mischieuous caiffe and his wicked companie. And to be the better able so to do, they made the lord Scales, and that renowned capteine Mattheu Gough priute both of their intent and enterprise, beseeching them of their helpe and furtherance therein. The lord Scales promised them his aid, with shooting off the artillerie in the Tower; and Mattheu Gough was by him appointed to assist the maior and Londoners in all that he might, and so he and other capteins, appointed for defence sense of the citie, took upon them in the night to kepe the bridge, and would not suffer the Kentishmen once to approach. The rebels, who neuer foundlie slept for feare of sudden assaults, hearing that the bridge was thus kept, ran with great hast to open that passage, where betwene both parties was a fierce and cruell fight.

Matthew Cough, perceiuing the rebels to stand to their tackling more manfullie than he thought they would haue done, aduised his companie not to aduance anie further toward Southwarke, till the daie appeared; that they might see where the place of leoparde rested, and so to prouide for the same: but this litle auailed. For the rebels with their multitude draue backe the citizens from the steepe at the bridge foot to the draw bridge, & began to set fire in diuerse houses. Great ruth it was to behold the miserable state, wherein some desiring to eschew the fire died vpon their enemies weapon; women with children in their armes leapt for feare into the riuer, other in a deadlie care how to saue themselves, betwene fire water, and sword, were in their houses choked and smothered. Yet the capitaine not sparing, fought on the bridge all the night valiantlie: but in conclusion, the rebels gat the draw bridge, and drowned manie, and slue John Sutton alderman, and Robert Weiland, a hardie citizen, with manie other, beside Matthew Cough, a man of great wit and much experience in feats of chualrie, the which in continuall warres had spent his time in seruice of the king and his father.

This fore conflict indured in doubtfull wise on the bridge, till nine of the clocke in the morning: for sometime, the Londoners were beaten backe to saint Margins corner: and suddenly againe, the rebels were repelled to the steepe in Southwarke, so that both parts being faint and wearie, agreed to leaue off from fighting till the next daie; vpon condition, that neither Londoners should passe into Southwarke, nor Kentishmen into London. Vpon this abstinence, this rakehell capitaine for making him more friends, brake vp the gales of the kings Bench and Marshalse, and so were manie mates set at libertie verie meet for his matters in hand.

The archbishop of Canturburie being chancellor of England, and as then for his suertie lieng within the Tower, called to him the bishop of Winchester, who for some safegard laie then at Haleswell. These two prelates, seeing the furie of the Kentish people, by their late repulse, to be somewhat asswaged, passed by the riuer of Thames from the Tower into Southwarke, bringing with them vnder the kings great scale, a general pardon vnto all the offenders, and caused the same to be openlie published. The poore people were so glad of this pardon, and so readie to receiue it, that without bidding farewell to their capitaine, they withdrew themselves the same night euerie man towards his home.

But Jacke Cade despairing of succours, and fearing the reward of his lewd dealings, put all his pilage and goods that he had robbed, into a barge, and sent it to Rochester by water, and himselfe went by land, and would haue entred into the castle of Quinborough with a few men that were left about him; but he was there let of his purpose: wherefore he disguised in strange attire, priuillie fled into the wood country beside Lewes in Sussex, hoping so to scape. The capitaine & his people being thus departed, not long after proclamations were made in diuerse places of Kent, Sussex, and Southerie, that whosoever could take the foresaid capitaine alie or dead, should haue a thousand markes for his trauell. A copie of which proclamation, touching the apprehension of the said Cade and his complices, hereafter followeth.

A copie of the said writ and proclamation by the king, for the taking of the said Cade and his fellowship.

Henricus Dei gratia rex Anglia & Francie, & dominus Hibernie, vniuersis & singulis custodibus, &c. For so much as one John Cade boine in Ireland, which calleth himselfe John Portimer in some writing calleth himselfe capitaine of Kent, the which John Cade the last yeare tofore his dwelling in Sussex with a knight, called sir Thomas Dagre, slue there a woman with child, and for that cause took the greeth of the church, and after for that cause forswore the kings land: the which John Cade also after this, was swozie to the French part, and dwelled with them; which hath now of late time (to the intent to enrich himselfe by robbing and despoiling of the kings liegemen, as it is now openlie knowne, to bring himselfe to great and high estate) falslie and vntruelie deceiued manie of the kings people, and vnder colour of holie and god intents made them to assemble with him against the kings regaltie & his lawes, & nought setting by the kings grace and pardons, granted nor onelle to him but to all the kings subiects, the which by his decret haue assembled with him, the which he with great reuerence receiued on mondaie last passed, and so did all that were assembled with him. Notwithstanding all this, he labourerth now of new to assemble the kings people againe, and to that intent beareth them on hand, that the kings letters of pardon granted to him and them, be not auailable, nor of none effect, without authoritie of parlement: whereas the contrarie is true, as it is openlie knowne by that, that the king granteth from time to time his charters of pardon to such as him list, of all manner of crimes and offences both generall and speciall.

The king therefore willet and commandeth, that none of his subiects giue faith nor credence to the said falsie informations of the said falsie traitor, nor accompanie with him in anie wise, nor comfort nor susteine him nor his with vittels, nor with anie other things: but will, whosoever of the kings subiects may take him, shall take him; and that who so ever taketh him, and bringeth him quicke or dead to the king or to his counsell, shall haue a thousand markes for his labour trulie paid him, without faile or delate by the prouision of the kings counsell. And who so euer taketh anie of those that from this daie forth accompanie with him, shall haue five markes for his reward, trulie to be paid in maner and forme aboue said. And ouer this, commanding all constables, ministers, and officers of the said shire, that none of them (on paine of death) take vpon them to execute anie commandement by word or writing sent or made vnto them by the said Cade, calling himselfe Portimer and capitaine, be it to reare any people, or to any other intent: that to arrest and make so be arrested such, as take vpon them to bring anie such commandement by writing or by word. Et hoc nullatenus omitatis. Teste me ipso apud Westm. 10 die Iulij, anno regni 28.]

After which proclamation thus published, a gentle man of Kent named Alexander Eden awaited so his time, that he took the said Cade in a garden in Sussex: so that there he was slain at Hothfield, and brought to London in a cart, where he was quartered; his head set on London bridge, and his quarters sent to diuers places to be set vp in the shire of Kent. After this, the king himselfe came into Kent, and there sat in iudgement vpon the offenders: and if he had not mingled his iustice with mercie, more than five hundred by rigor of law had bene iustlie put to execution, execution. Yet he punishing onelie the stubborn heads, & disordered ringleaders, pardoned the ignorant and simple persons, to the great reioicing of all his subiects. ¶ But saith another, the king sent his commissioners into Kent, and caused inquirie to be made of this riot in Canturburie, where for the same eight men were iudged and executed, and in other townes of Kent and Suffe was done the like execution.

This yeare the commons also in diuerse parts of England, as in Suffe, Salisbury, Wiltshire, and other places, did much harme to manie persons, among the which, on the nine and twentieth of June, William Alcock bishop of Salisbury (after he had said masse at Edington) was by his owne tenants beaten from the altar, in his albe with his stole about his necke to the top of an hill, and there by them shamefullie murdered, and after spoiled to the naked skin: they renting his bloudie shirt, toke euerie man a peece, and made boast of their wickednesse. The daie before, his chariot was robbed, to the value of ten thousand markes. Soldiours made a fraye against the maior of London the same daie he toke his charge at Westminster, at night comming from saint Thomas of Acres, after he had bene at Pauls.]

The French king vnderstanding all the ciuill discord and rebellious sturs in England, made thereof his foundation, hoping to get into his hands and possession the duchie of Aquitaine: and thereupon sent the earles of Bonthieu and Perigot to laie siege to the towne of Bergerat, situate vpon the riuier of Douedon, of which towne was capteine John Gedding, who vpon reasonable conditions rendered the towne. But yet the lord Camois, sir George Selmo, and sir John Arundell, with diuers other valiant capteins, hauing gouernance of the countrie, manied townes, gathered people, and recomforted the fainting hartes of the Gascoignes in all that they could, and withall sent letters ouer into England, certifieng to the kings maiestie, that without speeie aid, and readie succours, the whole countrie was like to be conquered and woone out of the Englishmens possession.

Manie letters were sent, and manie faire answers were brought; but relæse neither appeared, nor one man of warre was thither shipped: by reason whereof, the Frenchmen pursuing the victorie, got the fortresses of Janfacke, and S. Foie, with diuerse other peeces of importance thereabouts. Also, about the same time, the lord Doznall, third sonne to the lord de la Biech, with a great number of men, as well on horsebacke as on foot, departed from Basas, to conquer and deströie the Isle of Medoc. Whereupon the maior of Burdeaur issuing out, and incountring with his enemies, was vanquished, losing sir hundred Englishmen and Gascoignes: albeit the Frenchmen gained not this victorie with clære hands, for there were slaine of them to the number of eight hundred persons.

After this, the barbard of Dylance, with his brother John earle of Angoiesme, which had bene long prisoner in England, and manie other valiant capteins, besieged the castell of Montgion, which to them was rendered. Afterwards, they besieged the towne of Blaie, standing on the riuier of Garonne, the which in conclusion by verie force was conquered and woone. The barbard of Kendall, capteine of the castell, seeing the towne lost, vpon certeine reasonable conditions deliuered his fortress to the barbard of Dylance, the French kings lieutenant. After this, the townes of Burgh and Liborne after fure weekes siege, were likewise yelded to the Frenchmen. Then was the citie of Acques besieged by the erle of Foies, and the vicount de Labotrec his brother, and other noble men. So likewise was the strong towne of Kion by the earle of Arminacke, extreme enemy to the realme of England, for breach of the marriage concluded betwene king Henrie and his daughter. The earle of Bonthieu laid siege to Chatillon in Perigot, and the earle of Dunois environned with great puissance the towne of Fronsacke.

The Englishmen perceiuing in what state they stood within the towne, couenanted with the said earle, that if the towne were not succoured, and the Frenchmen fought with before the feast of the natiuitie of saint John Baptist next insuing; that then the towne of Fronsacke should be yelded to them, which was the strongest fortress in all that countrie, and the herie keie of Guien. Whereof were pledges deliuered, and writings made & sealed. Which agreement once blowne through the countrie, the citie of Burdeaur, and all other townes (except Baion) made the like agreement. So did all the noble men and gentlemen which were subiects and vassals to the crowne of England. Querie daie was looking for aid, but none came.

And whie: Then because the diuelish diuision that reigned in England, so incombred the heads of the noble men there, that the honor of the realme was clærelie forgotten, so that (to conclude) the daie appointed came, but succour looked for came not. By reason whereof, all the townes of Aquitaine (except Baion) deliuered their heirs, and became vassals to the French nation; yet the citizens of Burdeaur, in hope of rescue, required a longer daie of battell, which was granted. But at the daie appointed, when no relæse came, they rendered themselves and the citie to their aduersaries, their liues and goods saued, with licence and safe conduct to all persons which would depart and saile into England. Then finally was the citie of Baion besieged, and with mines and batterie constrained to yeld it selfe into the Frenchmens hands.

Beside the agreements taken and made with the townes, diuerse noble men made severall compositions, as Gasson de Foies, & Capdaw de Buel, whome king Henrie the sixt made earle of Longewille, and knight of the garter; whose ancestors were euer true to England. Which agreed, that he and his sonne John de Foies, whome king Henrie the sixt made earle of Kendale, and also knight of the garter, should enjoy all their lands in Aquitaine, giuen to them by the kings of England, or by the dukes of Aquitaine. And first, their intent was still to serue the king of England, they agreed to deliuer into the custodie of the earle of Foies, the sonne and heire of the said earle of Kendale, being of the age of thre yeares; to the intent that if he at his full age denied to become subiect to the French king, or before that time deceased; that then (after the death of his father and grandfather) all the said lands should whole remaine to the next heire of their blood, either male or female, being vnder the obestance of the French king or his heires.

Manie other noble men, whose hearts were good English, made like compositions, and some came into England, and others went to Calis, and bare great offices there: as the lord Duras, which was marshall of that towne; and monsieur Mauciere, which was deputie there vnder the earle of Warwick. Thus were the Englishmen clærelie displaced and lost the possession of all the countries, townes, castles, and places within the realme of France; so that onelie Calis, Hammes and Guines, with the marches thereof remained in their hands, of all those their dominions and seigniozies which they sometime held held in the parties beyond the seas. Whereby England suffered a partile but not a totall eclipse of hir glozie, in continuall loosing & nothing gaining of the enemie. Which recouerie was of great facilitie to the French, for that where they came, they found little or no resistance, but rather a voluntarie submission & yielding as it were with holding bp of hands, per they came to handstroks. So that in such victories and conquests consisted small renowne, with without slaughter & bloodshed hardie enterprizes are not attained. Forable therefore speaketh Anglorum prelia of their bloodlesse and sweatlesse victories, saying :

Delpius totos (nullo prohibente) per agros Francorum transiit: prius expugnata receptans Oppida: perfacile est populum domuisse volentem; Tendentemq; manus ultro; nec clarior ornat Gloria Vincentem fusa sine sanguine regna.

[This yeare the king made a generall progresse and came to the cite of Excester, on mondaie the firste of Julie at after none, being the feast daie of saint Ikenelme; and was receiued from place to place verie honorable through the whole countie.
Before he came to this cite, he was met by all the cleargie in their degrees, some three miles, some two miles, and some at the cite, all in their copes, censing all the waies as they went. As soon as he came to this cite, he was first conduced to the cathedraill church in all most honourable order. When he had done his oblations, he was conueied and lodged in the bishops house. During his abode here, there was a sessions kept before the duke of Summerfet, and certaine men complained to die for treason, and had iudgement to be executed to death.

The bishop and his clergie understanding hereof, with open mouth complained unto the king, that he caused a sessions to be kept within his sanctuarie, contrarie to the priuilege of his church: and that all their doings (being done against law) were of no effect. And notwithstanding the king and his coun-cell had discouered unto them the iust and orderlie proceeding, the painfullnesse of the offenders, and the necessitie of their punishment: yet all could not a-uaile, for holie church nor the sanctuarie might be pro-phaned (as they said) with the deciding of temporall matters. Whereupon the king in the end yielding to their exclaimes, released a couple of arrant traitors, and remersed all his former lawfull proceedings, and so upon the wednesdaye he departed and returned to wards London.]

The duke of Yorke pretending (as yee haue heard) a right to the crowne, as heire to Lionel duke of Clarence, came this yeare out of Ireland unto London, in the parlement time, there to consult with his speciall friends: as John duke of Northfolke, Richard earle of Salisburie, and the lord Richard his sonne, which after was earle of Warwicke; Thomas Contraie earle of Deuonshire, & Edward Broke lord Cobham. After long deliberation and aduise taken, it was thought expedient, to kepe their chiefe purpose secret; and that the duke should raise an armie of men, under a pretext to remove diuerse coincellos about the king, and to reuenge the manifest injuries done to the common-wealth by the same rulers. Of the which as principall, the duke of Summerfet was nameilie accused, both for that he was greatlie hated of the commons for the losse of Por-mandie: and for that it was well knowen, that he would be altogether against the duke of Yorke in his challenge to be made (when time serued) to the crowne; inasmuch that his goods by the commons were four-tie despoiled and bozne awaie from the Blacke Friers. After which riot, on the next morrow, proclamation was made through the cite, that no man should spoil or rob, on paine of death. But on the same daie at the standard in Cheape was a man beheaded for doing contrarie to the proclamation.

Therefore, when the duke of Yorke had thus, by aduise of his speciall friends, framed the foundation of his long intended enterprize, he assembled a great hoast, to the number of ten thousand able men, in the marches of Wales; publishing openlie, that the cause of this his gathering of people, was for the publike wealth of the realme. The king much affonied at the matter, by aduise of his counsell raised a great power, and marched forward toward the duke. But he being thereof aduertised, turned out of that way, which by espials he understood that the king held, and made streight toward London: and hauing knowledge that he might not be suffered to passe through the ci-tie, he crossed ouer the Thames at Kingston hydge, and so kept on towards Kent, where he knew that he had both friends & well-willers, and there on Burnt heath, a mile from Wotford, and twelue miles from London, he imbatelled, and incamped himselfe verie stronglie, inuironing his field with artillerie and trenches. The king hereof aduertised, brought his armie with all diligence vnto Blackheath, and there pight his tents.

Whilist both these armies laie thus imbatelled, the king sent the bishop of Winchester, and Thomas Bourchier, bishop of Ebie, Richard Woodville, lord Riuers, & Richard Ansolet, the keeper of his priuie seale, to the duke: both to know the cause of so great a commotion, and also to make a concord; if the requests of the duke and his companie seemed consonant to reason. The duke hearing the message of the bishops, answered; that his coming was neither to damasse the king in honour, nor in person, neither yet anie good man: but his intent was, to remoue from him certaine euill disposed persons of his coun-cell, blood-succours of the nobilitie, pollers of the cleargie, and oppressours of the poore people.

Amongst these, he chiefe named Edmund duke of Summerfet, vpon whom if the king would commit to ward, to answer such articles as against him in open parlement should be both proponed and proued, he promised not onelie to dissolue his armie; but also offered himselfe (like an obedient subiect) to come to the kings presence, and to do him true and faithfull seruice, according to his lotall and bounden dutie. But a further understanding of the dukes meaning by this his forceable entering of the realme (as himselfe pretended) made appeare by certaine letters by him writtten to the king, and also the kings answers vnto the same: both which I thinke good here to set downe, as I find them recorded.

Richard duke of Yorke his letter to king Henrie.

Reade it your highnesse to conserue, that since my departing out of this your realme, by your commandement, and being in your seruice in your land of Ireland, I haue bene informed, that diuerse language hath bene said of me to your most excellent estate, which should sound to my dishonour and reproch, and charge of my person: howbeit, that I haue bene, and euer will be, your true liegeman and seruant.
And if there be anie man that will or dare saie the contrarie, or charge me otherwise; I beseech your rightwisenesse to call him before your high presence, and I will declare me for my discharge as a true knight ought to do. And if I do not, as I doubt not but I shall, I beseech you to punish me as the worst man of your land. And if he be found untrue in his suggestion and information, I beseech you of your highnesse

highnesse that he be punished after his desert, in example of all other.

Please it your excellencie to know, that as well before my departing out of this your realme, for to go into your land of Ireland, in your full noble service, as since, certeine persons have lien in wait for to hearken vpon me, as sir John Talbot knight at the castell of Holt; sir Thomas Standele knight in Cheshire; Bulford at Chester; Elton at Worcester; Woke at Gloucester; and Richard, grome of your chamber at Beaumaris: which had in charge (as I am informed) to take me and put me into your castell of Contwaie, and to strike off the head of sir William Dobball knight, and to haue put in prison sir William Deuereux knight, & sir Edmund Salso knight, withouten enlarging, vntill the time that your highnesse had appointed their deliuerance.

Item, at such time as I was purposed for to haue arrived at your haue of Beaumaris, for to haue come to your noble presence to declare me your true man and subiect, as my dutie is, my landing was stopped and forbearred by Henrie Poize, Thomas Poize, William Buckleie, William Crust, and Bartholomew Woul, your officers in Northwales, that I should not land there, nor haue vittels nor refreshing for me & my fellowship, as I haue written to your excellencie here before. So farre forth that Henrie Poize, deputie to the chamberlaine of Northwales, said vnto me, that he had in commandement that I should in no wise haue landing, refreshing, nor lodging, for went nor horse, nor other thing that might turne to my worship or ease: putting the blame vpon William Sate vsher of your chamber, saying and affirming that I am against your intent, and as a traitor, as I am informed. And moreover, certeine letters were made and deliuered vnto Chester, Shrewsburie, and to other places for to let mine entrie into the same.

Item, about all wrongs and injuries about said done vnto me of malice, without anie cause, I being in your land of Ireland, in your honourable service, certeine commissions were made and directed vnto diuerse persons; which for the execution of the same, sat in certeine places; and the iuries impanelled and charged: vnto the which iuries certeine persons laboured instantlie to haue me indicted of treason, to the intent for to haue vndone me and mine issue, and corrupted my blood, as it is openlie published. Beseeching your maiestie to call, of your righteousnesse, to doe examine these matters, and therevpon to doe such iustice in his behalfe as the cause requirith: for mine intent is fullie to pursue to your highnesse for the conclusion of these matters.

The answer of king Henrie to the duke of Yorke.

Godfrie, we haue seene the bill that ye wrote vs late, and also vnderstand the godd humble obedience that ye in your selfe shew vnto vs, as well in word as in deed: wherefore our intent is, the more hartlie to ease you of such things as were in your said bill. Notobest, that at our more leasure we might answer you to your said bill; yet we let you wit, that for the causes aforesaid, we will declare you now our intent in these matters: sith it is that a long time among the people hath bene vpon you many strange language, and in especiall anon after your disordinate and lawfull slaying of the bishop of Chester; diuerse and manie of the vntrue shipmen and other said (in their maner) words against our estate, making manace to our owne person by your sayings, that ye should be fetched with manie thousands, and ye should take vpon you that, which ye neither ought, nor as we doubt not, ye will not attempt: so farre forth that it was said to our person by diuerse, & especiallie we remember of one Malnes, which had like words to vs.

And also there were diuerse of such false people, that went on and had like language in diuerse of our townes of our land, which by our subiects were taken and duly executed. Wherefore we sent to diuerse of our courts and places, to hearken and to take heed if anie such manner comming were; and if there had bene, for to resist it: but comming into our land our true subiect as ye did, our intent was not that ye, nor lesse of estate of our subiects, nor none of your seruants should not haue bene letted nor warned, but in goodlie wise receiued: notobest that peradventure your sudden comming, without certeine warning, caused our seruants to doe as they did, considering the causes about said. And as to the indictment that ye spoke of, we thinke verelie, and hold for certeine warning, caused our seruants to doe as they did, considering the causes about said. And as to the indictment that ye spoke of, we thinke verelie and hold for certeine, that there was none such. And if ye may trulie proue that anie person was thereabouts, the matter shall be demeaned as the case shall requite: so that he shall know it is to our great displeasure. Vpon this, for the easing of your heart in all such matters, we declare, repute, and admit you as our true and faithfull subiect, and as our faithfull cosine.

Richard duke of Yorke to king Henrie againe.

Please it your highnesse tenderlie to consider, that great murmur and grudging is vniuersallie in this your realme, in that iustice is not duly ministred to such as trespass and offend against your lawes, and in especiall of them that be indicted of treason, and other being openlie noised of the same; whereby great inconueniences haue fallen, and great is like to fall hereafter in your said realme, which God defend: but if by your highnesse prouision conuenable be made for due reformation and punishment in this behalfe. Wherefore I your humble subiect and true liegeman, Richard duke of Yorke, willing as effectualle as I can, and desiring the suertie and prosperitie of your most roiall person, and the welfare of this your noble realme, counsell and aduertise your excellencie, for the conseruation of godd tranquillitie and peaceable rule among all other subiects, for to ordeine and prouide, that true iustice be had, against all such that so be indicted, or openlie named: wherein I offer my selfe, and will put my endeavour for to execute your commandement in the premisses, for the punishing of such offenders, and redresse of the said miscarries, to my might and power. And for the hastie execution hereof, like it your highnesse, to addresse these letters of priuile seal and writs to your officers and ministers, to take, and arrest, all such persons so noised and indicted, of what estate, degree, or condition soeuer they be, and them to commit to the Tower of London, and to other of your prisons, there to abide without bail or mainprie, vntill the time they be utterly tried, and determined after the course of your lawes.

The answer of king Henrie to the duke of Yorke.

Godfrie, as touching your bill last put by to us, we vnderstand well that ye of godd hearty counsell and aduertise us to the setting on of iustice, ciliation to the king.

The duke of Yorks accus-
eth the duke of Summerzet.

A mutual charge betweene y two dukes, Yorke & Summerzet
of treason.

After all this aduise, it was so agreed vpon by aduise, for the auoiding of bloudshed, and pacifying of the duke and his people, that the duke of Summerzet was committed to ward, as some say; or else commanded to keepe himselfe priuie in his owne house for a tyme. But it should seme by that which some haue written, that the duke of Yorke was deceiued of the hope which he had, to be aided of the Kentish men; inasmuch that when he saw himselfe overmatche by the king in number of people, who had got together thence as manie men as the duke had there with him, the duke was the more easie to be dealt with. And so comming to the king, and submitting himselfe by mediation of certeine of the nobilitie, he obtained pardon of that his former presumptuous enterprise. And within a fewe daies after his comming to London with the king, he openlie in the church of St. Pauls (the king being present) recused a solemn oath, that from thenceforth, he should no more commit any such offense, nor attempt anie thing, either against the king, or any other of his liege people, contrarie to the order of law and iustice.

Howsoever the matter went, truth it is, that the duke of Yorke, the first of March, dissolued his armie, brake by his campe, & came to the kings tent, where contrarie to his expectation, & against promise made by the king (as other write) he found the duke of Summerzet going at large and set at libertie, whome the duke of Yorke boldlie accused of treason, byiberie, oppression, and manie other crimes. The duke of Summerzet not onelie made answer to the dukes obiections, but also accused him of high treason, affirming, that he with his fautors and complises had consulted together, how to come by the scepter and regall crowne of this realme. By means of which words the king remoued straight to London, and the duke of Yorke (as prisoner) rode before him, and so was kept a while.

The king assembled together a great counsell at Westminster, to heare the accusations of the two dukes, the one obiecting to the other manie heinous and greuous crimes. But the duke of Summerzet, which now conceiued in his mind the thing that shortly followed, incessantlie exhorted the counsell, that the duke of Yorke, by compulsion or otherwise, might be dyluen to confesse his offense, that so being attained of treason, he might suffer execution, and his children to be taken as aduersaries to their native countrie; to the intent that by the extinction of him and his sequela, all ciuill warre and inward diuision might cease and be repressed: beseeching almighty God, that so great an enemie to the king and his blood, might neuer escape punishment, nor continue long in life.

The duke of Summerzet set forth this matter the more vehementlie, because he knew perfectly, that the duke of Yorke dallie imagined with himselfe, how to get the crowne, and to depose and destroy both the king and him. But desinie cannot by anie mans deuise be letted, and manie things (to apperance) declared the duke of Yorkes innocencie in this case. First, his free and voluntarie comming to the king, without constraint, when he was partlie of puissance able to haue incountred with the kings whole power. Secondlie, his humble submission, and reasonable requests, as well on his owne behalfe, as for the poore commons: which might argue that he sought for no soueraintie.

Whilist the counsell treated of sauing or dispatching of this duke of Yorke, a rumour sprang through London, that Edward earle of March, sonne and heire apparant to the said duke, with a great armie of Marchmen, was comming toward London: which tidings fore appalled the quene and the whole counsell. Beside this, the verie same daie came ambassadors from the cheefe citizens and magistrats of the cite of Burdeaur, whereof the cheefe were, the earle of Kendale, and the lord de Leparre; which signified to the counsell, that if they would send an armie into Gascoigne, the people of the countrie would revolt from the French part, and eithones become English. These two things fore troubled the heads of the counsell, which, least inward sedition might hinder outward conquests, set the duke of Yorke at libertie, and permitted him to go to his castell of Wigmore, in the marches of Wales, by whose absence the duke of Summerzet rose in such high fauour, both with the king and quene, that his word onelie ruled, and his voice alone was heard.

¶ Neuertheless the said duke of Yorke had first made his submission, and toke his oath to be true, faithfull, and obedient subiect to king Henrie the first king of England, in saint Pauls church at London, there being present the king, and most of his nobilitie, that is to saie, the dukes of Buckingham, Northampton, and Summerzet; the earls of Warwicke, Arundell, Salisburie, Shropshire, Devonshire, Wiltshire, Northumberland, Stafford and Dorset, vicounts of Beaumont and Welles; barons, Fitz Warren, Sainmound, Cobham, Mowglas, and others: bishops, the cardinal, archbishop of Yorke and Canturburie, Winchester, Ebie, and London, in these words following.

The tenor of the duke of Yorks submission to king Henrie, under his oath.

Richard duke of Yorke confesse and beknow, that I am & ought to be humble subiect and liege-man to you my soueraigne lord king Henrie the first, and owe therefore to beate you faith and truth, as to my soueraigne liege lord, and shall do all daies vnto my liues end; and shall not at anie time will or assent, that any thing attempted or done against your most noble person: but where so euer I shall haue knowledge of anie such thing imagined or purposed, I shall with all speed and diligence possible to me, make that your highnesse shall haue knowledge thereof: and ouer that, to all that shall be possible to me, to the withstanding and let thereof, to the uttermost of my my life. I shall not anie thing take vpon me against your roiall estate or obeisance that is due thereto, nor suffer anie other man to doo, as farre forth as it shall be in my power to let it: and also shall come at your commandement when so euer I shall be called by the same, in humble and obedient wise: but if I be letted by anie sickness or impotence of my person, or by such other cause as shall be thought by you my soueraigne lord reasonable. I shall neuer hereafter take vpon me to gather anie rout, nor to make anie assemble of your people, without your commandement or licence, or in my lawfull defense. In interpretation or declaration of the which my lawfull defense, I shall report me at all times to your highnesse, and if the case require, to my peres; nor any thing attempt against anie of your subiects, of what estate, degree, or condition that they be. But when so euer I find my selfe wronged and agrieved, I shall sue humble for remedie to your highnesse: and proceed after the course of your lawes, and in none other wise: sauing in mine owne lawfull defense in maner aboue said, and otherwise haue to your highnesse as an humble and true subiect ought to haue him to his soueraigne lord.

All these things aboue said I promise you trulie to obserue and keepe, by the holie euangelists contained in the booke that I laie my hand herebpon, and by the holie crosse I here touch, and by the blessed sacrament of our Lords bodie, that I shall now with his mercie receiue. And ouer I agræ me and will, that if I anie time hereafter, as by the grace of our Lord God I neuer shall, anie thing attempt by waie of feat or other wise against your roiall maiestie, and obeisance that I owe thereto, or anie thing take vpon me otherwise than is aboue expessed, I from that time forth be bnailed, held, and taken as an vntrue and openlie forsworne man, and bnaile to all maner of worshipping, estate, and degree, be it such as I now occupie, or anie other that might in anie wise grow vnto me hereafter. And this I haue here promised and sworn, proceedeth of mine owne desire and free voluntæ, and by no constraining or coaction. In witnesse of all the which things aboue written, I Richard duke of Yorke (aboue nauded) subscribe with mine owne hand and seale.

The counsell not forgetting the offer of the Calcoignas, and that they might now haue the citie of Burdeaur, with the countrie round about, by request of the inhabitants, appointed the valiant capteine John lord Talbot earle of Shrewesburie, to go thither with an armie, who arriuing in the Ile of Gaze, passed forth with his power, being scant three thousand men, and toke the strong towne of Fromsacke, and diuerse other townes & fortresses. The inhabitants of Burdeaur, hearing of the earles arrival, sent to him messengers in the darke night, requiring him with all speed to come and receiue the citie. The earle lost not one houre, but hastened forth, & came before that citie, per the Frenchmen within vnder stood anie thing of the citizens purpose. When they were aduertised that there was a gate set open for the Englishmen to enter, they thought to haue escaped secretlie by a posterne: but they were pursued, slaine, and taken by the lord de Lescar, and other of the English armie.

After the regaining of Burdeaur, there arriued at Blaie the bastard of Summerfet, sir John Talbot, lord Lisle by his wife, sonne to the said erle of Shrewesburie, the lord Polins, the lord Harington, the lord Camois, sir John Howard, sir John Montgomerie, sir John Wernon, with two & twentie hundred men, with vittells and munitions. When the earle was thus (according to his intent) of all things furnished, first he fortified Burdeaur with Englishmen, and store of vittells; and after that he rode into the countrie abroad, where he obtained cities, and got townes without stroke or dint of sword, for the people already wearied of the French seruitude, and longing soe to returne to the English libertie, seemed to desire nothing more than to haue the earle to receiue them into the English obedience. Amongst other townes, the towne and castell of Chastillon in Perigord was to him deliuered, the which he fortified with men and ordinance verie stronglie.

In the meane time, the French king, being aduertised of all these doings, raised an armie to resist this inuasion made by the erle of Shrewesburie. And first he appointed his capteins to besiege the towne of Chastillon, to the rescue whereof the earle hastened forward, hauing in his companie eight hundred horsemen, vnder the leading of his sonne the lord Lisle, the lord Polins, the lord Camois, sir Edward Hull, sir John Howard, and sir John Wernon. He appointed also five thousand footmen, vnder the conduct of the earle of Kendall, and the lord de Lescar, to follow him with all speed. In his waie, he toke by fine force a tower which the Frenchmen had taken, and due all that he found within it. And after by the waie, he met five hundred Frenchmen going a foraging, of whom he slue the more part, and chased the other to the campe.

The Frenchmen that laie at the siege, perceiving by those good runners away that the earle approached, left the siege, and retired in good order into the place which they had trenched, ditched, and fortified with ordinance. The earle aduertised how the siege was removed, hastened forward towards his enemies, doubting most, least they would haue bene quite fled and gone before his comming. But they fearing the displeasure of the French king (who was not far off) if they should haue fled, abode the earles comming, and so receiued him: who though he first with manfull courage, and soe fighting wan the entrie of their campe; yet at length they compassed him about, and shooting him through the thigh with an handgun, slue his horse, and finally killed him lieng on the ground, whom they durst neuer looke in the face, while he stood on his feet.

It was said, that after he perceived there was no remedie, but present losse of the battell, he counselled his sonne the lord Lisle, to saue himselfe by flight, which the same could not rebound to anie great reproch in him, this being the first fourtie in which he had bene present. Anie words he vsed to persuaade him to haue saued his life: but nature so wrought in the son, that neither desire of life, nor feare of death, could either cause him to shrink, or conueie himselfe out of the danger, and so there manfullie ended his life with his said father. There died also the earles bastard sonne Henrie Talbot, and sir Edward Hull elect to the order of the garter, and thirtie other men of name and right valiant personages of the English nation.

The lord apollins was taken prisoner with these others. The residue of the English people fled to Bordeaux and other places, of whom in the flight were slain above a thousand persons.

Thus at this battell of Chatillon, fought the thirteenth daie of Julie in this yeare, ended his life John lord Albot, and of his progenie the first earle of Shrewesburie: after that he with much fame and most victorie, had valiantlie made warre, and serued his prince and countrie by the space of foure and twentie yeares, in the parties of beyond the seas, whose corps was left on ground, and after was found by his friends, and conueied to Whitchurch in Shropshire where it was interred. After this discomfite diuerse lordes fled to Bordeaux, but the earle of Cardall, the lordes of Pontferrant, of Rosaine, & of Dan-gladas entered into the castell of Chatillon, which by the space of ten daies they defended: but in the end despairing of all succours, they rendred the fortresse, and came safe to Bordeaux.

After this, the towncs of saint Millson, L. bozne, and all other, which the erle of Shrewesburie had conquered, rendred themselves to the Frenchmen, Bur-deaur onlie excepted. Which citie, being the last refuge of the English people, the French king in person besieged with all his puissance; and in conclusion constrained both the garrisons and inhabitants to yeld, so that the Englishmen & Gascoignes might safely depart into England or into Calis, with all their substance; and that the lordes de Leparre, Duras, and thirtie others, should neuer (upon paine of death) be found within anie of the French kings dominions, which lord de Leparre being after taken in Gascoigne disguised, was made thorter by the head. When this composition was agreed and sealed, the Englishmen were thortlie transported ouer into England, in the moneth of October this present yeare.

Thus was the duchie of Aquitaine, which had continued in the English possession, from the yeare of our Lord 1155, unto this present yeare, which is nere hand thre hundred yeares, by the marriage of Glenc daughter and heire to William duke of Aquitaine, wife to king Henrie the second, finally reduced and brought againe to the French obedience and seru-tude. Within that onlie duchie be foure archbishops, four and twentie bishops, fixt ene earledomes, two hundred and two baronies, and above a thousand capteinships and balliwickes: whereby ye may consider, what a losse this was to the realme of England.
On the thirtenth daie of October this yeare, was the quene deliuered at Westminster of a faire sonne, who was christened, and named Edward.

His mother sustained not a little slander and obloquie of the common people, who had an opinion that the king was not able to get a child; and therefore sicked not to saie, that this was not his sonne, with manie slanderous words, greatlie sounding to the queens dishonour; much part perchance vntrue.
After the birth of this child, he highlie advanced his brethren on his mothers side: for Edmund he made earle of Richmond, which was father to king Henrie the seventh, and Jasper he created erle of Penbroke, which died without issue. This yeare, John Stafford archbishop of Canturburie departed this life, and John Kempe archbishop of Yorke was removed from that see, to succeed in place of the said Stafford, being the thre score and second archbishop there, & John Bath bishop of Couentrie and Lichfield was translated to Yorke, being the one and fiftie archbishop of that church.

On Bartholomew daie at the wedding here beto Clerkenwell, a gentleman belonging to the prior of saint John, made a rumour; tumult, for the which (by the commandment of the maior) he was arrested by Richard Allie one of the shiriffes, and deliuered to Paris a sergeant. But such resistance was made by parts taking, that the shiriffe was faine to craue helpe of the maior, who with his brethren the aldermen arose from the game, and strengthened the shirriffes. And for the rescue of the said gentleman, one named Calis, came out of saint Johns with a great strength of archers, to resist the maior, in the which fraie a yeoman of saint Johns was slain, and manie other sore hurt. The maior himselfe escaped hard-lie, for his cap was smitten from his head with an arrows: but the maior with his citizens put the other to flight, sent the principall of them to Newgate, and then took his place againe till the games were ended: by which time the citizens had gathered themselues in great number, and fetched him home, neuer maior so stronglie nor so honozable.]

This yeare was Thomas Bourchier bishop of Ely (sonne to the countesse of Stafford, and brother to Henrie Bourchier earle of Essex) removed to the see of Canturburie; who in the yeare after the tooz became fleshy and appeared in humane shape 1443, first obtained the see of Ely (although once before he was by the king put backe from thence after his election of the couent thereunto, and confirmation of the pope) being translated from Worcester to the said see of Ely, the twelfth daie of March in the said yeare 1443. This man (after that he had remained at Ely ten yeares, thre and twentie weekes, and sue daies) was (as is before said) in this yeare 1454 removed to Canturburie by Nicholas the fift then bishop of Rome. After this he was made chancelor, which office he obtained the seauenth of March, in the yeare 1455, being the thre and thirtith yeare of king Henrie the sixts reigne. Lastlie he was advanced to the dignitie of cardinall by pope Paul the second, in the yeare of our Lord 1465, of whom is made a more liberall discourse in a treatise of the liues of the chancelors of England: a place of no small authori-tie and reputation.]

After the warres foule ended in foren parties, ci-uill dissention began againe at home, diuided speciallie into two factions. As R. Henrie descended of the house of Lancaster possessed the crowne from his grandfather king Henrie the fourth (first author of that title) so Richard duke of Yorke, as heire to Edward duke of Clarence, thirde sonne to king Edward the thirde, enforced. By reason thereof, the nobles as well as the common people were into parts diuided, to the vtter destruction of manie a man, and to the great ruine and decaye of this region: for while the one partie fought to destroye the other, all care of the common-wealth was set aside, and iustice and equitie clearelie extolled.

The duke of Yorke (above all things) first sought means how to stir by the malice of the people against the duke of Summerfet, imagining that he being made awaie, his purpose should the sooner take effect.
He also practised to bring the king into the hatred of the people, as that he should not be a man apt to the government of a realme, wanting both wit and stamach sufficient to supplie such a rourne. Manie of the high estates, not liking the tooz, and disallowing the doings both of the king and his counsell, were faine inough of some alteration. Which thing the duke well vnderstanding, chiefelie sought the fauour of the two peuils, both named Richard, one earle of Salisburie, the other earle of Marthwike, the first being the father, and the second the sonne.

This earle of Salisburie was second son to Kate Beuill earle of Westmerland, whose daughter the duke of Yorke had married, and the said Richard was espoused to ladie Alice, the onelie child and sole heire of Salisburie.

When the duke of Yorke had fastened his chaine betwene these two strong pillars, he with his friends wrought so effectuously, and handled his businesse so politicklie, that the duke of Summerfet was arrested in the quenes great chamber, and sent to the Tower of London, where he kept his Christmasse without great solemnitie. Against whom, some after in open parlement were laid diuerse and heinous articles of high treason, as well for the losse of Normandie, as for the late mischance which happened in Guen. The king at that time was sicke at Clarendon, and conueied to London, by reason whereof no small determination proceeded in this weightie cause; but all was put in suspence, till the next assemble of the high court of parlement. Some do write, that whilst the king was sicke, the duke of Yorke bare all the rule, and gouerned as regent or viceroy, by authoritie committed to him by the lords of the realme, then assembled in counsell; he to see to the preservation and good gouernement of the common-wealth, during the kings sicknesse, which was so greivous (as it was said) that he late fenselle, and was not able for a time either to go or stand.

The duke of Yorke hauing aforehand obtained an absolution of the pope, in discharge of his oth before taken, did now discover his stomach against the duke of Summerfet. But when the king was amended againe, and resumed to him his former gouernement, either of his owne mind, or by the quenes procurement, the duke of Summerfet was set at libertie; by which doing, great enuie and displeasure grew. That notwithstanding, the quene (which then bare the chiefe rule) caused the duke of Summerfet to be preferred to the captainship of Calis, wherewith not onlie the commons, but also manie of the nobilitie were greatly greiued and offended, saying, that he had lost Normandie, and so would he doe Calis.

The duke of Yorke and his adherents, persecuting that neither exhortation nor charging him with his crimes prevailed against the duke of Summerfet, they meant to mend the matter by open war: & some after he being in the marches of Wales, accompanied with his speciall friends, the earles of Salisburie, and Warwicke, the lord Cobham, and others, assembled a power, and in warlike manner marched toward London. The king informed herof, assembled likewise a great host, and meaning to meet with the duke, rather in the north parts than about London, where it was thought he had too manie friends, he accompanied with the dukes of Summerfet and Buckingham, the earles of Denbroke, Stafford, Northumberland, Devonshire, Dorset, and Wilshire, the lords Clifford, Sudlie, Berneis, Ross, and others, being in all about two thousand men of warre, departed from Westminster the twentieth, or (as some haue) the one and twentieth of Maie, and late the first night at Wadford.

Of whose doings the duke of Yorke by espials hauing full aduertisement, with all his power, being not past three thousand men (as some write) caused the countrie, and came to saint Albons the third daie next ensuing. The king there had pight his standard in a place called Goselow, otherwife Sandisford, in saint Peters street: the lord Clifford kept the barriers of the towne, to stop, that the duke being assembled in his field, should not enter the towne. & The duke of Yorke (saith one moderne Chronographer) knowing the strength made against him, abiding in the field aforesaid, from seuen of the clocke in the morning untill it was almost ten of the clocke without anie stroke smitten on either part, by the aduise of his counsell sent unto the king vnder these words following.

Words in writing by the duke of Yorke to the king.

Lease it unto your excellent grace, Richard duke of Yorke, to take him as your true liege man and humble subiect; and to consider and tender at the reuerence of God, and in the waie of charitie, the true intent of my comming, and to be good and gracious soueraine unto me, & all other your true liege men, which, that with all their power and might will be ready to live and die with you in your right, and to do all things as shall like your maiestie roiall to command us, if it be to the worship of the crowne of England, and the welfare of this your noble realme. Forcuer, gracious lord, please it unto your maiestie roiall, of your great godnesse and rightwisenesse, to incline your will to heare & see the rightwile part of vs your true subiects and liege men. First, praising and beseeching to our soueraine, Christ Iesus, of his high and mightie power, to giue you vertue of prudence, and that through the praier of the glorious martyr S. Albion giue you verie knowledge of our truths, and to know the intent of our assembling at this time: for God that is in heauen knoweth, our intent is rightfull and true. And therefore we praise vnto that mightie Lord in these words: Domine, si dispens defensionis nostrae. Wherefore gracious lord, please it your maiestie roiall, to deliuer such as we will accuse, and they to haue like as they haue deserved: and this done, you to be honozable worshipped as most rightfull king and our true gouernour. And if we should now at this time be promised, as afore this time (is not unknowne) haue bene promissed broken which haue bene full faithfullie promised, and thereupon great othes sware, we will not now cease for no such promissed, nor oth, till we haue them which haue deserved death, or else we to die therefore.

The answer by the king to the duke of Yorke.

I King Henrie charge and command, that no manner person, of what degree, estate or what condition soeuer he be, abide not; but that they auoid the field, and not be so hardie to make resistance against me in my owne realme. For I shall know what traitour dare be so bold to raise anie people in mine owne land, where though I am in great disease and heauines. By the faith I owe vnto S. Edward, and vnto the crowne of England, I shall destroye them euerie mothers sonne, and eke they to be hanged, byawne, and quartered, that may be taken afterward of them, in example to make all such traitors to beware for: to make anie rising of people within mine owne land, and so traitorously to abide their king and gouernour. And for a conclusion, rather than they shall haue anie lord, that here is with me at this time, I shall this day for their sake in this quarell my selfe live and die.

The

Whichehamsted. The duke of Buckingham sent to the duke of Yorke.

The duke of Summerfet burdened with all things that had happened since.

The first battle of saint Albons. Whichehamsted.

The words of the duke of Yorke to all gentlemen and other assembled with him.

Sirs, the king our soueraigne lord will not be reformed at our beseeching ne praier, nor will not in no wise vnderstand the intent wherfore we be here assembled and gathered at this time, but onelie is in full purpose to destroie vs all. And therupon a great oth hath made, that there is none other waie, but that he with all his power will pursue vs; and if we be taken, to giue vs a shamefull death, leeing our liuelod and goods, and also our heires shamed for ever. Therefore sirs, now sith it will none other wise be, but that we shall vtter-lie die; better it is for vs to die in the field, than cowardlie to be put to an vtter rebuke and shamefull death, for the right of England standeth in vs. Considering also in what perill it standeth at this time, and for to redreffe the mischæse thereof, let euerie man helpe to his power this daie, and in that quarell to quite vs like men, to the crowne of England; praising and beseeching vnto that Lord, the which is eter-nall, th it reigneth in the glorious kingdome celestiall, to keepe and saue vs this daie in our right, and through the gifts of his holie grace we may be made strong to withstand the great, abhominable, and horrible malice of them that purpose to destroie vs and the realme of England, and put vs to a shamefull death. Prate we therefore to the Lord to be our comfort and our defendour, saying these words, Domine supremus defensoris nostræ.

But another historie-writer saith, that the king, when first he heard of the duke of Yorke's approach, sent to him messengers, the duke of Buckingham and others, to vnderstand what he meant by his comming thus in maner of warre. The duke of Buckingham to his message was answered by the duke of Yorke and his complices, that they were all of them the kings faithfull liege subiects, and intended no harme to him at all: but the cause of our com-ming (saie they) is not in meaning aint hurt to his person. But let that wicked and naughtie man the duke of Summerfet be deliuered vnto vs, who hath lost Normandie, and taken no regard to the preseruation of Gascoigne; and furthermore, hath brought the realme vnto this miserable estate; that where it was the floure of nations, and the princesse of prouinces (now is it baled into desolation & spoile, not so dreadfull by malice of foren enemie, that indeed vtterlie (as yee know) seeketh our ruine, as by the intolerable outrages of him that so long ago & euen still appeares to haue sworne the confusion of our king and realme.] If it therefore please the king to deliuer that bad man into our hands, we are readie without trouble or breach of peace, to returne into our countrie. But if the king be not minded so to do, because he cannot misse him; let him vnderstand, that we will rather die in the field, than suffer such a mischæse vtterdressed.

The king aduertised of this answer, more wilfull than tollerable, appointed him rather to trie battell, than deliuer the duke of Summerfet to his enemies.
Whereof they ascertained made no longer staie, but straightwaie sounded the trumpet to battell: or rather (as Hall saith) while king Henrie sent forth his ambassadors to treat of peace at the one end of the towne, the earle of Marlowe with his Marchmen entered at the other end, and fiercelie setting on the kings foreward, within a small time discomfited the same. The place where they first brake into the towne, was about the middle of saint Peters street. The fight for a time was right sharpe and cruell, for the duke of Summerfet, with the other lords, comming to the succours of their companions that were put to the worse, did what they could to beat backe the enimies: but the duke of Yorke sent euer fresh men to succour the wearie, and to supplie the places of them that were hurt, whereby the kings armie was final-lie brought low, and all the chiefeins of the field slaine and beaten downe.

For there died vnder the signe of the castell, Edmund duke of Summerfet, who (as hath bene repoted) was warned long before to auoid all castles: and beside him laie Henrie the second of that name earle of Northumberland, Humfre earle of Stafford sonne to the duke of Buckingham, John lord Clifford, sir Barthram Antwile knight, a Norman barone (who forsaking his native countrie to continue in his loiall obedience to king Henrie, came ouer to dwell here in England when Normandie was lost) William Zouch, John Bontreux, Rafe Bapthorp, with his sonne William Corwin, William Cotton, Gilbert Faldinger, Reginald Griffon, John Daues, Elice Wood, John Cith, Rafe Woodward, Gilbert Sharlock, and Rafe Willoughbie esquires, with manie other, in all to the number of eight thousand, as Edward Hall saith in his chronicle: if there escaped not a fault in the impression, as 8000 for 800, sith hundreds in verie deed would better agree with the number of the kings whole power, which he brought with him to that battell, being not manie about two thousand, as by writers appeareth.

Humfreie duke of Buckingham, being woundded, and James Butler earle of Ormond and Wilshire, and Thomas Chorp lord chiefe baron of the exchequer, seeing fortune thus against them, lest the king alone, and with a number fled awaie. Those that thus fled, made the best thist they could to get awaie through gardens and backesides, through thubs, hedges and woods, seeking places where to hide themselues, vntill that dangerous tempest of the battell were overblowne. Diuerse of the kings boule also that could better skill to plaie the courtiers than warriors, fled with the first; and those of the east parts of the realme were likewise noted of too much lacke of courage, for their speedie withdrawing themselves, and leauing the king in danger of his aduersaries: who persecuting his men thus fled from him, withdrew into a poore mans house to saue himselfe from the shot of arrowes, that flue about him as thicke as snow.

¶ This done, saith one historie, the duke of Yorke, the earles of Marlowe, and Salisbury, came vnto the king where he was, and besought him on their knees of grace and forgiveness for that they had done in his presence, and besought him of his high-nesse to take them to grace, and as his true liege men. The king desiring them to cease their people, that there should be no more hurt done, and to obeie his commandement, did cause to be proclaimed in the kings name, that all manner of people should cease off their malice, and not to smite one stroke more, and so ceased the battell. And vpon the day next after, the king and the duke of Yorke, the earles of Marlowe & Salisbury, came all to London; and were lodged in the bishops palace of London, where they kept their Whitsuntide with great ioy and solemnitie, concluding there to hold a parlement, the same to begin on the ninth daie of Julie next following.]

Another historie saith, that the duke of Yorke, aduertised of the place into the which the king was withdrawne for the safetie of himselfe, and taking him into his power, comforted him in the best wise he could; assuring him, that now that the common enemie of the realme was dispatched, to wit, the duke

of Summerfet, he had cause rather to reioisse, than to be sorie, with his destruction was the kings preservation. And for himselfe and all his adherents he undertooke, that they were and would remaine, during life, his most faithfull liege people, ready in all points to serue him, as his trustie and obedient subjects. After he had vsed such words, as wherewith best to comfort him, he brought the king forth of that simple house with all due reuerence thewed toward him first to the chyrine, and after to his chamber.

¶ While the duke of Yorke was about thus to comfort the king, the soldiers that had the victorie now in their hands, applied the spoile, namely, the poothermen, stripping not onelie those that had borne armour against the m, but also the townsmen and other, with whom they might meet. So that it was thought, if the king had taken by his lodging at his first coming thither, within the abbey, as he did not (but in the midst of the towne, to provide the better to resist his enemies) the abbey had bene spoiled also. This was the end of the first battell at saint Albons, which was fought vpon the thursdaie next before the feast of Penthecost, being the thre and twentieth day of Maie, in this thre and thirtieth yere of the kings reigne. The bodies of the noble men were buried in the monasterie in our ladies chappell, and the meane people in other places. This Edmund duke of Summerfet left behind him thre sonnes, Henrie, Edmund and John, which to the extremitie of death took part with the line of king Henrie.

[There was this yere a great fight & fraie vpon Clift heath, distant about two miles from Excester, betwene Thomas Courtenie earle of Denonshire, against William lord Bonuile of Shute, and sundrie men of both parts were slaine. But yet the lord Bonuile prevailed & had the victorie, who forthwith came to this citie, and the gates before being shut, were opened and he receiued; which thing so grieved the earle, that he continually sought thenceforth to be reuenged. But not long after in the quarell between king Henrie the sixt, and king Edward the fourth, he ended his daies, and was beheaded at Yorke, and was the last of that line.]

The duke of Yorke, hauing gotten the victorie, remembered well, that he had published abroad how the onelie cause of this warre was, for the advancement of the common-wealth, and therefore vsing all courtesie, would not touch the kings person after a nie violent sort; but with all honour and due reuerence conuied him to London, and so to Westminster. To which place was summoned a parlement, which began the ninth daie of Iulie, in the which session, the late duke of Gloucester was openly declared a true subject, both to the king and to the realme. Beside this, it was enacted, that no person should either iudge or report anie point of vntruth of the duke of Yorke, the earles of Salisburie and Warwicke, or of anie knight, esquier, archer, or other, for coming in warlike arate against the king, at saint Albons; considering their enterpryse was onelie to see the kings person in safegard.

But all the blame was put vpon the duke of Summerfet, Thomas Chorp, baron of the eschequer, and William Iosep esquier, the kings collaterall companion; because that they, vpon malicious purpose, kept a certaine letter from the kings knowledge, and would in no wise suffer it to be deliuered vnto him, notwithstanding the same made to the advancement of some good peace, had it bene throughlie and aduisebly read, weied & considered. In which letter they declared, that as faithfull and humble subjects, they required onelie, that it would please the king (whose honor, health, suertie, and preservation, they chiefly wished) not to giue credence to their ad-uersaries malicious suggestions, till their coming to his presence, vnto the which they humbly besought him that they might be admitted as his faithfull liege people, to shew the intent and purpose of their commings; which was to none other end, than to declare their fidelitie and allegiance towards his most roiall person, intending to put themselves with as much diligence and trauell in all things that might aduance his honour, health, and safegard, as any subject he had liuing.

The keeping backe of this letter from the kings sight and knowledge, did minister matter sufficient vnto the parlement, to colour and iustifie for well done all transgressions committed in the late battell and chase at saint Albons. In this parlement also, the duke of Yorke was made protectour of the realme, and the earle of Salisburie was appointed to be lord chancellor, and had the great seale to him deliuered, and the earle of Warwicke was elected to the office of the capteinship of Calis, and the territories of the same; and thus the rule of the realme rested in the orders of the duke and chancellor, and all warlike affaires remained principallie in the earle of Warwicke. And so amongst them it was agreed, that king Henrie should reigne still in name and dignitie, but neither in deed nor in authoritie; not minding to destroye him, least they might suddenlie prouoke the furie of the common people against them, because that of the simple sort of people he was for his holiness of life, and abundant clemencie, much fanowed and highlie esteemed.

In this parlement also it was enacted, that the king should resume, take into his hands againe, haue and retaine into his possession, all honours, castles, lordships, townes, villages, manours, lands, tenements, waists, forests, chases, rents, reuerfions, fees, farmes, seruices, issues, profits, counties, aduoufons of priories, churches, hospitals, and free chapels, and all other reuenues with their appurtenances, the which had passed from him since the first daie of his reigne vnto that present; either by his letters patents, or authoritie of parlement, and manie other meanes, whether by grant, confirmation, or release from him made in fee simple, or fee taile, for tearme of life or yeres, to anie maner of person and persons in England, Wales, Scotland, or the marches; in Ireland, or in the townes of Calis, & Guisnes, & the marches there. And likewise all grants made of such things as are aboue mentioned, being parcel of the duchie of Lancaster; and further all grants of offices, rannes, fees, wages, or commodities, not accustomed to belong to anie office or charge before the said first daie of the kings reigne, were likewise renoked.

Diuerse other things were also contained within this renocation and generall resumption; with certaine exceptions yet and prouisoies had, as were thought conuenient, and as by the same act it doth appeare. Moreover, now that the duke of Yorke and his adherents had wrested the whole rule & gouernment into their hands; all such persons as the king either loued, or the quene favoured, were put beside the priue counsell; and such put in their places, as were knowne to fauour the house of Yorke. Also the officers were changed throughout the realme, at the will and disposition of the protectour, chancellor, and capteine of Calis; so that they constituted as it were a triumvirat, ruling all things at discretion of these thre. And yet in all their rule I find not that anie mention is made of their deferring of iustice, or of anie polling or byberie; as was openly proued by such as gouerned before their time. Vnto they were noted of diuerse spiritual persons, and namely of the abbat of Westminster and his monks, for a

of Summerville

But now the lord Henrie Beauford, netolue duke of Summerville by the death of duke Edmund his father, slaine at the battell of Saint Albons (as above is rehearsed) and Humfrie duke of Buckingham (who then & there lost his sonne and heire) and other of estate taking the part of king Henrie, whose case they did much bewaile & doubt, as perceiving where to the courtesie of the duke of Poike did draw: they therefore thinking it necessarie to puerue for a remedie per the mischefe happened, consulted with the quene. By whose aduise was a great counsell called at Greenwich, where the duke of Poike was discharged of his protectorship, & the earle of Salisburie deposed also of his office. ¶ This sudden change amongst the nobilitie caused alterations, and seditious attempts in the commonaltie, and in especiall within London: whereof this was one. A young merchant, which before time had bene in diuerse cities of Italie, and there forbidden by the magistrats (as the law and maner is) to weare anie weapon, now challenged an Italian in Cheapside for wearing a dagger, telling him it was against his owne countrie lawes: whereto because the Italian answered somewhat disdainfullie, the merchant not onelie took by force from him his dagger, but also with the same brake his pate.

This Italian in great hast complained to the maior, so that at the next court holden at the Guildhall, the merchant was sent for, and upon charge of his offense, he was commanded to ward. Whereupon diuerse other light persons within the citie, assembled together in great plumps, by force constrained the maior to deliuer the prisoner out of Detogate: and not so satisfied, like mad men ran to the severall houses of diuerse Venetians, Lucases, and Florentines, and them spoiled, robbed, and rifled without reason or measure. The maior, perceiving this enormous doing, assembled a number of substantiall and graue citizens; who (not without bloodshed and maiming of sundrie) appeased the rage, and caused the misruled people to depart to their houses. The beginner of this vyce got him to Westminster, and there registered himselfe for a sanctuary man.

The quene, which now againe ruled all, being aduertised of this unlawfull misdemeanour, sent the dukes of Excester and Buckingham, with other noble men to London, with a commission oier and terminer, for the inquirie and punishment of so seditious an offense. But when the maior, the two dukes, and the two chiefe iustices were set in the Guildhall upon their commission, intelligence was giuen, that a number of light persons were approaching in armor to rescue the prisoners apprehended for the late robbery and riot, as they were caried to their arraignment. The two dukes and the other commissioners quickelie thence departed, and lest their inquirie for that date, though in deed in no such danger as they doubted: for certeine discret and sage citizens so handled the matter, that no misorder followed of that sort.

The common

ed.

The maior on the next daie called a common council, whereof the number was an hundred fourescore and od, who ordeined that all wardens of mysteries should assemble their companies in their halles, where exhortation should be to the obseruation of peace; and if they spied any man either ready to stirre a rumor, or make to the deliuerance of such as were in prison, their names should be secretlie written, and so deliuered to the maior: which policie well appeased this outrage. Whereupon after the commissioners sat in

Guildhall, where manie of the robbers were attained & put to execution, beside diuers great fines set on the heads of diuerse merchants, & paid, for thinking at the matter. ¶ This yere John Kempe archbishop of Canturburie departed this life, & Thomas Burthier bishop of Ely removed to his place, being the thirthe and thirde archbishop of that see.

¶ In the moneth of Nouember, in the Ile of Wozt land not farre from the towne of Wilmouth, was sene a cocke coming out of the sea, hauing a great crest upon his head, and a great red beard, and legs of halfe a yarde long: he stood on the water & crowed foure times, and euerie time turned him about, and beckened with his head, toward the north, the south, and the west, and was of colour like a fasant, & when he had crowed thre times, he vanished awaie. And thortlie after were taken at Writh within twelue miles of London, foure great and wonderfull fishes whereof one was called Mors marina, the second a sword fish, the other two were whales.]

The French nation, hearing of the cruell dissention within the realme here, and for an old grudge seeking our annoie, two nauiies appointed they to invade the towne standing upon the riuage of the sea. The captains of the one fleet was William lord Boniers, and of the other sir Peter Bessie, a great ruler in Normandie. These two captains, taking their course out of the mouth of Saine, severed themselves, the one westward; and the other eastward, which was sir Peter Bessie, who sailing alongst the coasts of Sussex and Kent, durst not yet take land, but staid in the Dotones: and there hauing by cspiall perfect notice that Sandwich was neither peopled nor fortified (because that a little before, the rulers of the towne were from thence departed, for to auoid the plague, which sore there afflicted and sive the people) he entered the haven, spoiled the towne, and after such poze stiffe as he there found rifled and taken, he fearing an assemble of the countrey, thortlie gat him awaie.

The lord Boniers likewise took his course westward, & by night burning certeine houses in Ffulnate, with a little pillage retired into Britaine. The Scots also (busse like flies where no flap to fraie them) entered into Northumberland (king James the second being there in person) & burned certeine poze houses, and little cottages: but in the berie midst of their great enterprize, they hearing of the duke of Poikes marching toward them with a great host, with much paine and no gaine in all hast returned to their countrey. But now to passe ouer outward inuasions, & to intreat of the daillie disorder amongst the nobles at home. So was it, that a great conflict fell betwene the lord Egremond, & the sonnes of the erle of Salisburie, in which manie persons were slaine, & a great number hurt. The lord Egremond, seeking to get a waie but could not, by force was taken & brought before the counsell: where the king and the quene, who shew themselves indifferent, adiudged him to paie to the earle of Salisburie a great summe of monie; and for his heinous offense against the lawes, was committed to Detogate in London, out of which he escaped, to the great trouble of the thiriffes.

And so in semblance of batoking and hunting, came to Couentræ, where diuerse waies were stried to fulfill the quenes desire: for the accomplishing whereof, the duke of Poike, the earles of Salisburie else might be cause of the contrarie. And ouer this declaration of my conuersion and repentance, I here openlie assent, that my said bookes, woorks, and writings, for declaration and cause aboue rehearsed, ple and terror of all other, &c.

After this, he was deprived of his bishopricke, having a certeine pension assigned vnto him for to liue on in an abbey, and some after died. His bookes were intituled: 1 Of christian religion, and a booke pertainthere was a great fraie in Fleetstreet, betwene men fact the king committed the principall gouernours

King Henrie and his counsell, perceiving the duke of York late still and stirred not, returned to London, and there called a great counsell, openly declaring both the French and Scots (imbolned by the civil discord within this realme) attempted to annoy the same, as of late they had thewed apparant tokens, and likeli not ceasse upon occasions to do further displeasures, till a perfect concord were concluded betwene him and his friends, and those of the contrarie part and confederacie. And to the intent that he would be the cheefe author of peace, he promised of his dignitie to intertaine the duke of York and his friends, that all old grudges should be not onlie inwardlie forgotten, but also outwardlie forgiven, which should be cause of perpetuall love and assured amitie.

This devise was of all men judged for the best. Whereupon diverse grane persons were sent to the duke of York, and all other the great estates of the realme, who since the battell of saint Albons never met nor communed together, commanding them for great causes to repaire to the kings court without delay. At his commandement came to London Richard duke of York, with foure hundred men, and was lodged at Baimards castell being his owne house; and after him came the earle of Salisbury with five hundred men, and was likewise lodged at his owne house called the Herbour. Then came the dukes of Gresseur and Summerfet with eight hundred men, and were lodged without Temple barre; and the earle of Northumberland, the lord Egremond, and the lord Clifford came with fiftene hundred men, and lodged without the citie. The earle of Warwike also came from Calis with six hundred men in red sackets, imbodered with white ragged staves behind and before, and was lodged at the grate friers.

Thus were all those of the one part lodged within the citie, and those of the other without, in Holborne towards Westminister, and in other places of the suburbs, all upon wise consideration: for that the York faction and the Lancastrians could not well have bene mingled without danger of discord. After that these lordes were thus come unto London, the king and the queene shortly followed, comming thither the seventeenth daie of March, and lodged in the bishops palace. Because no riotous attempt or bickering should be begun betwene any of the parties of their retinues, the maiors and aldermen of the citie kept great watch, as well by daie as by night, riding about the citie by Holborne, and Fleetstreet, with five thousand men well armed and arrayed, to see good order and peace on all sides kept.

The lordes which lodged within the citie held a baillie counsell at blacke friers: the other part sojourning without the walles, assembled likewise in the chapter house at Westminister. At length by the diligent travell and good exhortation of the archbishop of Canturburie, and other prelates; both parties were persuaded to come to communication, and so did. Where, after long debating of grievances on both sides, they promising to forget all old rancors, and to be friends each to other, & both obedient to the king, were accorded by award, wherof writings were sealed, signed, and delivered to effect as followeth.

The award made at Westminister on the three and twentieth of March, Anno regni regis 36.

First, that at the costs, charges, and expenses of the duke of York, the earles of Warwike, and Salisbury, fourtie & five pounds of peacelie rent should be assured by waile of a mortification for ever, unto the monastrie of S. Albons, for suffrages and obits to be kept, and almes to be imploied for the soules of Edmund late duke of Summerfet, Henrie late erle of Northumberland, and Thomas late lord Clifford late slain in the battell of saint Albons, and buried in the abbey church, and also for the soules of all other slain in the same battell. The said duke of Summerfet, the earle of Northumberland, and lord Clifford, by vertue of the same award, were declared for true and faithfull liegemen to the king, and so to be holden and reputed in the date of their deaths, as well as the said duke of York, the earles of Warwike and Salisbury.

Moreover it was decreed, that the duke of York should give to Glenor duchesse of Summerfet, and to Henrie duke of Summerfet his sonne, the summe of five thousand markes of good assignements of debts, which the king ought him for his wages, due during the time of his service in Ireland, to be divided as the king should thinke convenient, betwixt the brethren & sisters of the said duke of Summerfet. Also that the earle of Warwike should give unto the lord Clifford, the summe of a thousand markes, in good and sufficient assignements of debts, which the king ought him, to be distributed betwixt the said lord Clifford his brethren and sisters.

Also where Thomas Percie knight, lord Egremond, and Richard Percie his brother, sonnes of the ladie Glenor countesse of Northumberland, had been in a sessions holden within the countie of York before Richard Bingham, and Rafe Pole the kings iustices and other commissioners, condemned unto the earle of Salisbury in the summe of eight thousand markes; and to the same earle, and to his wife Alice in the summe of five thousand markes; and to Thomas Percie knight, son to the said earle of Salisbury, in the summe of a thousand markes; and to the said Thomas and spawd his wife, in the summe of two thousand markes; and to John Percie knight, sonne to the said earle of Salisbury, in the summe of eight hundred markes: for transgressions and trespasses there found to be done by the said lord Egremond, and Richard his brother, unto the said earle of Salisbury, Alice, Thomas Percie, spawd and John Percie, as by the record appeared.

It was ordeined, that the said earle and his sonnes should release all the said summes of monie, and the executions thereof, and likewise release unto Rafe Werneie, and John Steward late thiriffes of London, unto whose custody the said lord Egremond had bene for the same condemnations committed, and from them escaped, all actions which they or any of them might have against the said Werneie and Steward for the same escape. Yet it was decreed by this award, that the said lord Egremond should be bound by recognisance in the Chancerie, to keepe the peace toward the said erle and his wife, children, servants, and tenants.

Also where diverse knights, esquires, and other servants and tenants to the said earle of Northumberland, and to the said lord Egremond, were by their severall obligations bound, by occasion of the said debates, unto the said duke of York, earle of Salisbury, or any of their children, to stand to their order and gouvernement; it was ordeined that the same obligations should be delivered to them that so stood bound, before the feast of saint Peter ad vincula next ensuing at the citie of York; or else that the parties so bound, should have sufficient acquittances in discharge of the same obligations.

It was further awarded, that all variances, discords, debates, controuersies, appeales, and actions personals, that were or had bene betwixt any of the

The clergy were sure in the award to lose nothing.

the said persons, or any of their servants, or tenants, should be for ever determined & ended, saving to euerie one his title, action and right, which he had by any evidence of arreages of rents or seruices, accounts, detinues, or debts due by reason of anie lawfull contract or deed, had and made for anie reasonable considerations, other than the variance before said.

And for the more assurance of both parties, it was ordeined that either should release to other all manner of actions, that were mere personals and appeales, which anie of them might haue against the other, by reason of the variances and discords before mentioned.

Also it was decreed, that if anie action, sute or quarrell chanced betwixt anie of the servants or tenants of anie of the parties, for matter or title supposed to be had, occasioned or moued before this time; that from thenceforth, none of the said parties should mainteine, support, or aid any of them that will so sue and moue strife and debate: but should rather so deale, as the matter may be brought to peace and quietnesse.

It was further awarded, that if anie man complained, pretended, or surmised, that this award was not kept, but in some point broken by anie of the parties, for the which breach he would haue a Scire facias, or some other action prosecuted in the kings name vpon anie recognisance made to the king for the performance of this award: yet should not the same Scire facias or action be prosecuted, till the kings counsell might be thoroughlie certified of the matter by the complainant, and vpon consideration see iust cause why the same Scire facias, or action ought to be had and prosecuted in the kings name.

And if anie variance rose betwixt the counsell of both the parties in making of the recognisances, releases, acquittances, or other writings; the same variance should be determined by the two lordes chiefe iustices, that should be fullie instructed of the kings intention in this behalfe.

And besides this, it was notified and declared by the same award, that the parties being severallie bound in the Chancerie in great sums to obeis and performe this award, ordinance & iudgement made by the king; it was the kings will and pleasure, that the same recognisances should stand in force, and no parcels of the summes therein contained to be pardoned in anie wise, without the agreement and consent of the parties, for whose assurance the same recognisance was taken.

And if anie of the said summes, or anie parcell thereof should be recovered by action or execution taken and prosecuted in the kings name, vpon anie of the said recognisances; the parties to whose hinderance the award was broken, should haue the one halfe of the monie so recovered; and the other moitie should be assigned to the treasurer of the kings house. This ordinance, award and agreement, was giuen by vnder the kings great scale, at the kings palace of Westminister, the foure and twentieth daie of March in the six and thirtieth yeare of his reigne.

For the open publishing of this iustfull agreement, there was (vpon our ladie daie in March) a solemne procession celebrated within the cathedrall church of saint Paulie in London, at the which the king was present in habit roiall, with his crowne on his head. Before him went hand in hand the duke of Summerset, the earle of Salisburie, the duke of Excester, and the earle of Warwicke; and so one of the one faction, and another of the other: and behind the king the duke of Boke, and the queene with great familiaritie in apperance leading hand in hand. But what shall be said: As goodlie apples corrupted at coze, (how faire coated so euer they seeme) can neuer be made to become sound againe: no rotten walles new plaistered without, can euer the more staie their moldering inward, till the putrified matter first through the crumble all in the mire: so fared it on all parts in this dissembled and counterfet concord. For after this apparant peace (but inward discord) diuerse of the nobles smallie regarding their honours, forgot their oth, and brake their promise holdie.

Not long after this, of pretended purpose (as it was thought) a fraie was made vpon a yeoman of the earle of Warwicke, by one of the kings seruants, in the which the assailant was sore hurt; but the earles man fled: wherevpon the kings meniall seruants, seeing their fellow hurt, and the offender escaped, assembled together and watched the earle, when he returned from the counsell chamber toward his barge, and suddenly set on him, the yeomen with swords, the blackegard with spits and sic-forks. After long fight, and manie of the earles men mained and hurt, by helpe of his frends he gat a wherrie, and so escaped to London. The queene aduertised hereof, incontinentlie commanded that he should be apprehended and committed to the tower, where (if he had bene taken) he had shortly ended his daies.

By this unhappie fraie, there arose anon after such trouble and terrible warre, that the whole realme was thereby disquieted. For after this displeasure done to the earle, and the queens good mind towards him by his secret frends reuealed; he with all diligence toke his iourne to Warwicke, and after into Bokehire, where he found the duke of Boke, and the earle of Salisburie, declaring vnto them the assault made vpon him by the kings seruants, and the pretended euill purpose of the queene. After which complaint made, he fearing to be dispossessed of his rhome at Calis, with great speed imbarked himselfe and sailed thither. He was not onelie deputie or lieutenant of Calis, but also high admerall of the seas, which office was to him confirmed for the space of five yeares. Wherevpon, whether before his arrival now at Calis, or shortly after, I cannot say; but this yeare about the middell of summer, the said earle, hauing with him a foureteene well appointed ships, sailed abroad to scowze the seas, and by chance met with five great ships, whereof three were caraks of Genoa, and the other two were of Spaine, bigger in heighth and length than the caraks.

The earle, though he was scarce able to deale against them, yet he valiantlie incountred them. There was a verie sore and long continued battell fought betwixt them, for it lasted almost the space of two daies. Yet in the end the victorie fell to the English, so that two of those ships being forced to saue themselves by flight, the other three were taken, which the earle brought vnto Calis, with all the merchandise aboard the same; the value whereof in wine, oile, war, iron, cloth of gold, and other riches, was esteemed to the summe of ten thousand pounds & above. By reason whereof, that was sold now for twelue pence, which would not haue bene bought before for two shillings. There were taken a great number of prisoners, beside a thousand of the enemies slaine in fight. Of the earles part there were fiftie slaine. The earles fame hereby increased not a little, and manie a blessing he had for this pece of seruice.

The noble science of Printing was about this time found in Germanie at Magunze by one John Guttembergus a knight: one Conradus an Almaine brought it into Rome: William Carton of London mercer brought it into England about the yeare 1471: and first practised the same in the abbey of saint Peter at Westminister; after which time it was likewise practised in the abbies of S. Augustine at

In the morning earlie, being the date of saint Teocle, he caused his souldiers to throt their flights towards the lord Audelies compagne, which late on the other side of the said water, and then he and all his people made a signe of retreat. The lord Audelie, supposing his aduerfaries had fled in deed, caused his trumpets quicklie to blow vp, and setting forth his boward, speedilie passed the water. The earle of Salubric, which knew the sleights of warlike policie, suddenly returned, and set vpon the lord Audelie and his chiefe captaine, per the residue of his armie could passe the water. The fight was soze and bradfull. The earle desiring the sauing of his life, and his aduerfaries coueting his destruction, fought soze for the obtaining of their purpose: but in conclusion, the earles armie, as men not looking for other succours

Their answer touching the pardon offered.

which consisted in three points. First, that as concerning the pardon, they durst not trust unto it, considering they had diuerse pardons before, and the same confirmed by parlement, and yet nothing available to their assurance. Secondlie, that notwithstanding such pardons, those that were about the king, were presumptuous and unruly, that they cared not at all to breake the kings commandments, nor were any thing abashed to be noted for the breach thereof.

Thirdlie, although by law of the land, and right of the statute, euery lord by vertue of the kings writ, being called to the parlement, ought safelie to come, safelie there to remaine, and safelie to depart and returne home: this notwithstanding, the said earle of Warwike himselfe, at a certeine councill holden at Westminster, by vertue of the kings writ of priuie seale, being there in person, & labouring to his knowledge to giue good aduise and counsell for the profit of the common-wealth, was yet in danger of death, if the Lord above had not the better provided for his escape, moze than anie humane power or force of the kings pardon. For the which cause (quoth he) sith the kings pardon maie be likened in these daies to a buckler of glasse, or to a staffe of reed, in which is no trust, we dare not commit our selues unto the defence of anie such pardons. But if anie other waie might be deuised for their suerties, whereunto they might safelie trust (he said) they were ready to come to his grace, and to sue for his fauour.

A letter from the lords to the king.

The king receiuing such answer in these words, or other to the like effect, was nothing contented therewith, and so commanded his standards estioners to aduance. But yet before he came nere to the place where they were incamped, the said lords wrote to him a letter in their owne circule, professing they meant no harme in the world against his person, as by their demoraies and proceedings it might well appeare, who had euer fled & withdrawn themselves from place to place, from towne to towne, from village to village, and from countie to countie. Which might serue for an euident token, that they sought for nothing but onelie their owne safegards & quietnesse of the realme, with so much fauour, as in good and safe suertie they might come to his presence, to declare certeine things which in their opinions might turne to the wealth of the realme: and further to make answer to all things that had bene objected against them. And now (said they) we are here remaining in the uttermost parts of the land (that is) in the marches towards Wales, not farre from Ludlow, not upon anie presumptuous meaning, but rather in all humble lowlinesse of mind and bodie to abide his graces comming: which they besought of God might be in some peaceable manner and fauorable in their behalves.

A proclamation.

The king hauing receiued this letter, and coniecturing that some bitter meaning laie vnder so sweet a speech, commanded his armie againe to march forth; and comming within halfe a mule of the aduersaries campe, pitched downe his field, and forthwith caused proclamation to be made, that who so euer of his aduersaries would giue ouer his lewd begun enterprise, and repaire to his presence to sue for mercie, he would pardon him of all offenses. This proclamation, comming to the vnderstanding of them in the duke of Yorkes host, caused a great number that were there with him against the king, to get abate & come to the kings side. Whereouer, there rose among the residue great murmuring: so as they seemed verie like to grow to a greuous mutinie.

Andrew
Trollop was chiefe, who with the other Califfians, which had long serued the king, and liued a long time by his wages, perceiuing now that they should fight against their soueraine lord himselfe (whose true subject they esteemed before that time the earle of Warwike euer to haue bene, and in no wise his enimie) in the dead of the night before the daie of the battell secretlie departed from the dukes campe, and submitted themselves to the king, aduising him of all things deuised against him. Whereof part was, that the duke of York by his expert capteins appointed vpon a waie how to set vpon his enimies, & easilie to discomfit them; so as on the next morning he meant to haue assailed the king and his people, yet they could haue bene readie or warie of his comming.

But now by the going awaie thus of his capteins and people, that purpose was disappointed. And Andrew Trollop thus departed, he was now as much discomfited, as before by trust in him he was encouraged: for all his counsell and purpose by Andrew disclosed, he thought it better for him & his to depart in suertie, than to abide the imminent danger. Whereupon he with his yonger sonne Edmund earle of Rutland, secretlie fled into Wales, and so passed into Ireland, where he was with all joy and honour gladielie receiued, all the Irish offering to liue and die with him; as if they had bene his liege subjects, and he their lord and prince naturallie boine.

The earle of March sonne and heire apparant to the said duke, accompanied with the earles of Salisburie and Warwike, and sir John Menlocke, got awaie the same night, and came into Denonshire: where, by the meanes of John Dinham esquier (which after was high tresuroer of England, in the daies of king Henrie the seauenth) they bought a ship which cost a hundred and ten marks at Cernmouth, and sailed into Cerneseie, after came to Calis, where being let in at the posterne, they were iustlicke welcomed of their friends, namelie of sir William Beruill lord Fauconbridge, that was the earle of Warwikes uncle, and brother to the earle of Salisburie, who had the towne and castell in keeping. All these being assembled cast their heads together, and euery one seuerallie had his deuise for the perfecting of their purpose, whereto there wanted in them neither will nor hardinesse.

But now to returne to the king. When in the morning he was aduertised that the duke of York and his partakers were fled and gone, he caused all his horsemen to follow them; although in vaine: for they were got farre enough out of danger (as before ye haue heard.) The king pardoned all the poore soldiers, saving certeine ringleaders, of the which some he punished and fined, and some he hanged and quartered. After this he remoued to Ludlow, and there brake vp his host, and spoiling the towne and castell, he sent the duchesse of York with hir two yong sonnes to be kept in ward with the duchesse of Buckingham hir sister. This done, he proclaimed these lords, traitors to him, enimies to their countie, and rebels to the crowne, confiscating their lands, goods, and offices: and committed the gouernance of the north parts to the earle of Northumberland, and to the lord Clifford, as to his trustie and most faithfull friends, & of his towne of Calis he made capteine Henrie the new duke of Summerfet.

This duke retorsing much in his new office, chose forth diuerse valiant and hardie souldiers, and with great pompe hostilie after toke the seas, and sailed towards Calis. But when he thought to haue entered the haven, the artillerie shot so hotlie, both out of the towne, and from Risebanke, that he suffering there a fore repulse, was faine to land at Whitlandbaie; and sent word to the capteins of the towne to receiue him as the kings lieutenant, shewing to them his letters patents. But neither he nor his writing was once regarded: and so of necessity he resorted to the castell of Guisnes, daile statmishing with the garrison of Calis, more to his losse than gaine. Diuerse of the mariners of those ships that went ouer with him, after his arriuall, owing more good will to the earle of Warwike than to this yong duke, conuied their ships into the haven of Calis, and in them diuerse of the earle of Warwikes enemies, as Jamin Findill, John Felow, and diuerse others, the which being presented unto the earle of Warwike, he caused their heads forthwith to be stricken off.

Shortlie after, Richard lord Riuers, and sir Anthony Wodville his valiant sonne that was after lord Seales, accompanied with foure hundred warlike persons, were appointed to passe ouer to Guisnes, to aid the duke of Summeriset against his aduersaries, which late in Calis. But as they sojourned at Sandwich abiding for wind and weather to transport them ouer, the earles of March and Warwike had knowledge thereof, and sent John Dinham with a small number of men (but a multitude of valiant hearts) unto the towne of Sandwich, which suddenly entered the same, and toke the lord Riuers and his sonne also in their beds, robbing houses, and spoiling ships. And beside this, they toke the principall ships of the kings nauie, and had them alwaie with them to Calis (one excepted called Grace de Dieu which might not be had alwaie because she was broken in the bottome) and there presented them to the earle of March, of whome he was iustfullie receiued. For though in the fight he was sore hurt & malined in the leg, so as he halted euer after, yet he bare himselfe so worthilie in that enterpryse, that his praise was great amongst all men.

¶ Sir Baldwine Fulkord undertooke on paine of losing his head, that he would destroye the earle of Warwike: but when he had spent the king a thousand marks in monie, he returned againe. After this god fortune thus chanced to the lords, diuerse of the best ships taken in the haven of Sandwich, were well vittelled and manned, and with them the earle of Warwike sailed into Ireland, to common with the duke of Poike of their great affaires and businessse. The weather and wind were so fauourable to the earles purpose, that within lesse than thirtie daies he passed and repassed from Calis to Dublin, and backe againe.

The duke of Ercester, being chiefe admerall of the sea, late in the west countie, and durst not once meddle with the earle of Warwikes nauie, as he came by; by reason of the mistrust which he had in the captains and mariners of his owne nauie: who by their murmuring well shewed that they wished the earle of Warwikes good successe. ¶ But here is to be remembred, that after the great discomfiture of the lords (as before you haue heard) and proclamation made against them as traitors, the duke of Poike and the earles of Salisburie and Warwike had conference; and thereupon concluded with one assent, to write a letter excusatorie (supposing thereby to salve up the force) in all their names to the king: and so did, as followeth.

A copie of the said letter excusatorie written by the said duke and earles.

Most christian king, right high and mightie prince, and our most dread soueraigne lord, after as humble recommendations to your high excellencie as will suffice. Our true intent to the prosperitie and augmentation of your high estate, and to the common-weale of this realme, hath bene shewed vnto your highnesse in such writing as we make thereof. And ouer that, an indenture signed by our hands in the church cathedraall of Worcester, comprehending the proofe of the truth and dutie that (God knoweth) we beare to your said estate, and to the preheminance and prerogatiue thereof, we sent vnto your god grace by the prior of the said church, and diuerse other doctors, and among other, by maister William Linwood doctor of diuinitie, which ministred vnto vs severallie the blessed sacrament of the bodie of Iesus, whereupon we and euerie of vs deposed for our said truth and dutie, according to the tenor of the said indenture.

And since that time we haue certified at large in writing and by mouth, by Carter king of armes, not onelie to your said highnesse, but also to the god and worthy lords being about your most noble presence, the largenesse of our said truth and dutie, and our intent and disposition, to search all the motions that might serue conuenientlie to the affirmation thereof, and to our perfect suerties from such inconuenient and vnruegent leopordies as we haue bene put in diuerse times here before. Whereof we haue cause to make, and ought to make such exclamation and complaint, not without reason, as is not vnknown to all the said worthy lords, and to all this land; and will offer vs to your high presence, to the same intent, if we might so do, with our said suertie, which onelie causeth vs to keepe such fellowship as we do in our lawfull manner.

And hereto we haue forborne, and auoided all things that might serue to the effusion of christian blood, of the dread that we haue of God, and of your roiall maiestie: and haue also eschued to approach your said most noble presence, for the humble obsequance and reuerence wherein we haue, and during our life will haue the same. And yet neuer thelesse we heare, that we be proclaimed and defamed in our name vnrighthie, vnlawfullie, and (saining your high reuerence) vnrulie, and otherwise (as God knoweth) than we haue giuen cause; knowing certeinlie, that the blessed and noble intent of your said god grace, and the righteounesse thereof is, to take, repute, and accept your true and lawfull subiects; and that it accordeth neither with your said intent, nor with your will or pleasure, that we should be otherwise taken or reputed. And ouer that, our lordships and tenants bene of high violence robbed and spoiled, against your peace and lawes, and all righteounesse.

¶ We therfore, as we suffice, beseech your said god grace, to take, repute, and reueue therevnto our said truth and intent, which to God is knowne, as we shew it by the said tenor of the same indenture. And not applie your said blessednesse, ne the great righteounesse and equitie wherewith God hath euer indured your high nobilitie, to the importune impatience and violence of such persons, as intend of extream malice to proceed vnder the shadow of your high might and presence) to our destruction, for such inordinate couetise (whereof God is not pleased) as they haue to our lands, offices, and goods, not letting or sparing therefore, to put such things in all lamentable and too sorrowfull leopordie, as might in all wise take effect, by the myserie of Gods will and power.

¶ Not hauing regard to the effusion of christian blood, ne anie tendernesse to the noble blood of this land, such as serue to the tuition and defense thereof, ne not waling the losse of your true liege men of your said realme, that God defend, which knoweth our intent, and that we haue auoided therefrom as farre as we may with our suerties; not of anie dread that we haue of the said persons, but onelie of the dread of God and of your said highnesse, and will not vse our said defense vntill the time that we be prouoked hed of necessitie, whereof we call heauen and earth vnto witnesse and record, and therein beseech God to be our iudge, and to deliuer vs according to our said intent, and our said truth & dutie to your said highnesse, and to the said common-weale.

Post christian king, right high and mightie prince, and most dread soueraigne lord, we beseech our blessed Lord to preferue your honour and estate in ioy and felicitie. Written at Ludlow the tenth daie of October: R. Yorke, R. Warwike, R. Salisburie.

Abr. Fl. ex I. S. pag. 692, 693.

During this time the king called a parlement in the citie of Couentre, which began the twentieth of September, in the which were attainted of high treason, Richard duke of Yorke, Edward erle of March his sonne and heire, Richard earle of Warwike, Edmund earle of Rutland, Richard earle of Salisburie, John lord Clifford, lord Clinton, sir Thomas Harrington, sir John Wenlock, Thomas Peuill & John Peuill sons of the earle of Salisburie, James Pickeering, John Coniers, Thomas Par, William Oldhall, and Henrie Katford knights; John Bowser, Thomas Coke, John Claie, Richard Citon, Robert Wolone, Edward Bowser, Thomas Naughan, John Roger, Richard Greie, Walter Deuoreur, Walter Hopton, Roger Hinderton, Will. Bowes, Foulke Stafford, the lord Polwis, and Alice countesse of Salisburie, their goods and possessions escheated, and their heires disherited vnto the ninth degree, their tenants spoiled of their goods, maimed and slaine; the towne of Ludlow, belonging to the duke of Yorke, was robbed to the bare wals, & the dutches of Yorke spoiled of his goods.

But (saith another) when the king should come to giue his consent vnto the acts passed in the same parlement, and that the clerke of the parlement had read that statute of the attainder of those lords; such was the kings modestie and great zeale vnto mercie, that he caused a prouiso to be put in, and added vnto the same statute, that it might be lawfull vnto him at all times fullie without authoritie of anie other parlement, to pardon the same noble men, and restore them againe to their former estates, degrees, and dignities in all things, so they would come in vnto him, and in the spirit of humblenesse beseech him of grace and fauour. Wherein the king gaue euident testimonie, that he was indued with those qualities of mind which the poet ascribed vnto Cesar (namelie slow to punish, & sad when he was constrained to be seuerer; with the one commended his lenitie, the other fauoured of tyrannye) in this distichon of like termination:

Cuiq; dolet quousq; cogitur esse ferax.*

Herewith also order was taken for the defense of the heuens & landing places alongst the sea coasts. Sir Simon Pontford, with a great crew of men, was appointed to keepe the downes, and the five ports; and all men passing into Flanders were vpon paine of death prohibited to passe by Calis, lest the lords there should borrow of them anie prest monie, as they did latelie before of the merchants of the staple the summe of eightene thousand pounds. The lords were not ignorant of all the kings provisions made against them, but were ascertained daillie what was done euen in the kings priue chamber: wherefore first they sent a companie to Sandwich vnder the gouernance of the lord Fauconbridge, who took the towne, & sir Simon & Olbert Pontford within it, and sent him with all his mates to Calis, where incontinentlie he with twelue of his chiefe fellows lost their heads on the sand before Kisse-banke.

The earles at Calis sent to the archbishop of Canturburie, and to the commons of England at large certaine articles in writing, beginning thus: We the duke of Yorke, the earles of March, Warwike, and Salisburie, such and offered to haue come to the king our soueraigne lords most noble presence, to haue declared there afore him for our dutie to God and to his highnesse, and to the prosperitie and welfare of his noble estate, and to the common-weale of all his land as true liege men, the matters following.

Articles sent from the duke of Yorke, and the earles, to the archbishop of Canturburie and the commons.

In primis, the great oppression, extortion, robbrie, murder, and other violences done to Gods church, and to his ministers thereof; against Gods and mans law.

Item, the pouertie and miserie that to our great heavinesse our soueraigne lord standeth in, not hauing anie liuelod of the crowne of England whereof he may keepe his honorable household, which causeth the spoiling of his said liege men by the tabers of his said household, which liuelod is in their hands that haue bene destroiers of his said estate, and of the said common-weale.

Item, how his lawes be parcialle and unrightfullie guided, and that by them that should most lone and tender his said lawes, the said oppression and extortion is most fauoured and supported; and generally, that all righteounesse and iustice is eriled out of the said land, and that no man dreads to offend against the said lawes.

Item, that it will please his said god grace to liue vpon his owne liuelod, wherevpon his noble progenitors haue in daies heretofore liued as honorable and as worthilie as anie christian princes, and not to suffer the destroiers of the said land, and of his true subiects, to liue therevpon, and therefore to lache the sustentances that should be belonging to his said estate, and: find his said household vpon his poore commons, without payment, which neither accordeth with Gods nor mans law.

Item, how oft the said commons haue bene greatlie and maruellouslie charged with taxes and tallages to their great impoverishing, whereof little good hath either growne to the king or to the said land, and of the most substance thereof the king hath lest to his part not halfe so much; and other lords and persons, enemies to the said common-weale, haue to their owne vse, suffering all the old possessions that the king had in France and Fozmandie, Anion and Haine, Calcoine and Guien, wone and gotten by his father of most noble memorie, and other his noble progenitors, to be shamefullie lost or sold.

Item, how they can not cease therewith, but now begin a new charge of imposition and tallages vpon the said people, which neuer afore was sente; that is to saie, euerie towneship to find men for the kings gard, taking example therein of our enemies and aduersaries of France. Which imposition & tallage, if it be continued to heire, heires, and successors, will be the heauiest charge and worst example that euer grew in England; and the foresaid subiects, and the said heires and successors in such bondage, as their ancestors were neuer charged with.

Item, where the king hath now no more liuelod out of his realme of England, but onelie the land of Irel and the towne of Calis, and that no king christened hath such a land and a towne without his realme; diuerse lords haue caused his highnesse to write letters vnder his priue seale, vnto his Iustices, which neuer king of England did heretofore, whereby they may haue comfort to enter into the conquest of the said land, which letters the same Jrrish enimies sent unto me the said duke of Porke, and maruelled greatlie that anie such letters should be to them sent, speaking therein great shame and villanie of the said realme.

8 Item, in like wise the king by exortation and labour of the same lordes, wrote other letters to his enimies and aduersaries in other lands, that in no wise they should thew anie fauour or good will to the towne of Calis, whereby they had comfort inough to proceed to the winning thereof. Considered also, that it is ordeined by the labour of the said lordes, that no where vittels nor other thing of refreshing or defense should come out of England, to the succour or reliefe of the said towne, to the intent that they would haue it lost, as it may openlie appeare.

9 Item, it is deemed and ought greatlie to be deemed, that after the same lordes would put the same rule of England, if they might haue their purpose and intent, into the hands and gouernance of the said enimies.

10 Item, how continuallie since the pitious, shamefull, and sorrowfull murder to all England, of that noble, worthy, and chistian prince Humfrie duke of Gloucester the kings true vnicle, at Burie, it hath bene laboured, studied, and conspired, to haue destroyed and murdered the said duke of Porke, and the issue that it pleased God to send me of the roiall blood, and also of vs the said earles of Marwike and Salisburie, for none other cause but for the true hart that (God knoweth) we euer haue borne, and beare to the profit of the kings estate, to the common-weale of the same realme, and defense thereof.

11 Item, how the earles of Shrewesburie and Willshire, and the lord Beaumont, our mortall and extreme enimies now, and of long time past, hauing the guiding about the most noble person of our said soueraine lord, whose highnesse they haue restrained & kept from the libertie & freedom that belongeth to his said estate, & the supporters & fauourers of all the promises, would not suffer the kings said good grace to rectue and accept vs, as he would haue done, if he might haue had his owne will, into his said presence, breaching the charge that would haue bene laid vpon them, of the miserie, destruction, and wretchednesse of the said realme, whereof they be causes, and not the king, which is himselfe as noble, as vertuous, as righteous and blessed of disposition, as a prince earthlie.

12 Item, the earles of Willshire and Shrewesburie, and the lord Beaumont, not satisfied nor content with the kings possessions and his goods, stirred and excited his said highnesse to hold his parlement at Conuentic, where an act is made by their prouocation and labour, against vs the said duke of Porke, my sonnes March and Rutland, and the earles of Marwike and Salisburie, and the sonnes of the said earle of Salisburie, & manie other knights and esquires of diuerse matters falselie and vntrolic imagined, as they will answer afore almightie God in the daie of dome; the which the said earles of Shrewesburie & Willshire, and the lord Beaumont prouoked to be made, to the intent of our destruction and of our suffering; and that they might haue our liuelod and goods, as they haue openlie robbed and despoiled all our places and our tenements, and manie other true men, and now proceed to hanging and drawing of men by tyrannie, and will therein thew the largenesse of their violence and malice as vengeable as they can, if no remedie be prouided at the kings highnesse, whose blessednesse is neither assenting nor knowing thereof.

Wherefore, seeing all the said mischieses, bearing also that the French king maketh in his land great assemble of his people, which is greatlie to be dread for manie causes, purpose yet againe with Gods grace to offer vs to come againe to the said presence of our said soueraine lord, to open and declare vnto him there, the mischieses aboue declared; and in the name of the land to sue, in as reuerent and loiallie wise as we can, to his said good grace, to haue pittie and compassion vpon his said true subiects, and not to suffer the same mischieses to reigne vpon them. Requering you in Gods behalfe, and praesing you in our owne, therein to assist vs, doing alwaie the due tie of liege men in our persons to our soueraine lord, to his estate, prerogatiue, and preheminence, and to the suertie of his most noble person, whereunto we haue euer bene and will be as true as anie of his subiects aliue, thereof we call God, our labie saint Marie, and all the saints in heauen to witnesse.

10 In the meane time, the earle of Willshire treasurer of England, the lord Seales & the lord Hungerford went to Newberie, which belonged to the duke of Porke, and there made inquisition of all them that in anie wise had fauoured the said duke; whereof some were found guiltie, and were drawn, hanged, and quartered, and all the inhabitants of the towne were spoiled of their goods. From thence the earle of Willshire went to Southampton; where, vnder colour to take the earle of Marwike, he armed five great carracks of Fene with souldiers, taking vittels of the kings price without payment, and put a great part of his treasure into the said carracks, and after sailed about in the sea, and at last stole into Dutchland, sending backe againe his souldiers into England. When were the kings priuie seales directed to all bishops, abbats, priors, and other states, to lend the king monie, therewith to wage souldiers to keepe the sea coasts.]

40 After the kings nauie was gained, and his capteins (as before we haue heard) on the sea taken; the lordes being at Calis, being aduertised from the lord Fauconbridge (who after the taking of Pontford late still in Kent) that the people of that countrie and other parts were altogether bent in their fauour [and no lesse addited to do them seruice both with bodie and goods, than the Jrrishmen seemed to be at their receiving of the said duke of Porke, and his younger sonne Edmund earle of Rutland, whom they so highly honoured, that they offered to liue and die in their quarell] they conceived therevpon so great hope in their friends within the realme, that they determined to passe the sea, and therewith entring their ships with fiftene hundred men landed all at Sandwiche.

60 [But it is to be read in a late writer, that the commons of Kent dreading the like vengeance towards them, as fell vpon them of Newberie, sent priuie messengers to Calis to the foresaid earles, beseeching them in all hast possible to come to their succour. Wherevpon the said earles sent ouer into Kent the lord Fauconbridge, to know if their dees would accord with their words: so that anon the people of Kent and the other shires adioining, resorted to the said lord Fauconbridge in great number. Wherefore when the earles knew the willing hartes of those people, they prepared to come into this land. Against whose coming, a long ballet was fired vpon the gates of Canturburie, made in fauour of the duke of Porke and the said earles, beginning thus: In the daie of salt and spirituall affliction, the celestiaall influence of bodies transitorie, &c.]

Now as they passed through Kent, there came to them the lord Cobham, John Gifford, William Dech, Robert Horne, and manie other gentlemen; so that before they approached to London, their number ber was esteemed above fourtie thousand fighting men, for the same of their landing being once knowne, gentlemen and yeomen resorted to them out of all the south parts of the realme. Upon which rumor, Thomas lord Scales, a man in great fauour with the king & queene, accompanied with the earle of Kendall a Calcoigne, and the lord Louell, resorted to London with a great companie of armed men, declaring to the maior, that their repaire onelie was to defend and keepe the citie from spoile of such traitors as the king was crediblie informed were thither comming. To whom the maior answered, that he needed no fellow helper, either to defend or gouerne the citie to him committed in charge. With which answer the lord Scales and his associates nothing contented, entred into the Tower, daile deuising waies how to grieue the citizens, whom he perceiued to fauour rather the duke of Yorks part, than the kings.

But shortly after the earles of March and Warwick, and other of their affinitie, came to London, and were of the maior and citizens so ouerly receiued, to whome resorted Thomas archbishop of Canturburie, the bishops of London, Lincoln, Salisburie, Chichester, with manie other prelates and religious persons: amongst whome also was the popes legat to treat of peace, if need so required. Upon good deliberation and aduise had and taken amongst these lords how to go forward with their weightie enterprise, the earles of March and Warwick, William lord Fauconberg, Henrie lord Bourchier, called earle of Eu, with a great number of men which came out of Kent, Essex, Surrie, and Suffex, to the number (as some writers affirme) of fine and twentie thousand persons, departed from London toward the king lieng at Couentrie, then called the queenes secret harbour, leaving behind them to keepe the Londoners in their promised friendship, the earle of Salisburie, the lord Cobham, and sir John Wentlocke, which took such order, and watched the gates and entries on each side so diligentlie, that no succours might come to the lord Scales lodging in the tower; who took there with such displeasure, that he shot out his great ordinance against them within the citie, and they likewise shot at him againe, to the hurt and no pleasure of both parts.

The king hauing knowledge of all these doings, assembled a great armie, and accompanied with the duke of Summerfet (latele come from Guines) and the duke of Buckingham, and diuerse other great lords that took his part, came to Portsmouth; where the queene perceiuing his puissance to be able to match in fight with the aduersaries, took upon him to encourage his friends and well-willers: for the king studied of nothing but of peace, quietnesse, and solitarie life. When the whole host of the kings part was assembled, the same issued forth of the towne, and passing ouer the riuer of Tine, lodged in the new field betwene Harington and Sandwiche, strongly fencing themselves about with high banks, and deepe trenches. On the other part, the lords being herewith aduanced verie nere the place where the kings people lay without Portsmouth; the bishops that were there with them, by the aduise and consent of the said lords, sent vnto the king the bishop of Salisburie, to vnderstand his mind, and to moue him vnto some treatie of peace, and to admit the archbishop of Canturburie, and the other bishops there present, to be mediators in the matter, that some good accord might be concluded betwixt the parties, so as an vniuersall peace might be restored in all parts through the whole realme.

The bishop of Salisburie doing this message not so circumspicallie as had bene conuenient, returned without bringing any towarde answer; but rather words of high despite and bitter defiance. For the lords that were about the king, trusting in their warlike engines and strength of place, in which they were incamped, though otherwise inferior in number of men, purposed to abide the brunt of battell, and soled with the spirit of rashnesse, sent none other answer backe againe by the bishop, but contumacious words sounding greatlie to the reproch of their aduersaries; who being sore offended therewith, determined to seeke reuenge with dint of sword. The earle of March as then being in the floure of his lustie and most couragious youth, lieng betwixt Touceto and Portsmouth, determined to set on the kings armie without longer delay: and thereupon in the night season removed his campe toward Portsmouth, and in marching forward set his men in order of battell: whereof the banward was led by the earle of Warwick, which either by strength or stealth wan a streit which the lord Beaumont kept, going toward the kings campe; and herewith entering freshlie with his people, began the battell about seauen of the clocke the ninth daie of Iulie. After him followed the earle of March with the banner of his father. Others write, that the earle of March led the foreward, the earle of Warwick the middleward, and the lord Fauconberg the reerward.

Moreover, that Edmund lord Greie of Ruthen, who was on the kings side, failed in the trust committed to him: for where the enemies could not without great danger enter upon the kings campe, by reason of a mightie trench and rampire pight full of piles and sharpe stakes, wherewith the campe was compassed about: the said lord Greie came with his men, and with helping hands pulled the enemies up, and receiued them into the field, where the battell was begun with great force & violence. For being now entred the field, they set upon the kings people so fiercelie, that it seemed they ment either to obtaine the victorie, or to die for it, euen all the whole number of them. The fight continued right fierie and cruell, with vncertaine victorie, till the houre of nine: at which time the kings armie was discomfited, and of the same slaine and drowned in the river, few lesse than ten thousand; and the king himselfe left comfortlesse alone was taken by the aduersaries, as a man in great miserie.

At this battell fought at Portsmouth, were slaine Humfreie duke of Buckingham, John Talbot earle of Shrewesburie, a valiant person, and not degenerating from his noble parents, Thomas lord Egremont, John viscount Beaumont, and sir William Lucie, which made great loss to come to part of the fight, and at his first approach was stricken in the head with an ar. Besides these that were slaine, manie were taken prisoners, because they left their horses, alighting to fight on foot. The duke of Summerfet, and other, which narrowly escaped, fled with the queene and prince into the bishopricke of Durham. The earles, hauing got the victorie in this bloodie battell, conueied the king to London, and lodged him in the bishops palace. After whose comming to the citie, the Tower was deliuered to the earle of March, vpon a certaine composition; but the lord Scales suspecting the sequels of the deliuerie thereof, took a wherrie priuillie, intending to haue fled to the queene; but he was espyed by diuerse watermen belonging to the earle of Warwick (which waited for his coming on the Thames) and suddenly taken, was shortly slaine with manie darts & daggers, and his bodie left naked and all bloodie at the gate of the clinke, and after was buried in the church adjoining.

Then were diuerse persons apprehended, and indicted of treason, whereof some were pardoned, and some executed. Thomas Thorpe second baron of the clinke, her, her, was committed to the Tower, where he remained long after, for that he was knowne to be great friend to the house of Lancaster. ¶ When queene Margaret heard that the la. was taken, the with hir sonne, and eight persons fled to the castell of Harbrough in Wales, and was robbed by the wale in Lancashire of all hir goods, to the value of ten thousand markes: from thence she went into Scotland. Thus you see what fruits the tree of ciuill discord doth bring forth; that euill tree, which whilest some haue taken paine to plant, and some to pzoine and nourish, for others confusion (to whom they haue giuen a taste of those apples which it bare, far more bitter than colquintida) themselves haue bene forced to take such share as befell them by lot. ¶ For as it is not possible that a comon tier, whose heat & flame is vniuersallie spread, should spare any particular place (for so should it not be generall) no more is it likelie that in ciuill commotions, rebellions, insurrections, and partakings in conflicts and pitched fields (speciallie vnder ringleaders of great countenance and personage, such as be the peres and states of kingdoms) anie one should, though perhaps his life, yet a thousand to one; not saue his bloud vnspilt, nor his goods vnspolled. ¶ During this trouble, a parlement was summoned to begin at Westminster, in the moneth of October next following.

In the meane time the duke of Booke, aduertised of all these things, sailed from Dublin towards England, and landed at the red banke nere to the citie of Chester, with no small companie: and from Chester by long iournies he came to the citie of London, which he entred the fridaie before the feast of S. Edward the Confessor, with a sword borne naked before him, with trumpets also sounding, and accompanied with a great traine of men of armes, and other of his friends and seruants. At his comming to Westminster he entred the palace, and passing forth directly through the great hall, staied not till he came to the chamber, where the king and lords used to sit in the parlement time, comonlie called the vpper house, or chamber of the peres, and being there entred, stepped vpon the throne roiall, and there laung his hand vpon the cloth of estate, seemed as if he meant to take possession of that which was his right (for he held his hand so vpon that cloth a good while) and after withdrawing his hand, turned his face towards the people, beholding their preassing together, and marking what countenance they made.

Whilest he thus stood and beheld the people, supposing they reioiced to see his presence, the archbishop of Canturburie (Thomas Bourcher) came to him, & after due salutations, asked him if he would come and see the king. With which demand he seeming to take disdain, answered basefelie, and in few wordes thus: I remember not that I know anie within this realme, but that it befletheth him rather to come and see my person, than I to go and see his. The archbishop hearing his answer, went backe to the king, and declared what answer he had receiued of the dukes owne mouth. After the archbishop was departed to the king that laie in the queenes lodging, the duke also departed, and went to the most principall lodging that the king had within all his palace, bearing vpon the lockes and doores, and so lodged himselfe therein, more like to a king than a duke, continuing in the same lodging for a time to the great indignation of manie, that could not in anie wise like of such presumptuous attempts made by the duke, to thrust himselfe in possession of the crowne, and to depose king Henrie, who had reigned ouer them so long a time.

sitting in the regall seat there in the chamber of the peres, either at this his first comming in amongst them, or else at some one time after, the which we haue thought god also to set downe: though Iohn Wetherhamsted the abbat of saint Albons, who liued in those daies, and by all likelihood was there present at the parlement, maketh no further recitall of anie wordes, which the duke should utter at that time in that his booke of records, where he intreateth of this matter. But for the oration (as master Hall hath written thereof) we find as followeth. ¶ During the time (saith he) of this parlement, the duke of Booke with a bold countenance entered into the chamber of the peres, and sat downe in the throne roiall, vnder the cloth of estate (which is the kings peculiar seat) and in the presence of the nobilitie, as well spirituall as tempozall (after a pause made) he began to declare his title to the crowne, in this forme and order as insueth.

Edw. Hall in
Hen. 6. fol.
clxxvij. &c.

The duke of Yorks oration made to the lords of the parlement.

M singular good lords, maruell not that I approach vnto this throne: for I sit here as in the place to me by verie iustice lawfullie belonging: & here I rest, as to whom this chaire of right apperteineth, not as he which requireth of you fauour, partialitie, or bearing, but equall right, friendlie indifferencie, and true administration of iustice. For I being the partie grieved, and complainant, can not minister to my selfe the medicine that should helpe me (as expert laches & cunning surgians maie) except you be to me both faithfull aiders & also true counsellors. For yet this noble realme and our naturall countrie shall neuer be vnbackled from hir daillie feuer, except I (as the principall physician, and you as the true and trustie apothecaries) consult together in making of the potion, and trie out the cleane and pure stuffe from the corrupt and putrified drugs.

For vndoubtedlie, the root and bottome of this long festured canker is not yet extirpate, nor the feeble foundation of this fallible building is not yet espied, which hath bene and is the daillie destruction of the nobilitie, and the continuall confusion of the poore communitie of this realme and kingdome. For all you know (or should know) that the high and mightie prince king Richard the second, was the true and vndoubted heire to the valiant conqueror and renowned prince king Edward the third, as sonne & heire to the hardie knight and couragious capitaine Edward prince of Wales, duke of Aquitaine and Cornewall, eldest sonne to the said king Edward the third: which king was not onelie in deed, but also of all men reputed and taken for the true and infallible heire to the wise and politike prince king Henrie the third, as sonne and heire to king Edward the second, sonne and heire to king Edward the first, the very heire and first begotten sonne of the said noble and vertuous prince king Henrie the third.

Which king Richard of that name the second, was lawfullie & iustlie possessed of the crowne and diadem of this realme and region, till Henrie of Derby duke of Lancaster and Hereford, sonne to John of Gant duke of Lancaster, the fourth begotten sonne to the said king Edward the third, and younger brother to my noble ancestoz Lionell duke of Clarence, the third begotten sonne of the said king Edward, by force and violence, contrarie both to the dutie of his allegiance, and also to his homage to him both done and sworn, raised warre and battell at the castle of Flint in North-wales, against the said king Richard, and him apprehended, and imprisoned within the Tower of London: during whose life and captiuitie, he wrongfullie usurped and intruded vpon the roiall power, and high estate of this realme and region, taking vpon him the name, stile, and authoritie of king and gouernour of the same.

And not therewith satisfied, and contented, compassed and accomplished the death and destruction of his naturall prince, and most worshipfulle souereigne lord, not as a common homicide and butcherlie murtherer, but as a regicide, and destroyer of his king. After whose pitious death, and execrable murther, the right and title of the crowne, and superiouritie of this realme was lawfullie reuerted & returned to Roger Mortimer earle of March, sonne and heire to ladie Philip the onelie child of the aboue rehearsed Lionell duke of Clarence, vnto which Rogers daughter called Anne, my most darest and welbeloued mother, I am the verie true and lineall heire, which descent all you can not iustlie gaine say, nor yet trulie denie. Then remember this, if the title be mine, why am I put from it: If I be true heire to the crowne (as I am in deed) why is my right withhelden: If my claime be good, why haue I not iustice? For suertie, learned men of great science and knowledge say and affirme, that lineall descent, nor usurped possession can nothing preuaile, if continuall claime be lawfullie made, or openlie published.

For the auoiding of which scruple and ambiguitie: Edmund earle of March my most welbeloued vnckle, in the time of the first usurper, in deed but not by right called king Henrie the fourth, by his coelines the earle of Northumberland, & the lord Percie, he being then in captiuitie with Owen Glendouer the rebell in Wales, made his title & righteous claime to the destruction of both the noble persons. Likewise my most darest lord my father, so farre set forth that right and title, that he lost his life & worldlie ioy at the towne of Southampton, more by power than indifferent iustice. Since whose death, I comming to my full age, haue neuer desisted to pursue my title, and require my right, which by meanes of sinister counsell and vniust detention, I can neither obteine nor recouer. So that of fine force I am compelled to use power in stead of praier, and force in stead of request; not (as I said before) for my priuat emolument and peculiar profit: but to restore peace, loue, and quietnesse to this our naturall region, which euer since the first vngodlie usurpation of the aforesaid Henrie, vnrulie called king Henrie the fourth, hath bene clere lie banished, and out of the same vniustlie exiled.

What murthers and manslaughterers haue bene perpetrated and committed within this countrie, since the beginning of that vngodly usurpation: What number of noble men haue bene slaine, destroyed, & executed since that infortunate daie: It is too lamentable and manifest. For although Henrie of Lancaster earle of Derby tooke vpon him the scepter and the crowne, and wrongfullie bare the name and stile of a king; and was not much tickled with mine vnckle the earle of March, at that time being within age: yet was he neuer in suertie of himselfe, nor had or ioined any profit & quietnesse either in mind or in bodie. For suertie, a corrupt conscience neuer sleeeth rest, but looketh when the sword of vengeance will descend and strike. His sonne also called king Henrie the fifth, obtained notable victozies, and immortall praises for his noble acts done in the realme of France: yet God (for the offense of his vntrue parent) suddenlie touched him, vnbodieng his soule in the flower of his youth, and in the glorie of his conquest.

And although he had a faire sonne and a yong heire apparant: yet was this orphan such a one (as preachers say) that God threatned to send for a punishment to his vnrulie and vngodly people, saying by his prophet Esai: I shall giue you children to be your princes, and infants without wisdom shall haue the gouernance of you. The prophet lied not, if you note all things in an order: for after this Henrie the fifth (whose fame no man can iustlie reproue or deface, succeeded his sonne, whom all we haue called our naturall prince, and obeyed as his heire. In whose time and wrongfull reigne, I require you diligently to consider, with what great torments and afflictions God hath whipped & scourged this miserable Ile: yea with such and so manie scourges and plagues, as no nation (the Egyptians onelie excepted) were euer tormented or afflicted withall. I will not speake of rebellious murthers and oppressions, which of late haue bene done and exercised here among vs. But I will declare & manifest to you, how the crowne and glorie of this realme is by the negligence of this sillie man, and his vniust counsell minished, defaced, and also dishonoured.

Is not Normandie, which his father gat, regained & conquered againe, by the insolencie of him & his couetous counsell: Is not the whole duchie of Aquitaine, by two hundred and odd yeares peaceable possessed by the kings of this realme, in one yeare yeare and a little moze, gotten out of our hands & feignozie: What should I speake of Anjou & Maine, or the losse of the Ile of France, with the rich citie of Paris. Alas it is too apparant. Neither will I molest you with the recitall of all the particulars thereof. But now in the midst of this affliction, and to make an end of the same: God of his ineffable goodnesse, looking on this countrey with his eyes of pitie & mercie, hath sent me in the truth, to restore againe his decayed kingdome to his ancient fame and old renowne whereof here in open parlement, according to my iust & true title, I haue and doe take possession of this roiall throne: not putting diffidence, but firme hope in Gods grace, that by his diuine aid, and assistance of you the pæres of this realme, I shall beautifie & mainteine the same to the glorie of him, honour of my blood, and to the publike wealth as well of you all here present, as of all the poore commons and subiects of this kingdome and regiment.

When the duke had made an end of his oration, the lords sat still as men stricken into a certeine amazednesse, neither whispering nor speaking forth a word, as though their mouths had bene sewed vp. The duke not verie well content with their silence, aduised them to consider throughlie, and ponder the whole effect of his words and sayings: and so neither fullie displeased, nor yet altogether content, departed to his lodging in the kings palace. While he was declaring thus his title in the higher house among the pæres, there happened a strange chance in the vertic fame, instant amongst the commons in the nether house. A crowne which did hang in the middle of the same to garnish a branch to set lights vpon, without touch of man, or blast of wind, suddenlie fell doونه. About the same time also fell doونه the crowne which stood on the top of Dover castell. Which chanced were construed to be signes, that the crowne of the realme should some waie haue a fall.

The lords forgot not the dukes demand, and to take some direction therein, diuerse of them, as spirituall and temporall, with manie graue and sage persons of the commonaltie daillie assembled at the Blackefriers, and other places, to treat of this matter, being of so great importance. During which time the duke of Yorke, although he and the king were both lodged in the palace of Westminster; yet would he not for anie pæters or request once visit the king, till some conclusion were taken in this matter: saving, that he was subiect to no man, but only to God, vnder whose mercie none here superiour but he. The king of Scots, partlie incouraged thorough the ciuill discord here in England, and partlie for the displeasure which he had conceived for the death of Edmund duke of Summerset his mothers brother, this yeare besieged the castell of Roxburgh: and by the breaking of a bombard, as the same was shot off against the castell, he chanced to be slaine. Yet the Scots left not off their enterprise, assaulting the castell till they gat it, and then defended it a long time after, till Richard duke of Gloucester was it againe, and rased it.

After long debating of the matter, and deliberate consultation amongst the pæres, prelates, and commons, vpon the vigill of All saints, it was concluded: for so much as king Henrie had bene taken as king by the space of thirtie and eight yeares and moze, that he should inioy the name and title of king, and haue possession of the realme during his naturall life. And if he either died, or resigned, or forfeited the same, by breaking or going against anie point of this concord, then the said crowne & authoritie roiall should immediatlie be deuoluted and come to the duke of Yorke, if he then liued; or else to the next heire of his linage. And that the duke of Yorke from thence forth should be protectoz and regent of the land. ¶ This was the determination of the parlement to & fro, tending to peace betwene the king & the duke (which was ratified accordingle) as by the articles insuing both appeare.

The articles betwixt king Henrie and the duke of Yorke.

Blessed be Iesu, in whose hands and bountie resteth and is the peace and unitie betwixt princes, and the weale of euerie realme: by whose direction (I know) agreed it is, appointed, and accorded as followeth, betwixt the most high and most mightie prince king Henrie the first king of England and of France, and lord of Ireland, on the one partie, and the right high & mightie prince Richard Plantagenet duke of Yorke on the other partie: vpon certeine matters of variance moued betwixt them, and especiallie vpon the claime and title vnto the crownes of England and of France, and roiall power, estate, and dignitie appertaining to the same, and lordship of Ireland, opened, shewed, and declared by the said duke, before all the lords spirituall and temporall, being in this present parlement.

First, where the said Richard duke of Yorke hath declared and opened (as is aboue said) title & claime in maner as followeth.

That the right noble and worthy prince, Henrie king of England the third had issue, and lawfullie got Edward the first begotten sonne, borne at Westminster, the fifteenth kalends of Iulie, in the yeare of our Lord 1239, & Edmund his second sonne which was borne on St. Marcells daie, the yere 1200, the which Edward, after the death of king Henrie his father, intituled & called king Edward the first, had issue, Edward his first begotten sonne, called (after the deceasse of his father) king Edward the second, the which had issue, Edward the third; which Edward the third had issue, Edward prince of Wales; William of Hatfield his second sonne; Lionell the third, duke of Clarence; John of Cant fourth, duke of Lancaster; Edmund of Langley fifth, duke of Yorke; Thomas of Woodstocke first, duke of Gloucester; and William of Windsor; seauenty.

The said Edward prince of Wales, which died in the life time of his father, had issue Richard, which succeeded Edward the third his grandfere; Richard died without issue; William of Hatfield the second sonne of Edward the third, died without issue; Lionell the third sonne of Edward the third, duke of Clarence, had issue Philip his daughter and heire, which was coupled in matrimonie vnto Edmund Mortimer earle of March, and had issue Roger Mortimer earle of March his sonne and heire; which Roger had issue of Edmund erle of March, Roger Mortimer, Anne, Elianor; which Edmund, Roger, and Elianor died without issue.

And the said Anne coupled in matrimonie to Richard earle of Cambridge, the sonne of Edmund of Langley, the first sonne of Henrie the third, and had issue Richard Plantagenet, commonlie called duke of Yorke; John of Cant, the fourth sonne of Edward, and the younger brother of the said Lionell, had issue Henrie earle of Derby, who incontinentlie after that king Richard resigned the crownes of the realmes realmes and lordship of Ireland, but righteously entered vpon the same, then being aliue Edmund Mortimer earle of March, sonne to Roger Mortimer earle of March, sonne and heire of the said Philip, daughter and heire of the said Lionell, the third sonne of the said king Edward the third, to the which Edmund the right and title of the said crownes and lordship by law and custome belonged. To the which Richard duke of Yorke, as sonne to Anne daughter to Roger Mortimer earle of March, sonne and heire of the said Philip, daughter and heire of the said Lionell, the third sonne of king Edward the third, the right, title, dignitie roiall, and estate of the crownes of the realmes of England and France, and the lordship of Ireland pertaineth and belongeth afore anie issue of the said John of Gaunt, the fourth sonne of the same king Edward.

The said king notwithstanding, and without prejudice of the said Richard duke of Poike, tenderlie desiring the wealth, rest, and prosperitie of this land, and to set apart all that might be trouble to the same, and considering the possession of the said king Henrie the first, and that he hath for his time bene named, taken, and reputed for king of England and of France, and lord of Ireland, is contented, agreed, and consenteth, that he be had, reputed, and taken for king of England and France, with the roiall estate, dignitie, and preheminance belonging thereunto, and lord of Ireland during his naturall life. And for that time, the said duke, without hurt or prejudice of his said right, and title, shall take, enjoy, this, and honour him for his Sovereigne lord.

Item, the said Richard duke of Yorke, shall promise and bind him by his solemne oth, in maner and forme as followeth.

In the name of God Amen: I Richard duke of Yorke, promise and sweare by the faith and truth that I owe to almightie God, that I shall neuer consent, procure, or stirre, breake, or imbreake, in yssue or apert, nether (as much as in me is) shall suffer to be done, consented, procured, or stirred, ante thing that may found to the abdigement of the naturall life of king Henrie the first, or to the hurt or diminishing of his reigne or dignitie roiall, by violence, or anie other waie, against his freedome or libertie: but if any person or persons would do or presume ante thing to the contrarie, I shall with all my might and power withstand it, and make it to be withstood, as far as my power will stretch thereinto, so helpe me God and his holie euangelists.

Item, Edward earle of March, and Edmund earle of Rutland, sonnes of the said duke of Yorke, shall make like oth.

Item, it is accorded, appointed, and agreed, that the said Richard duke of Yorke, shall be called and reported from henceforth, verie and rightfull heire to the crownes, roiall estate, dignitie and lordship above said; and after the deceasse of the said king Henric, or then he will laie from him the said crownes, estate, dignitie, and lordship, the said duke and his heires shall immediatlie succede to the said crownes, roiall estate, dignitie and lordship.

Item, the said Richard duke of Yorke, shall have by authority of this present parliament, castles, manors, lands, and tenements, with the wards, marriages, reliefs, services, fines, amercements, offices, advowsons, fees, and other appurtenances to them belonging, what soever they be, to the pecunie value of ten thousand marks, over all charges and reprises, whereof five thousand marks shall be to his owne state, three thousand five hundred marks to Edward his first begotten sonne earle of March for his estate, and one thousand pounds to Edmund earle of Rutland his second sonne for his pecunie sustentation, in such consideration and such intent as shall be declared by the lords of the kings counsell.

Item, if anie person or persons imagine or compasse the death of the said duke, and thereof probable be attainted of open deed done by folkes of other condition, that it be deemed & adiudged high treason.

Item, for the more establishing of the said accord, it is appointed and consented, that the lordes spirituall and tempozall, being in this present parlement, shall make othe, to accept, take, worship, and repute the said Richard duke of Yorke and his heires, as aboue is rehearsed, and keepe, obserue, and strengthen (in as much as apperteineth vnto them) all the things abouesaid, and resist to their power, all them that would presume the contrarie, according to their estates and degrees.

Item, the said Richard duke of Yorke, earles of March, and Rutland, shall permit and make othe to helpe, aid, and defende the said lordes, and euerie of them, againstt all those that will quarell, or anie thing attempt againstt the said lordes, or anie of them, by occasion of agreement or consenting to the said accord, or assistance giuing to the duke and earles, or anie of them.

Item, it is agreed and appointed, that this accord, and euerie article thereof, be opened and notified by the kings letters patents, or otherwise, at such times and places, and in manner as it shall be thought expedient to the said Richard duke of Yorke, with the aduise of the lords of the kings counsell. The king vnderstandeth certeinlie the said title of the said Richard duke of Yorke, iust, lawfull, and sufficient, by the aduise and assent of the lords spirituall and temporall, and the commons in this parlement assembled; and by authoritie of the same parlement declareth, approueth, ratifieth, confirmeth, and accepteth the said title, iust, good, lawfull, and true, and thereunto giueth his assent and agrément of his free will and libertie.

And ouer that, by the said aduise and authoritie declareth, intituleth, calleth, establisheth, affirmeth, reputeth the said Richard duke of Yorke, verie true and rightfull heire to the crownes, roiall estate, and dignitie of the realmes of England and of France, and of the lordshipp of Ireland aforesaid; and that according to the woorthip and reuerence that thereto belongeth, he be taken, accepted and reputed, in woorthship & reuerence, by all the states of the said realme of England, and of all his subiects thereof; saving and ordaining by the same authoritie, the king to haue the said crownes, realme, roiall estate, dignitie, and preheminance of the same, and the said lordshipp of Ireland during his life naturall.

And further more, by the same adulle and anhostie willeth, consenteth, and agreeth, that after his deceasse, or when it shall please his hignesse to laie from him the said crownes, estate, dignittie, and lordship, the said Richard duke of Yorke and his betres shall immediate take him in the said crownes, roiall estate, dignittie, and worshop, and them then have and intioi: anie ad of parlement, statute, or ordinance, or other thing to the contrarie made, or interruption, or discontinuance of possession norwith-standing.

And moreover, by the said aduile and authoritie, established, granted, confirmeth, approueth, ratifieth, and accepteth the said accord, and all thyngs therein contained, and thereunto truelle and absolute assenteth, agreeth; and by the same aduile and authoritie doth denie and establisheth, that if anie person or persons (imagine or) compass the death of the said duke, or probable be affainted of open deed done by folles of that condition, that it be denie and aduised high treason.

And furthermore ordeineth and establissheth by the said aduise and authoritie, that all statutes, ordinaunces, and acts of parlement, made in the time of the said king Henrie the fourth, by the which he and the heires of his boote, comming of Henrie late king of England the first, the sonne and heire of the said king Henrie the fourth, and the heires of king Henrie the first, were or be inheritable to the said crownes and realmes, or to the heritage of the same, be annulled, repealed, damned, cancelled, void, and of none effect.

And ouer this, the king by the said aduise, assent and authoritie, ordeineth and establissheth, that all other acts and statutes made afore this time by act of parlement, not repealed or annulled by like authoritie, or other wise void, be in full force, effect, and vertue, as they were afore the making of these ordinaunces; and that no letters patents, rotall of record, nor acts iudiciall, made or done afore this time not repealed, reuerced, ne other wise void by law, be preiudiced or hurt by this present act.]

This agreement put in articles, was ingrossed, sealed, and sworne vnto by the two parties, and also enacted in the parlement. For to whereof the king, having in his companie the duke of Yorke, rood to the cathedraall church of saint Paule in London, and there on the day of All saints with the crowne on his head went solemnelie in procession, and was lodged a good space after in the bishops palace, nere to the said church. And upon the saturdaye next insuing, Richard duke of Yorke was by sound of trumpet solemnelie proclaimed heire apparant to the crowne of England, and protectour of the realme. After this, the parlement kept at Couentrie the last yeare, was declared to be a diuelish counsell, and onelie had for destruction of the nobilitie, and was indeed no lawfull parlement: because they which were returned, were neuer elected according to the due order of the law, but secretlie named by them which desired rather the destruction than the advancement of the common-wealth. When these agreements were enacted, the king dissolved his parlement, which was the last parlement that ever he ended.

The duke of Yorke, well knowing that the queene would spurne against all this, caused both hir and hir sonne to be sent for by the king. But she as wont rather to rule, than to be ruled, and thereto counselled by the dukes of Excester and Summerfet, not onelie denied to come, but also assembled a great armie, intending to take the king by fine force out of the lords hands. The protectour in London, having knowledge of all these doings, assigned the duke of Norfolk, and erle of Warwike his trustie friends to be about the king, while he with the earles of Salisburie and Rutland, and a convenient number, departed out of London the second date of Decembur northward, and appointed the erle of March his eldest sonne to follow him with all his power. The duke came to his castell of Sandall beside Wakefield on Christmas eve, and there began to make muster of his tenants and friends. The queene therof aduertised, determined to cope with him per his succour were come.

And he, having in his companie the prince hir sonne, the dukes of Excester and Summerfet, the erle of Devonshire, the lord Clifford, the lord Roos, and in effect all the lords of the north parts, with eightene thousand men, or (as some write) two and twentie thousand, marched from Yorke to Wakefield, and had balle to the duke, even before his castell gates. He having with him not fullie five thousand persons, contrarie to the minds of his faithfull counsellors, would needs issue forth to fight with his enemies. The duke of Summerfet and the queenes part, casting upon their most advantage, appointed the lord Clifford to lie in one scale, and the erle of Warwike in another, and the duke with other to keepe the maine battell. The duke of Yorke with his people descended downe the hill in good order and arraie, and was suffered to passe on towards the maine battell.

But when he was in the plaine field betwene his castell and the towne of Wakefield, he was inuironed on euerie side, like fish in a net, so that though he fought manfullie, yet was he within halfe an houre slaine and dead, and his whole armie discomfited: with him died of his trustie friends, his two ballard vnckles, sir John and sir Hugh Spottismers, sir Dauid Hall, sir Hugh Hastings, sir Thomas Beuill, William and Thomas Apurre, both brethren; and two thousand and eight hundred others, whereof manie were young gentlemen, and heires of great parentage in the south parts, whose kin reuenged their deaths within foure moneths next, as after shall appeare.

In this conflict was wounded and taken prisoner, Richard erle of Salisburie, sir Richard Limbryke, Rafe Stanleie, John Harlow, capteine Hansson, and diuerse others. The lord Clifford, perceiving where the erle of Rutland was conueited out of the field (by one of his fathers chapleins, and scholemaster to the same erle) and overtaking him, stabbed him to the heart with a dagger as he kneeled afore him. This erle was but a child at that time of twelue yeares of age, whome neither his tender yeares, nor dolorous countenance, with holding vp both his hands for mercie (for his speech was gone for feare) could moue the cruell heart of the lord Clifford to take pittie vpon him, so that he was noted of great infamie for that his vnnmercifull murder vpon that young gentleman.

But the same lord Clifford not satisfied herewith, came to the place where the dead corpe of the duke of Yorke lay, caused his head to be stricken off, and set on it a crowne of paper, fixed it on a pole, and presented it to the queene, not lieng farre from the field, in great despite, at which great reioysing was shewed: but they laughed then that shortly after lamented, and were glad then of other mens deaths that knew not their owne to be so nere at hand. Some wrote that the duke was taken alive, and in derision caused to stand vpon a molehill, on whose head they put a garland in stead of a crowne, which they had fashioned and made of sedges or bulrushes; and having so crowned him with that garland, they kneeled downe afore him (as the Jewes did vnto Christ) in scoone, saying to him; Haile king without rule, haile king without heritage, haile duke and prince without people or possessions. And at length having thus scorned him with these and diuers other the like despitefull words, they stroke off his head, which (as we haue heard) they presented to the queene.

Spanie demaunded that this miserable end chanced to the duke of Yorke, as a due punishment for breaking his oth of allegiaunce vnto his soueraigne lord king Henrie: but others held him discharged thereof, because he obtained a dispensation from the pope, by such suggestion as his procurators made vnto him, whereby the same oth was adindged void, as that which was reuiled and abused, to the preiudice of himselfe, and disheriting of all his posteritie. After this victorie by the queene, the erle of Salisburie and all the prisoners were sent to Pomfret, and there beheaded, whose heads (together with the duke of Yorkes head) were conueied to Yorke, and there set on poles ouer the gate of the citie, in despite of them and their linage. The erle of March, now after the death of his father, herie duke of Yorke, lieng at Glocester, was wonderfullie amazed, when the sorrowfull newes of these mishaps came vnto him: but after after comfort giuen to him by his faithfull louers and assured allies, he remoued to Shrewesburie, declaring to the inhabitants of that towne, and to them of the other townes in those parties the murder of his father, the icopardie of himselfe, and the present ruine of the common-wealth.

The people on the marches of Wales, for the fauour which they bare to the Mortimers linage, more gladlie offered him their aid and assistance than he could desire the same; so that he had incontinentlie a puissant armie, to the number of thre and twentie thousand, ready to go against the queene, and the murderers of his father. But when he was setting forward, newes was brought to him, that Jasper earle of Penbrooke halfe brother to king Henrie, and James Butler earle of Ormonde and Wiltshire, had assembled a great number of Welsh and Irish people to take him: he here with quickned, retired backe and met with his enemies in a faire plaine, nere to Mortimers crosse, not far from Hereford east, on Candlemasse daie in the morning. At which time the sunne (as some write) appeared to the earle of March like thre sunnes, and suddenlie ioined altogether in one. Upon which sight he took such courage, that he fiercelie setting on his enemies, put them to flight: and for this cause men imagined, that he gaue the sunne in his full brightnesse for his badge or cognisance. Of his enemies were left dead on the ground thre thousand and eight hundred.

The earles of Penbrooke and Wiltshire fled, but sir Owen Teuther father to the said earle of Penbrooke (which Owen had married king Henries mother, as ye haue heard before) with David Floyd, Morgan ap Ikeneth, and diuerse other were taken, and beheaded at Hereford. The queene neuertheless encouraged by hir late victorie, with a multitude of northerne people, marched toward London, intending to bind all that had bene ordeined in the last parlement. These northerne people, after they were once passed ouer the riuer of Trent, spoiled and wasted the countrie afoze them, in manner as if they had bene in the land of forren enemies. At length, they approached to saint Albons, hearing that the duke of Northfolke, and the earle of Warwicke, with other whome the duke of Poike had left to gouerne the king in his absence, had (by the kings assent) assembled a great host, and were incamped nere to that towne.

Those northerne lords and other that were with the queene, made forward, and entring into S. Albons, meant to passe through the towne, and so to coape with their enemies; but finding a fozt of archers ranged nere to the great crosse in the market place, to defend their passage, they were receiued with such a storme of arrowes, which came sieng about their eares as thicke as haille, that they were quicklie repellid backe, and with losse of men to retire in hast vnto the west end of the towne; where, by a lane that leadeth northwards vp to saint Peters street, they made their entrie, and had there also a sharpe encounter against certaine bands of the kings people. But after great slaughter on both parts, they got through, and vpon the heath that lieth at the north end of the towne, called Barnard heath, they had a farre greater conflict with foure or fife thousand of the kings armie, that seemed as they had bene anant couriers.

Wherof gaue the onset so fiercelie at the beginning, that the victorie rested doubtfull a certaine time, so that if the cafferne and southerne men had continued as they began, the field had bene theirs; but after they had stood to it a pretie while, and perceiued none of their fellows from the great armie to come and assist them, they began to faint, and turning their backes, fled amaine ouer hedge and ditch, through thicke and thin, woods and bushes, seeking so to escape the hands of their cruell enemies that followed them with eger minds, to make slaughter vpon them, namely, the northerners pickers, now in the chase pursued most hotlie, and bare downe manie, and more had done, if the night comming vpon, had not staid them.

When the daie was closed, those that were about the king (in number a twentie thousand) hearing how euill their fellows had sped, began bitterlie to despair of the victorie, and so fell without anie long tarriance to running afoate. By reason whereof, the nobles that were about the king, perceiuing how the game went, and withall saw no comfort in the king, but rather a good will and affection towards the contrarie part, they withdrew also, leauing the king accompanied with the lord Bonneville, sir Thomas Kirrell of Kent, which vpon assurance of the kings promise, tarried still with him, and fled not. But their trust deceiued them, for at the queenes departing from saint Albons, they were both beheaded; though contrarie to the mind and promise of hir husband, Sir Thomas Thorpe, baron of the exchequer, was also beheaded the same daie, at Highgate, by the commands of Kent.

Such was the successe of this second battell fought at S. Albons, vpon Shrouetuesdaie, the seventeenth of Februarie, in which were slaine thre and twentie hundred men, of whom no noble man is remembred, saue sir John Graie, which the same daie was made knight, with twelue other, at the village of Colneie. Now after that the noble men and other were fled, and the king left in maner alone without anie power of men to guard his person, he was counselled by an esquier called Thomas How, a man well languaged, and well sene in the lawes, to send some conuenient messenger to the northerne lords, aduertising them, that he would now gladlie come vnto them (whome he knew to be his verie friends, and had assembled themselves together for his seruice) to the end he might remaine with them, as before he had remained vnder the gouernement of the southerne lords.

According to the aduise and counsell of this esquier, the king thought it good to send vnto them, and withall appointed the same esquier to beare the message, who first went and declared the same vnto the earle of Northumberland, and returning backe to the king, brought certaine lords with him, who conueied the king first vnto the lord Cliffords tent, that stood next to the place where the kings people had incamped. This done, they went and brought the queene and hir sonne prince Edward vnto his presence, whome he tofullie receiued, embracing and kissing them in most louing wise, and yelding hartie thanks to almightie God, whome it had pleased thus to strengthen the forces of the northerne men, to restore his dearelie beloued and orialie sonne againe into his possession. Thus was the queene fortunate in hir two battels, but unfortunate was the king in all his enterprizes: for where his person was present, the victorie still fled from him to the contrarie part. The queene caused the king to vnto her sonne prince Edward knight, with thirtie other persons, which the day before fought on hir side against his part.

This done, they went to the abbey, where of the abbat and monks they were receiued with hymnes and songs, and so brought to the high altar, and after to the shrine, and so to the chamber in which the king was wont to lodge. The abbat made sute that order might be taken to restraine the northerne men from spoiling the towne: and proclamation indeed was made to that effect, but it auailed not: for they maintained, that the spoile of things was granted them by couenant, after they were once passed ouer the riuer of Trent: and so not regarding anie proclamation or other commandement, they spared nothing that they could laie hands vpon, if the same were meet for them to carie awaie. The queene, hauing thus got the victorie, sent to the maior of London, commanding him without delaie to send certeine carts, laden with Lenton vittels, for the refreshing of hir and hir armie. The maior incontinentlie caused carts to be laden, and would haue sent them forward; but the commons of the cite would not suffer them to passe, but staied them at Crispelgate, notwithstanding the maior did what he could by gentle persuations to quiet them.

During which controuersie, diuerse of the northerne horsemen, came and robbed in the suburbs of the cite, and would haue entred at Crispelgate; but they were repelled by the commoners, and three of them slaine. Whereupon, the maior sent the recorder to Barnet to the kings counsell there, to excuse the matter; and the duchess of Bedford, the ladie Scales, with diuerse fathers of the spiritualtie, went to the queene, to asswage hir displeasure conceived against the cite. The queene at this humble request, by aduise of hir counsell, appointed certeine lords and knights, with foure hundred tall persons, to ride to the cite, and there to view and see the demeanour and disposition of the people: and diuerse aldermen were appointed to meet them at Barnet, and to conuie them to London. But what man purpose, God disposeth. All these deuises were shortly altered to another forme, because true report came not onelie to the queene, but also to the cite; that the earle of March, hauing vanquished the earles of Denbroke and Gloucestre, had met with the earle of Warwicke (after this last battell at saint Albons) at Chipping Norton by Cotfold; and that they with both their powers were coming toward London. The queene hauing little trust in Essex, and lesse in Kent, but least of all in London, with hir husband and sonne, departed from saint Albons, into the north countrie, where the foundation of hir aid and refuge onelie rested.

The duchess of Yorke, seeing hir husband and sonne slaine, and not knowing what should succeed of hir eldest sonnes chance, sent hir two yonger sonnes, George and Richard, ouer the sea, to the cite of Trecht in Almaine, where they were of Philip duke of Burgonie well receiued; and so remained there, till hir brother Edward had got the crowne and gouernement of the realme. The earles of March and Warwicke, hauing perfect knowlege that the king and queene, with their adherents, were departed from saint Albons, rode straight to London, entring there with a great number of men of warre, the first weeke of Lent. Whose coming thither was no sooner knowne, but that the people resorted out of Kent, Essex, and other the counties adioining, in great numbers, to see, aid, and comfort this lustie prince and flower of chualtrie, in whome the hope of their ioy and trust of their quietnesse onelie consisted.

This prudent yong prince, minding to take time when time serued, called a great counsell, both of the lords spiritual and temporall, and to them repeated the title and right that he had to the crowne, rehearsing also the articles concluded betwene king Henrie and his father, by their writings signed and sealed, and also confirmed by act of parlement; the breaches whereof he neither forgot, nor leste vndeclared. After the lords had considered of this matter, they determined by authoritie of the said counsell, that because king Henrie had done contrarie to the ordinances in the last parlement concluded; and was insufficient of himselfe to rule the realme, he was therefore to be depaured of all kinglie estate: and incontinentlie was Edward earle of March, sonne and heire to Richard duke of Yorke, by the lords in the said counsell assembled, named, elected, and admitted for king and gouernour of the realme.

On which date, the people of the earles part, being in their muster in S. Johns field, and a great number of the substantiall citizens there assembled, to behold their order; the lord Fauconbridge, who toke the musters, wiselie anon declared to the people the offenses and breaches of the late agreement, committed by king Henrie the first; and demanded of the people, whether they would haue him to rule and reigne anie longer ouer them? To whome they with whole voice answered; Naie, naie. Then he asked them, if they would serue, loue, honour, and obeye the erle of March, as their onlie king and soueraigne lord? To which question they answered; Yea, yea: crying (King Edward) with manie great shouts & clapping of hands in assent and gladnesse of the same.

The lords were shortly aduertised of the louing consent which the commons franklie and frelie had giuen. Whereupon incontinentlie, they all with a conuenient number of the most substantiall commons repaired to the erle at Baimards castell, making iust and true report of their election and admission, and the louing assent of the commons. The earle, after long pausing, first thanked God of his great grace and benefit towards him shewed; then the lords and commons for their fauour and fidelitie: notwithstanding, like a wise prince, he alleged his insufficiencie for so great a toome and weightie burthen, as lacke of knowlege, want of experience, and diuerse other qualities to a gouernour appertaining. But yet in conclusion, being perswaded by the archbishop of Canturburie, the bishop of Excester, and other lords then present, he agreed to their petition, and toke vpon him the charge of the kingdome, as forfeited to him by breach of the couenants established in parlement.

Thus farre touching the tragicall state of this land vnder the rent regiment of king Henrie, who (besides the bare title of roialtie and naked name of king) had little appertaining to the port of a prince. For whereas the dignitie of princedom standeth in soueraintie; there were of his nobles that imbecilled his prerogative by sundrie practices, speciallie by maine force; as seeking either to suppress, or to erile, or to obscure, or to make him a waite: otherwise what should be the meaning of all those foughen fields from time to time, most miserable falling out both to prince, pære, and people? As at saint Albons, at Bloreheath, at Northampton, at Banberie, at Barnet, & at Wakefield; to the effusion of much blood, and pulling on of manie a plague, which otherwise might haue bene auoided. All which battels, together with those that were tried betwene Edward the fourth, after his inthronization; and Henrie the first after his extermination (as at Erham, Doncaster, and Tewkesburie) are remembered by Anglorum praelia in good order of pithie poetrie, as followeth:

But now before we proceede any further, sith the reigne of king Henrie maie seme here to take end, we will specifie some such learned men as liued in his time. John Leland, surnamed the elder (in respect of the other John Leland, that painefull antiquarie of our time) wrote diuerse treatises, for the instruction of grammarians; John Hainton, a Carmelit or white frier (as they called them) of Lincoln; Robert Colman, a Franciscane frier of Norwich; and chancellor of the vniuersitie of Orenford; William White a priest of Kent, professing the doctrine of Wickliffe, and forsaking the order of the Romane church, married a wife, but continued his office of preaching, till at length, in the yeare 1428, he was apprehended, and by William bishop of Norwich, and the doctors of the friers mendicants, charged with thirtie articles, which he maintained, contrary to the doctrine of the Romane church, and in September the same yeare suffered death by fire.

Alexander Carpenter, a learned man, set forth a booke called Destructorium vitiourum, wherein he inuicteth against the prelates of the church of that time, for their crueltie vsed, in persecuting the poore and godlie christians; Richard Kendall, an excellent grammarian; John Bate, warden of the white friers in Poerke, but borne in the borders of Wales, an excellent philosopher, and a diuine, he was also sene in the Greke tong, a thing rare in those daies; Peter Bassett, esquier of the priue chamber to king Henrie the sixt, whose life he wrote; John Hole a priest, that wrote the life of saint Malburgh, daughter to one Richard, a noble man of this realme of England, which Malburgh (as he affirmeth) builded our ladie church in Antwerpe; Thomas Imaelit, a monke of Sion; Walter Hilton, a Chartreux monke also of Shene, either of those wrote certeine treatises full of superstition, as Iohn Bale noteth.

Thomas Walden so called of the towne where he was borne, but his fathers surname was Petter, a white frier of London, and the thre and twentieth prouinciall gouernour of his order, a man vndoubtedlie learned, and thoroughlie furnished with cunning of the scholes, but a sore enemie to them that professed the doctrine of Wickliffe, writing sundrie great volumes and treatises against them, he died at Rome in Noymandie, the second of Nouember, in the yeare one thousand foure hundred and thirtie; Richard Allerton, borne in Lancashire, wrote diuerse treatises of diuinitie; Peter Clarke, a student in Orenford, and a defender of Wickliffes doctrine, whereupon when he feared persecution here in England, he fled into Boheme, but yet at length he was apprehended by the imperialists, and died for it, as some write, but in what order, is not expressed.

Robert Hounslow, a religious man of an house in Hounslow beside London, whereof he took his surname; Thomas Walsingham, borne in Norfolk, in a towne there of the same name, but professed a monke in the abbeie of saint Albons, a diligent historiographer; John Wilete, a white frier of Permouth, but a student in Cambridge, and proued an excellent diuine; Richard Fleming, a doctor of diuinitie in Orenford, of whome more at large before, pag. 624. John Low borne in Worcester-shire, an Augustine frier, a doctor of diuinitie, and prouinciall in England of his order, and by king Henrie the first, made first bishop of saint Asaph, and after removed from thence to Rochester; Thomas Kingsted the younger, not the same that was bishop, but a doctor of the law, and vicar of Spiltenhall in Suff-folke, a notable preacher, and wrote diuerse treatises.

John Felton, a doctor of diuinitie of Wadgdales college in Orenford; Nicholas Botleham, a Carmelit frier borne in Cambridgeshire, and student first in the vniuersitie of Cambridge, and after in Paris, where he proceeded doctor of diuinitie; Thomas Kuddburne, a monke of Winchester, and an historiographer; John Holbrooke, borne in Surrie, a great philosopher, and well sene in the mathematicks; Peter Paine, an earnest professor of Wickliffes doctrine, and fearing persecution here in England, fled into Boheme, where he remained in great estimation for his great learning & no lesse wisdom; Nicholas Wpton, a ciuillian, wrote of heraldrie, of colours in armorie, and of the dutie of chualrie; William Beckeleie, a Carmelit frier of Sandwiche, & warden of the house there, a diuine, and possessed degree of schole in Cambridge; John Topp, a Carmelit frier of Norwich.

John Capgrauie borne in Kent, an Augustine frier, proceeded doctor of diuinitie in Orenford, was admitted prouinciall of his order, and proued (with out controuersie) the best learned of any of that order of friers here in England, as Iohn Bale affirmeth, he wrote manie notable volumes, and finally departed this life at Lin in Norfolk, the twelfth of August, in the yeare 1464, which was in the fourth yeare of king Edward the fourth; Humfre duke of Gloucester, earle of Penbrooke, and lord chamberlaine of England, also protector of the realme, during the minority of his nephue king Henrie the first, was both a great fauourer of learned men, and also verie well learned himselfe, namelie in astrologie, where of (beside other things) he wrote a speciall treatise intituled, Tabula directionum.

John Wethamsted, otherwise called Frumentarius, was abbat of saint Albons, and highlie in fauor with the good duke of Gloucester last remembred, he wrote diuerse treatises, and among others, a booke as it were of the records of things, chancing whilest he was abbat, which booke I haue sene, and partlie in some parcell of this kings time haue also followed; Roger Onleie, borne in the west countrie (as Bale thinketh) was accused of treason, for practising with the ladie Cleane Cobham, by sorcery to make the king auaie, and was thereof condemned, and died for it, though he were innocent thereof, as some haue thought, he wrote a treatise intituled, Contra vulgi superstitiones, also another De sua innocentia; Nicholas Cantlow, a Welshman borne, descended of an ancient familie in Southwales, as by Bale it should appeare, he became a frier Carmelit in Wiltow; Henrie Wingham, a Carmelit frier of Norwich, a notable diuine, a great preacher, and wrote also sundrie treatises of diuinitie.

John Lidgate, a monke of Wurie, an excellent poet, and chiefe in his time in that facultie, of all other that practised the same within this land, he travelled thorough France and Italie to learne the languages and sciences, how greatlie he posited in attaining to knowledge, the bookes which he wrote do sufficientlie testifie; Nicholas Hordresham, an excellent physician; John Blackeneie, a religious man, of the order of the Trinitie intituled, De redemptione captiuorum, and prior of an house of the same order, at Ingham in Norfolk, he was surnamed Blackeneie, of the towne where he was borne; Thomas Beckington, bishop of Bath, wrote against the law Salique, by which law the Frenchmen would exclude the princes of this realme from their title vnto the crowne of France; John Waringham, a Carmelite frier of Gipestwich in Suffolke; David Bois, borne in Wales, and a frier Carmelit, prolected in Glocester, a doctor of diuinitie.

John Brome, an Augustine frier; Michaell Triggurie, a Cornishman bozne, whome for his excellencie and learning, king Henrie the first appointed to be gouernour of that schole of vniuersitie, which he instituted in the cite of Caen in Normandie, after he had brought it vnder his subiection; John Amundsham, a monke of the Chartreux order; John Kenningale, a Carmelit frier of Norwich; Peter De sancta fide, a Carmelit also of Norwich; Reginald Pecocke, bishop of Chichester, of whome ye haue heard before, he was bozne in Wales, and student in a small college in Drenford, where he proceeded doctor of diuinitie, he wrote manie treatises touching the christian religion; John surnamed Barie of the towne where he was bozne, an Augustine frier in the towne of Clare in Suffolke.

Robert Fleming, a man perfect in the Greeke and Latine tong [among whose works some haue bene sene vnder these titles: namely, Lucubratiomum Tiburtinarum lib. 1. a dictionarie in Greeke and Latine, and a worke in verse of sundrie kinds, this man was of most fame in the yeare of our Lord 1470, which was in the tenth yeare of Edward the fourth, though he were not obscure also in the daies of this Henrie the first; Thomas Gascoigne, bozne at Hunsletre in Northeshire, of that worshipfull familie of the Gascoignes there, a doctor of diuinitie, and chancellor of the vniuersitie of Drenford; William Stapilhart, bozne in Kent, but by profession a white frier in London; Robert Fimingham bozne in Northfolke a franciscan frier in Norwich; Nicholas Pontacute, an historiographer; John Chandler, chancellor of Welles; William Botoner, descended of a good houle, a knight by degree, and bozne in Bristow, verie studious in antiquities, and other sciences.

John Stow, a monke of Norwich, but student in Drenford, where he proceeded doctor of diuinitie; Thomas Langley, a monke of Hulme; Nicholas Bungeie, bozne in a towne of Northfolke of that name, wrote an historie, called Adunationes chroniconum; Henrie Beauford bishop of Winchester, base sonne to John duke of Lancasser, of whome before we haue made sufficient mention, made cardinall by pope Martine the fourth, in the yeare 1426; Adam Homlington, a Carmelit frier; William Coppinger, maister of the vniuersitie of Drenford; Thomas Stacie, an expert mathematician, and notable skillfull in astronomie; John Talangerne, a monke of Worcester; William Sutton, an astrologian; Robert Balfacke, wrote a boke intituled De militari, that is to saie, of warre or chivalrie, so that (as is thought) he was both a good souldier, and a painefull student of god letters.

Thomas Dando, a Carmelit frier of Marleburgh, he wrote the life of Alphred king of well Saxons; William Graie, bozne of the noble house of the Graies of Codnor, he went to attaine to some excellencie of learning in Italie, where he heard that noble clearkie Guarinus Veronensis read in Ferrara, he was preferred to the bishoprike of Ely, in the yeare 1454, by pope Nicholas the first, when Thomas Bourchier was translated from thence to Canturburie; John Kempe, archbishop of Yorke, and after removed from thence to Canturburie (as before ye haue heard) he was made cardinall of S. Albin, by pope Eugenie the fourth; Adam Molins (as Bale calleth him) keeper of the kings private seale, excellentlie learned, in time of the ciuill warre betwixt king Henrie, and the duke of Yorke, in which he lost his head.

Thomas Chylinden, a doctor both of the lawe ciuill and canon, became at length a monke in Canturburie; Robert Bale, surnamed the elder, excellentlie learned in the lawes of the realme, recorder of London, gathered as it were a chronicle of the customs, lawes, foundations, changes, restoring magistrats, offices, orders, and publike assemblies of the cite of London, with other matters, touching the perfect description of the same cite; he wrote other works also touching the state of the same cite, and the acts of king Edward the third; he departed this life in the yeare of our Lord 1461, euen about the beginning of the reigne of king Edward the fourth, vnto whome we will now againe returne.

Thus farre the tragicall historie of Henrie the sixth deprived of his roialtie.

Edward the fourth earle of March, sonne and heire to Richard duke of Yorke.

Anno Regni, 1.

The earle of March returned upon his king.

After that this prince Edward earle of March had taken vpon him the gouernement of this realme of England (as before ye haue heard) the next morow ing, being the fourth of March, he rode to the church of saint Paule, and there offered: and after Te Deum song, with great solemnitie he was conueied to Westminster, and there set in the hall with the scepter roiall in his hand, whereto people in great numbers assembled. His claim declared to the crowne was declared to be by two maner of waies, the first, as sonne and heire to duke Richard his father, right inheritor to the same; the second, by authoritie of parlement, and forseiture committed by king Henrie. Whereupon it was againe demanded of the commons, if they would admit and take the said erle as their prince and soueraigne lord, which all with one voice cried, Yea, yea.

This

The proclamation
king.

This part thus plaied, he entered into Westminster church under a canopie with solemne procession, and there as king offered; and herewith taking the homages of all the nobles there present, he returned by water to London, and was lodged in the bishops palace; and on the morrow after, he was proclaimed king by the name of Edward the fourth, throughout the citie. This was in the yeare of the world 5427, and after the birth of our Saviour 1461 after our accompt, beginning the yeare at Christmalle; but after the usual accompt of the church of England 1460, the twentieth of emperor Frederike the third; the nine and thirtieth and last of Charles the seventh French king; and first yeare of the reigne of James the third king of Scots.

Whilste these things were aduoying in the south parts, king Henrie being in the north countrie, assembled a great armie, trusting (for all this) to subdue his enemies; namely, first their chiefe ringleader the duke of Yorke was dispatched out of the waie.
But he was deceived: for out of the ded stocke sprang a branch more mightie than the stem; this Edward the fourth, a prince so highlie fauoured of the people, for his great liberalitie, clemencie, bysight dealing, and courage, that aboue all other, he with them stood in grace alone: by reason whereof, men of all ages and degrees to him dailie repaired, some offering themselves and their men to leopord their liues with him, and other plentifully gaue monie to support his charges, and to mainteine his right.

By which meanes, he gathered together a puissant armie, to the intent by battell (sithens none other wayes would serue) at once to make an end of all.
So, his armie and all things prepared, he departed out of London the twelue daie of March, and by ea-sie iournies came to the castell of Domfret, where he rested, appointing the lord Fitz Walter to keepe the passage at Ferribridge with a good number of tall men. King Henrie on the other part, hauing his armie in readinesse, committed the gouernance thereof to the duke of Summerfet, the earle of Northumberland, and the lord Clifford, as men desiring to reuenge the death of their parents, slaine at the first battell at saint Albons. These capitaines leaving king Henrie, his wife, and some, for the most safegard within the citie of Yorke, passed the riuer of Wharfe with all their power, intending to stop king Edward of his passage ouer the riuer of Aire.

And the better to bring that to passe, the lord Clifford determined to make a charge vpon them that kept the passage of Ferribridge; and so he departed with his light horsemen from the great armie on the saturday before Palmesundaie; and earlie per his enemies were aware, thus the keepers and wan the bridge. The lord Fitz Walter hearing the noise, sud-denlie rose out of his bed, and vnarmed with a pollax in his hand, thinking that it had bene but a fraie amongst his men, came downe to appease the same; but per he knew that the matter meant was slaine, and with him the bastard of Salisburie brother to the earle of Marlowe, a valiant young gentleman, and of great audacitie.

When the earle of Marlowe was informed hereof, like a man desperat, he mounted on his hacknie, and hasted puffing and blowing to king Edward, saying; Sir, I praye God haue mercie of their soules, which in the beginning of your enterprisse haue lost their liues. And because I see no succors of the world but in God, I remit the vengeance to him our creator and redemer. With that he alighted downe, and kissed his harte with his sword, saying; Let him see that will, for suerlie I will tarrie with him that will tarrie with me: and kissed the crosse of his sword as it were for a bow to the promise. King Edward, perceiving the courage of his trustie friend the earle of Marlowe, made proclamation, that all men which were afraid to fight, should depart: and to all those that carried the battell, he promised great rewards, with addition, that any souldier which voluntarilie would abide, and afterwards; either in or before the fight should seme to flee or turne his backe, then he that could kill him, should haue a great reward and double wages.

After this proclamation ended, the lord Fauconbridge, sith Walter Blunt, Robert Horne with the foreward, passed the riuer at Castelford, thre miles from Ferribridge, intending to haue inuironed the lord Clifford and his companie. But they being theyt of aduertised, departed in great hast toward king Henries armie; yet they met with some that they loked not for, and were so trapt per they were aware, for the lord Clifford, either for heat or paine, putting off his gorget, suddenlie with an arrow (as some saie) without an head, was striken into the throte, and im-mediatlie renoued his spirit; and the earle of Westmerlands brother, and all his companie almost were there slaine, at a place called Dintingdale, not far from Colyton. This end had the lord Clifford, which sine the earle of Rutland kneeling on his knees, whose young sonne Thomas Clifford was brought up with a shepheard in poore habit, euer in feare to be knotone, till king Henrie the seventh obtained the crostone, by whom he was restored to his name and possessions.

When this conflict was ended at Ferribridge, the lord Fauconbridge, hauing the foreward, because the duke of York was fallen sicke, valiantlie by-on Palmesundaie in the twilight set forth his armie and came to Sarton, where he might apparantlie behold the host of his aduersaries, which were accompanied thre score thousand men, and thereof aduertised king Edward, whose whole armie amounted to eight and fortie thousand six hundred and thre score persons: which incontinentlie with the earle of Marlowe set forthward, leaving the reerward under the gouernance of sir John Wenlocke, sir John Din-ham, and other. And first of all, he made proclamation, that no prisoner should be taken. So the same daie about nine of the clocke, which was the nine and twentieth daie of March, being Palmesundaie, both the hostes approached in a faire plaine field, betwene Colyton and Sarton.

When ech part perceiued other, they made a great shout; and at the same instant there fell a small hete or snow, which by violence of the wind that blew against them, was diuen into the faces of king Henries armie, so that their sight was somewhat dimmed. The lord Fauconbridge, leading his Edward's foreward, caused euerie archer under his standard to shot one sight (which before he caused them to prouide) and then made them to stand still. The northerne men feeling the shot, but by reason of the fleece, not well biewing the distance betwene them and their enemies, like forward men shot their theafe arrows as fast as they might: but all to losse, for they came short of the southerne men by thre score yards.

So their shot almost spent, the lord Fauconbridge marched forward with his archers, which not onelie shot their whole theafes, but also gathered the ar-rowes of their enemies, and let a great part flee against their first owners, and suffered a great sort of them to stand, which sore troubled the legs of the no-therne men, when the battell ioined. The earle of Northumberland and Andrew Crollop, chiefe cap-teins of king Henries backward, seeing their shot not to preuaile, hasted to ioine with their enemies, and the other part slacked not their pace. This battell was soze foughten, for hope of life was set aside on either part, & taking of prisoners proclaimed a great offense, so euerie man determined to banquish or die in the field.

This deadlie conflict continued ten houres in doubtfull state of victorie, vncerteinlie heauing and setting on both sides; but in the end, king Edward so couragiously comforted his men, that the other part was discomfited and overcome, who like men amazed, fled toward Tadcaster bridge to saue themselves, where in the mid waie is a little brooke called Coker, not verie broad, but of a great deepnesse, in which, what for hast to escape, and what for feare of their followers, a great number was drowned there. It was reported, that men aloue passed the river by on dead carcasses, and that the great river of Wharfe wherein that brooke doth run, and of all the water coming from Towton, was coloured with blood.

The chase continued all night, and the most part of the next daie, and euere the northerne men (as they saw anie aduantage) returned againe, and fought with their enemies, to the great losse of both parts. For in these two daies were slaine (as they that knew it wrote) on both parts six and thirtie thousand seven hundred threescor & sixtene persons, all Englishmen and of one nation, whereof the chiefe were the earles of Northumberland and Westmerland, the lord Wacres, and the lord Welles, sir John Penell, Andrew Trollop, Robert Horne, and manie other knights and esquires, and the earle of Denonshire was taken prisoner, but the dukes of Summerfet and Excester fled from the field and saued themselves.

After this great victorie, king Edward rode to York, where he was with all solemnitie receiued; and first he caused the heads of his father, the earle of Salisburie, and other his friends, to be taken from the gates, and to be buried with their bodies: and there he caused the earle of Denonshire, and three other to be beheaded, and set their heads in the same place. King Henrie, after he heard of the irreuerentable losse of his armie, departed incontinentlie with his wife and sonne to the towne of Berwik, and leauing the duke of Summerfet there, went into Scotland, and comming to the king of Scots, required of him and his counsell, aid, and comfort.

The young king of Scots, lamenting the miserable state of king Henrie, comforted him with faire words and friendlie promises, and assigned to him a competent pension to liue on, during his abode in Scotland. King Henrie, in recompense of this courtesie and friendship, deliuered to the king of Scots the towne of Berwik, whereof he had got possession. He faithfully supported the part of king Henrie, and concluded a mariage betwixt his sister, and the young prince of Wales, but the same was neuer consummate, as after ye shall heare. When king Henrie was somewhat settled in the reime of Scotland, he sent his wife and his sonne into France to king Reiner his father, trusting by his aid and succour to assemble an armie, and once againe to reconer his right and dignitie: but he in the meane time made his aboad in Scotland, to see what waie his friends in England would studie for his restitution.

The quene being in France, did obtaine of the young French king then Lewis the eleventh, that all his husbands friends, and those of the Lancastriall band, might safelie and suerlie haue resort into anie part of the realme of France, prohibiting all other of the contrarie faction anie access, or repaire into that countrie. Thus ye haue heard, how king Henrie the first, after he had reigned eight and thirtie yeares & od moneths, was dauen out of this realme. But now leauing him with the princes of his part, consulting together in Scotland, and quene Margaret his wife gathering of men in France, I will returne where I left, to proceed with the doings of king Edward.

This young prince, hauing with prosperous success obtained so glorious a victorie in the mortall battell at Towton, and chased all his aduersaries out of the realme, or at the least waies put them to silence, returned after the maner and fashion of a triumphant conquerour, with great pompe vnto London; where according to the old custome of the realme, he called a great assemblie of persons of all degrees, and the nine & twentieth daie of June was at Westminster with solemnitie crowned and anointed king. In which yeare, this king Edward called his high court of parlement at Westminster, in the which, the state of the realme was greatly reformed, and all the statutes made in Henrie the first his time (which touched either his title or profit) were renoued.

In the same parlement, the earle of Orford was stricken in age, and his sonne and heire the lord Albrete War, either through malice of their enemies, or for that they had offended the king, were both, with diuerse of their counsellors, attainted, and put to execution; which caused John earle of Orford euere after to rebell. There were also beheaded the same time, sir Thomas Tudenham knight, William Tirell, and John Montgomerie esquires, and after them diuerse others. Also after this, he created his two younger brethren dukes, that is to saie, lord George duke of Clarence, lord Richard duke of Gloucester; and the lord John Penell, brother to Richard earle of Marwick, he first made lord Pontacute, and afterwards created him marques Pontacute.

Beside this, Henrie Bourchier brother to Thomas archbishop of Canturburie, was created earle of Essex; and William lord Fauconbridge was made earle of Kent. To this Henrie lord Bourchier, a man highly renowned in martiall feats, Richard duke of Boke long before this time had given his sister Elizabeth in marriage, of whome he begat foure sonnes, William, Thomas, John, and Henrie: the which William being a man of great industrie, wit, and prouidence in graue and weightie matters, married the ladie Anne Mowbray, descended of high parentage, whose mother Jaquet was daughter to Peter of Lutzenburgh earle of saint Paule, by the which Anne he had lord Henrie earle of Essex, one daughter named Cicile, married to Walter lord Ferrers of Chartleie, and an other called Isabell, which died unmarried.

The earle of Kent was appointed about this time to keepe the seas, being accompanied with the lord Andeleie, the lord Clinton, sir John Howard, sir Richard Malgraue, and others, to the number of ten thousand, who landing in Brittain, wan the towne of Conquet, and the Ile of Keth, and after returned.

When all things were brought in order, and framed as king Edward in maner could wish, Henrie duke of Summerfet, sir Rafe Persie, and diuerse other, being in despair of all god chance to happen vnto king Henrie, came humble, & submitted themselves vnto king Edward, whome he gentlie receiued. Which clemencie notwithstanding, both the one and the other (when time serued) revolted from king Edward, and betoke themselves to take part with Henrie, vnto whom they had bene adherents before: because they grew in hope that in the end the confederats, to whom they so closelie did cleaue both in affection and seriosnesse of labour (though they pretended a temporall renunciation of all dutie and seruice for their securitie sake) should haue the honoe of victorie against their gainstanders. But as commonlie the euents of enterprises fall out contrarie to mens expectation and hope; so came it to passe with these, whose hope though it were greene and flourie in the prosecuting of their affaires, yet in the knitting up of the matter and unluckie successe thereof, it fell out in trfall to be a flattering, a false, and a fruitlesse hope: and therefore that is a true and a wise sentence of the comiall poet well serving the purpose:

The queene returneth forth of France.

All this season was king Henrie in Scotland, and quene Margaret (being in France) found such friendship at the French kings hands, that she obtained a crue of five hundred Frenchmen, with the which she arrived in Scotland. And after that she had reposed hir selfe a time, she sailed with hir gallant band of those rustling Frenchmen toward Betocastell, and landed at Linmouth. But whether she were afraid of hir owne shadow, or that the Frenchmen cast too manie doubts, the truth is, that the whole armie returned to their ships, and a tempest rose so suddenlie, that if she had not taken a small carauell, and that with good speed arrived at Berwikke, she had bene taken at that present time by hir aduersaries.

And although fortune was so favourable to hir, yet hir companie with stormie blasts was driven on the shore before Banburgh castell, where they set their ships on fire, and fled to an Island called holie Island, where they were so assailed by the ballard Ogile, and an esquier called John Hanners, with other of king Edward friends, that manie of them were slaine, and almost foure hundred taken prisoners: but their coronell Peter Bessie, othertwise called monsieur de Clareine, happened upon a fisherman, and so came to Berwikke unto quene Margaret, who made him capteine of the castell of Alnewike, which he with his Frenchmen kept, till they were rescued.

Shortlie after, quene Margaret obtained a great companie of Scots, and other of hir friends, and so bringing hir husband with hir, and leaving hir sonne called prince Edward in the towne of Berwikke, entered Northumberland, took the castell of Banburgh, and stufed it with Scottishmen, and made thereof capteine sir Rafe Greie, and came forward toward the bishoprike of Durham. When the duke of Summerfet heard these newes, he without delaye resolted from king Edward, and fled to king Henrie. So likewise did sir Rafe Persie, and manie other of the kings friends. But manie mo followed king Henrie, in hope to get by the spoile: for his armie spoiled and burned towne, and destroyed fields where soeuer he came. King Edward aduertised of all these things, prepared an armie both by sea and land.

Some of his ships were rigged and vittelled at Lin, and some at Hull, and well furnished with soldiers were herewith set forth to the sea. Also the lord Pontacute was sent into Northumberland, there to raise the people to withstand his enemies. And after this, the king in his proper person, accompanied by his realme, came to the citie of Poike, furnished with a mightie armie, sending a great part thereof to the aid of the lord Pontacute, least peradventure he giuing too much confidence to the men of the bishoprike and Northumberland, might through them be deceived.

The Lord Pontacute then hauing such wish with him as he might trust, marched forth towards his enemies, and by the waie was encountered with the lord Hungerford, the lord Roos, sir Rafe Persie, and diuerse other, at a place called Hegelie more, where suddenlie the said lords, in maner without stroke striking, fled; and onclie sir Rafe Persie abode, and was there manfullie slaine, with diuerse other, saying then he was dying, I haue saved the bird in my bolosome: meaning that he had kept his promise and oth made to king Henrie: forgetting (belike) that he in king Henries most necessitie abandoned him, and submitted him to king Edward, as before you haue heard.

The lord Pontacute, seeing fortune thus prosperous lie leading his saile, advanced forward; & learning by espials, that king Henrie with his host was incamped in a faire plaine called Liuels, on the water of Dowill in Gramshire, halted thither, and manfullie set on his enemies in their owne campe, which like desperate persons with no small courage received him. There was a foie foughten field, and long per either part could haue anie aduantage of the other: but at length the victorie fell to the lord Pontacute, who by fine force entered the battell of his enemies, and constrained them to flie, as despairing of all succours. In which flight and chase were taken Henrie duke of Summerfet, which before was reconciled to king Edward, the lord Roos, the lord Spolins, the lord Hungerford, sir Thomas Wentworth, sir Thomas Hulleie, sir John Ffinderne, and manie other.

King Henrie was a good horseman that day, for he rode so fast auaie that no man might ouertake him; and yet he was so nere pursued, that certeine of his henchmen were taken, their horses trapped in blue veluet, and one of them had on his head the said king Henries helmet, or rather (as may be thought, & as some say) his high cap of estate, called Abacot, garnished with two rich crownes, which was presented to king Edward at Poike the fourth day of Maie. The duke of Summerfet was incontinentlie beheaded at Erham; the other lords and knights were had to Betocastell, and there (after a little respite) were likewise put to death. Beside these, diuerse other, to the number of five and twentie, were executed at Poike, and in other places.

Sir Humfrie Perell, and William Tailbois, calling himselfe earle of Rime, sir Rafe Greie, and Richard Tunstall, with diuerse other, which escaped from this battell, hid themselves in secret places: but yet they kept not themselves so close, but that they were espied and taken. The earle of Rime was apprehended in Kildesdale, and brought to Betocastell, and there beheaded. Sir humfrie Perell was taken in Holdernesse, and at Poike lost his head. After this battell called Erham field, king Edward came to the citie of Durham, and sent from thence into Northumberland the earle of Warlowke, the lord Pontacute, the lords Fauconbridge & Scrope, to recouer such castles as his enemies there held, and with force defended.

They first besieged the castell of Alnewike, which sir Peter Bessie and the Frenchmen kept, and in no wise would yield, sending for aid to the Scots. Whereupon sir George Douglas erle of Angus, with thirtene thousand chosen men, in the day time came and rescued the Frenchmen out of the castell; the Englishmen looking on, which thought it much better to haue the castell without losse of their men, than to lose both the castell and their men, considering the great power of the Scots, & their owne small number: and so they entered the castell and manned it. After this, they towe the castell of Dunstanburgh by force, and likewise the castell of Banburgh. John Gots, seruant to the duke of Summerfet, being taken within Dunstanburgh, was brought to Poike, and there beheaded.

Sir Rafe Greie being taken in Banburgh, for that he had swozne to be true to king Edward, was disgraced of the high order of knightthod at Doncaster, by cutting off his gilt spurs, renting his cote of armes, and breaking his sword ouer his head: and finally, he was there beheaded for his manifest perjury. After this, king Edward returned to Poike, where where (in despite of the earle of Northumberland, who then kept himselfe in the realme of Scotland) he created sir John Beuill, lord Montacute earle of Northumberland; and in reproofe of Jasper earle of Penbroke, he created William lord Herbert earle of the same place. But after, when by mediation of friends, the earle of Northumberland was reconciled to his fauour, he restored him to his possessions, name, and dignitie; and preferred the lord Montacute to the title of marques Montacute: so that in degree, he was aboue his elder brother the earle of Mar-10 wilke; but in power, policie, & possessions, far menier.

King Edward, though all things might seeme now to rest in good case, yet he was not negligent, in making necessarie provision against all attempts of his aduersarie king Henrie, and his partakers; and therefore raised bulwarks, and builded fortresses on eche side of his realme, where any danger was suspected for the landing of any armie. He caused also espials to be laid vpon the marches, for against Scotland, that no person should go out of the realme to king Henrie and his companie, which then sojourned in Scotland. But all the doubts of trouble that might insue by the means of king Henries being at libertie, were shortly taken away and ended: for he himselfe, whether he was past all feare; or that hee was not well established in his wits and perfect mind; or for that he could not long keepe himselfe secret, in disguised attire boldlie entred into England.

He was no sooner entred, but he was knowen and taken of one Cantlow, and brought toward the king, whom the earle of Marlowe met on the way by the kings commandement, and brought him through London to the Tower, & there he was laid in sure hold. ¶ But it is worthy the noting, which I haue obserued in a late chronographers report touching this matter; namely, that king Henrie was taken in Cletherwood, beside Bungeleie Hippingstons in Lancashire, by Thomas Talbot sonne and here to sir Edward Talbot of Basshall, and John Talbot his cousin of Colebie, which deceived him being at his dinner at Waddington hall, and brought him toward London, with his legs bound to the stirrups, where he was met by the earle of Marlowe, and arrested at Eldon; doctor Spanning deane of Windsor, doctor Scdle, and young Ellerton being in his companie, with their feet bound vnder the horse bellies were brought also to the Tower of London.]

¶ Queene Margarete, hearing of the captiuitie of hir husband, mistrusting the chance of hir sonne, all desolate and comfortlesse departed out of Scotland, and passed into France, where she remained with hir father duke Heiner, till she returned into England to hir harne, as after ye shall heare. The new duke of Summer set, and his brother John, sailed into France, where they also lived in great miserie, till duke Charles, because he was of their kin, as descended of the house of Lancaster by his mother, succoured them with a small pension, which was to them a great comfort. The earle of Penbroke went from countrie to countrie, not alwaies at his hearts ease, nor in safetie of life. [As for his dignitie and reputation, it was the more obscured, for that he had lost the title of his hono, and left at his wits end, doubtful and vn certaine in contrarie factions (as manie more) what to say or do for his best securitie. He neuer thelesse he concealed his inward discontentment, and as opportunitye of time ministered matter, so he grew in courage, and fell to practises of force (with other complices) therby to accomplish the claudie conceits of his troubled mind, being perswaded, that temporal misfortunes are, if not bitterlie auoidable, yet mansuallie to be withstood, or at least with audacitie & courage to be suffered, as the poet proprietye saith:

Tu ne cede malis, sed contra audentior ito.

King Edward being thus in more suertie of his life than before, distributed the possessions of such as took part with king Henrie the first, to his souldiers and capteins, which he thought had well deserved: and besides this, he left no other point of liberalitie vnshewed, whereby he might allure to him the benivolent minds and louing hearts of his people. And moreover, to haue the loue of all men, he shewed him selfe more familiar both with the nobilitie and commonaltie, than (as some men thought) was conuenient, either for his estate, or for his hono: notwithstanding the same liberalitie he euer after vsed. The lawes of the realme, in part he reformed, and in part he newlie augmented. The coine both of gold and siluer (which yet at this day is) he newlie deuised, and diuided; for the gold he named roials and nobles, and the siluer he called grotes and halfe grotes.

¶ In Michaelmasse terme were made sergeants at law, Thomas Pong, Nicholas Geneie, Richard Peale, Thomas Brian, Richard Wigot, John Greenfield, John Catesbie, and Gwie Fairfar, which held their feast in the bishop of Elies place in Holborne. To the which feast the maiors of London, with the aldermen, thriffes, and commons of diuers craftes being bidden, repaired. But when the maior looked to be set to keepe the state in the hall, as it had bene vsed in all places of the citie and liberties, out of the kings presence (vnknowne to the sergeants and against their wils, as they said) the lord Graie of Arthen then tresuroz of England was there placed, Wherevpon the maiors, aldermen, and commons departed home, and the maiors made all the aldermen to dine with him. Holobett he and all the citizens were greatlie displeased that he was so dealt with, and the new sergeants and others were right soie therefore, and had rather than much good it had not so happened. This was then (as my record reporteth more at large) registred to be a president in time to come.]

After that king Edward had reduced the state of the publike affaires vnto his liking; to purchase himselfe a good opinion and fauourable iudgement among the commons, he made proclamations, that all persons, which were adherents to his aduersaries part, & would leaue their armour, and submit themselves wholie to his grace and mercie, should be clerelie pardoned and forgiven. By this kind of courteous dealing he wan him such fauour of the people, that euer after, in all his warres, he was (thorough their aid and support) a victor and conqueror. When his realme was thus brought into a good & quiet estate, it was thought meet by him and those of his counsell, that a marriage were pouldred for him in some conuenient place; and therefore was the earle of Marlowe sent ouer into France, to demand the ladie Bona, daughter to Lewis duke of Sanoie, and sister to the ladie Carlot, then queene of France; which Bona was at that time in the French court.

The earle of Marlowe, comming to the French king, then lieng at Tours, was of him honourable receiued, and right courteously interteined. His message was so well liked, and his request thought so honourable for the aduancement of the ladie Bona, that hir sister queene Carlot obtained both the good will of the king hir husband, and also of hir sister the foresaid ladie: so that the matrimonie on that side was clerelie assented to, and the erle of Dampmartine appointed (with others) to saile into England, for the full finishing of the same. But here consider the old prouerbe to be true, which saith, that marriage goeth by destinie. For, during the time that the earle of Marlowe was thus in France, and (according to his instructions) brought the effect of his commission to passe, the king being on hunting in the forest of Wiltchwood besides Stonistratford, came for his recreation to the manor of Grafton, where the duchesse of Bedford then sojourned, wife to sir Richard Woodville lord Rivers, on whom was then attendant a daughter of hers, called the ladic Elizabeth Graie, widow of sir John Graie knight, slain at the last battell of saint Albons; as before ye have heard.

This widow, having a sute to the king for such lands as hir husband had given hir in jointure, so kindled the kings affection towards hir, that he not onelie favoured hir sute, but moze hir person; for she was a woman of a moze foymall countenance than of excellent beautie; and yet both of such beautie and favour, that with hir sober demeanour, swete looks, and comelie smiling (neither too wanton, nor too bashfull) besides hir pleasant tong and trim wit, she so allured and made subiect unto hir the heart of that great prince, that after she had desired him to be his paramour, with so good maner, and words so well set as better could not be devised; he smallie resolved with himselfe to marrie hir, not asking counsell of a nie man, till they might perceiue it was no botie to aduise him to the contrarie of that his concluded purpose; sith he was so farre gone that he was not renocable, and therefore had fixed his heart vpon the last resolution: namelie, to applie an holesome, honest, and honourable remedie to his affections fiered with the flames of loue, and not to permit his heart to the thraldome of vnlawfull lust: which purpose was both princelie and profitable; as the poet saith:

Quid, de rem,
an lib. 1.

Prile propositum est sacus extinguere flammam, Nec seruum vitij; pectus habere suum.

But yet the duchesse of Bozke his mother letted this match as much as in hir laie: & when all would not serue, she caused a precontract to be alleged, made by him with the ladic Elizabeth Lucie. But all doubts resolved, all things made clere, and all cauellations auoided, yllulie in a morning he married the said ladic Elizabeth Graie at Grafton before said, where he first began to fanlie hir. And in the next yere after the was with great solemnitie crowned queene at Westminster. Hir father also was created earle Rivers, and made high constable of England: hir brother lord Anthonie was married to the sole heire of Thomas lord Scales: sir Thomas Graie sonne to sir John Graie the queenes first husband, was created marques Dorset, and married to Cicelie heire to the lord Bonuille. The French king was not well pleased to be thus dallied with; but he shortly (to appeare the gréefe of his wife and hir sister the ladic Bona) married the said ladic Bona to the duke of Spillan.

The earle of Warwike offended with the kings ma-riage.

Now when the earle of Warwike had knowledge by letters sent to him out of England from his true friends, that king Edward had gotten him a new wife, he was not a little troubled in his mind, for that he toke it his credence thereby was greatly diminished, and his honour much stained, namelie in the court of France: for that it might be imagined he came rather like an espiall, to moue a thing neuer minded, and to treat a marriage determined before not to take effect. Suerlie he thought himselfe euill used, that when he had brought the matter to his purposed intent and wished conclusion, then to haue it quailed on his part; so as all men might thinke at the least wife, that his prince made small account of him, to send him on such a sleuelesse errand.

All men for the most part agré, that this marriage was the onlie cause, why the earle of Warwike conceived an hatred against king Edward, whome he so much before favoured. Other affirme other causes, and one speciallie, for that king Edward did attempt a thing once in the earles house, which was much against the earles honestie (whether he would haue deflowered his daughter or his niece, the certentie was not for both these honours openlie revealed) for suerlie, such a thing was attempted by king Edward; which loned well both to behold and also to fele faire damfels. But whether the iniurie that the earle thought he receiued at the kings hands, or the dishaine of authoritie that the earle had vnder the king, was the cause of the breach of amitie betwixt them: truth it is, that the priuie intentions of their hearts brake into so manie small peeces, that England, France, and Flanders, could neuer ioine them againe, during their naturall liues.

But though the earle of Warwike was earnestlie inflamed against the king, for that he had thus married himselfe without his knowledge, having regard onelie to the satisfieng of his wanton appetite, moze than to his honour or suertie of his estate; yet did he so much dissemble the matter at his returne into England, as though he had not vnderstood aie thing thereof: but onelie declared what he had done, with such reuerence, and shew of frændlie countenance, as he had bene accustomed. And when he had taried in the court a certeine space, he obtained licence of the king to depart to his castell of Warwike, meaning (when time serued) to viter to the world, that which he then kept secret, that is to saie, his inward grudge, which he bare towards the king, with desire of reuenge, to the bittermost of his power. Nevertheless, at that time he departed (to the outward shew) so farre in the kings fauour, that manie gentlemen of the court for honours sake gladdie accompanied him into his countrie.

This yere it was proclaimed in England, that the beakes or pikes of shoes and boots should not passe two inches, vpon paine of curfing by the cleargie; and for setting twentie shillings, to be paid one noble to the king, an other to the cordwainers of London, and the third to the chamber of London; and for other cities and tostones the like order was taken. Before this time, and since the yere of our Lord 1382, the pikes of shoes and boots were of such length, that they were faine to be tied vp vnto the knees with chaines of siluer and gilt, or at the least with silken laces.

In this yere also, the kings daughter, the ladic Elizabeth, after wile to king Vencie the seauenth, was bozne; king Edward concluded an amitie and league with Vencie king of Castile, and John king of Aragon; at the concluding thereof, he granted licence for certeine Cottehold shepe, to be transported into the countrie of Spaine (as people report) which haue there so multiplied and increased, that it hath turned the commoditie of England much to the Spanissh profit. Beside this, to haue an amitie with his next neighbour the king of Scots, he winked at the losse of Berwike, and was contented to take a truce for fiftene yeres. Thus king Edward, though for refusall of the French kings sister in law he wan him enemies in France; yet in other places he procured him friends: but those friends had stow him in small stead, if fortune had not holpe him to an other, even at his eldeth.

This was Charles earle of Charolois, the sonne and heire apparent vnto Phillip duke of Burgognie, which Charles being then a widower, was counselled to be suter vnto king Edward, for to haue in marriage the ladic Margaret, sister to the said king, a ladic of excellent beautie, and indued with so manie worthie gifts of nature, grace, and fortune, that she was thought vnto worthie to match with the greatest prince of the world. The lord Anthonie dard brother to the said earle Charolois, commonly called

The barbard of Burgognie ambassador into England.

called the barbard of Burgognie, a man of great wit, courage, and valiantnesse, was appointed by his father duke Philip, to go into England in ambassage, about this tute; who being furnished of plate and apparell, necessarie for his estate, hauing in his companie gentlemen, and other expert in all feats of chivalrie and martiall prowesse, to the number of foure hundred horses, toke his ship, and arriued in England, where he was of the king & nobles honorable receiued.

This message being declared, ye may be sure the same was tollie heard of the king and his counsell; the which by that assent, saw how they might be assured of a buckler against France. But yet the earle of Marlowe, bearing his heartie fauour vnto the french king, did as much as in him lay by euill reports to hinder this marriage: but this notwithstanding, at length, the king granted to the barbard request; and the said barbard openlie in the kings great chamber contracted the said ladie Margarett, for, and in the name of his brother the said earle of Charolois. After this marriage thus concluded, the barbard challenged the lord Scales, brother to the queene, a man both equall in hart and valiantnesse with the barbard, to fight with him both on horsebacke, and on foot: which demand the lord Scales gladly accepted.

Just betwixt the barbard of Burgognie &
the lord
Scales.

The king causing lists to be prepared in Westsmithfield for these champions, and verie faire and coslie galleries for the ladies, was present at this martiall enterprize himselfe. The first daie they ran together diuerse courses with sharpe speares, and departed with equall honoz. The next day they turneied on horsebacke. The lord Scales horse had on his chafron a long sharpe pike of Steele, and as the two champions coped together, the same horse (whether thorough custome or by chance) thrust his pike into the nosegills of the barbards horse; so that for verie paine he mounted so high, that he fell on the one side with his master, and the lord Scales rode round about him with his sword in his hand, untill the king commanded the marshall to helpe vp the barbard, which openlie said; I can not hold me by the clouds, for though my horse faileth me, fuerlie I will not faile my contercompanion. The king would not suffer them to doe anie more that daie.

The morow after, the two noblemen came into the field on foot, with two polaxes, and fought valiantlie; but at the last, the point of the polar of the lord Scales happened to enter into the sight of the barbards helme, and by fine force might haue plucked him on his knees: the king suddenlie cast downe his warder, and then the marshalls them seuered. The barbard not content with this chance, and trusting on the cunning which he had at the polar, required the king of iustice, that he might performe his enterprize. The lord Scales refused it not, but the king said, he would aske counsell: and so calling to him the constable, and the marshall, with the officers of armes, after consultation had, and the lawes of armes rehearsed, it was declared for a sentence definitive, by the duke of Clarence, then constable of England, and the duke of Norfolke, then marshall; that if he would go forward with his attempted challenge, he must by the law of armes be deliuered to his aduersarie, in the same state and like condition as he stood when he was taken from him.

The barbard hearing this iudgement, doubted the sequelle of the matter; and so relinquished his challenge. Other challenges were done, and valiantlie attended by the Englishmen, which I passe ouer. Shortly after came sorrowfull tidings to the barbard, that his father duke Philip was dead, who thereupon taking his leaue of king Edward, and of his sister the new duchesse of Burgognie, liberallie rewarded with plate and iewels, with all speed returned to his brother the new duke, who was not a little glad of the contract made for him with the said ladie, as after well appeared. In this same yeare, king Edward, more for the loue of the marques Montacute, than for auncie fauour he bare to the earle of Marlowe, promoted George Penill their brother to the archbishopricke of Yorke.

Charles duke of Burgognie, reioysing that he had so well sped, for conclusion of marriage with king Edwards sister, was verie desirous to see hir, of whome he had heard so great praise, & wrote to king Edward, requiring him to send his sister ouer vnto him, according to the conenants passed betwixt them. King Edward being not slacke in this matter, appointed the dukes of Excester and Suffolke, with their wiues, being both sisters to the ladie Margaret, to attend hir, till she came to hir husband. And so after that ships, and all other necessarie provisions were readie, they being accompanied with a great sort of lords and ladies, and others, to the number of five hundred horse, in the beginning of June departed out of London to Douer, and so sailed to Sluis, and from thence was conueied to Bruges, where the marriage was solemnized betwixt the duke and hir, with great triumphs, & princelie feastings. Touching the pompe had and bled at the setting forward of this ladie on hir voiage it is a note worth the reading; and therefore necessarilie here interlaced for honours sake.

On the eighteenth of June, Margaret sister to king Edward the fourth began hir iornie from the Wardrobe in London, toward hir marriage with Charles duke of Burgognie: first she offered in the church of saint Paule, and then rode thorough the citie, the earle of Marlowe riding before hir, with earles and barons a great number; the duchesse of Norfolke, with other ladies and gentlewomen in great number. And at hir entrie into Cheape, the maiors of London and his brethren the aldermen presented hir with a pair of rich balons, & in them an hundred pounds of gold, and that night she lodged at the abbrie of Stratford, where the king then lay: from thence she toke hir iournie to Canturburie.

The king riding after to see hir shipping, on the first of Iulie, she toke the sea at Margate, and there toke leaue of the king hir brother, and departed. There returned backe againe with the king, the duke of Clarence, the duke of Gloucester, the earles of Marlowe, Shrewsburie, and Northumberland. And there abode with hir in the ship, the lord Scales, the lord Dacres hir chamberlaine, sir John Mowbray, sir John Holward, and manie other famous knights and esquires. She was shipped in the new Ellen of London, and in hir nauie the John of Newcastle, the Marie of Salisburie, and manie other roiall ships, and on the morow landed at Sluis in Flanders. Now as soone as hir ship & companie of ships were entered into the haven, there receiued hir sir Simon de Alein and the water bailiffe, in diuerse boats and barks apparelled readie for hir landing.

The first estate that receiued hir was the bishop of Etricht well accompanied, and the countesse of Home barbard daughter to duke Philip of Burgognie, and with hir manie ladies and gentlewomen; and so proceeding in at the gate of the towne, the same towne was presented to hir, she to be loue reigne ladie thereof: also they gaue to hir twelue marks of gold Troie weight, the which was two hundred pounds of English monie; and so proceeded thorough the towne to hir lodging, cuerie householding standing standing in the street with a torch in his hand burning. On the morrow the old duchesse of Burgognie came to hir, accompanied with manie great estates. On the third of Julie came the duke of Burgognie to Sluis, with twentie persons secretlie, and was there openlie affianced to the ladie Margaret, by the bishop of Salisburie and the lord Scales, in presence of the lord Dacres, the duchesse of Norfolk, the ladie Scales, and all the knights & esquiers; gentlewomen inatironing the chamber.

On the 8 of Julie (being saturday) by the duke of Burgognies appointment, the lady Margaret removed by water to the Dame. And on the Sunday in the morning betwixt five and six of the clocke, the marriage was solemnized betwixt them, by the bishops of Salisburie and of Turneie; there being present the old duchesse of Burgognie, the lord Scales, the lord Dacres, with the knights, esquiers, ladies & gentlewomen that came out of England. The great triumphs, feastings, shewes of pageants, with other strange deuises, and iustings, were such as I haue not read the like, and would be ouer long in this place to set downe.

¶ Of this alliance with other more mention is honorable made in the declaration of the causes that moued the Quene of England to giue aid to the defense of the people afflicted & oppressed in the low countries, by the Spaniards, namelie for the maintenance of perpetuall annitie. Which declaration is so set forth in this booke, as the same in the seven and twentieth yeare of hir maiesties reigne was published: vnto which yeare I remit the reader (for the further search thereof) for that it containeth much memorable matter, touching the manifest causes of concord to be continued betwene them of the low countries and vs English.]

Sir Thomas Coke late maior of London, was by one named Watkins appeached of treason, for the which he was sent to the Tower, and his place within London seized by the lord Rivers, and his wife and seruants clerelie put out therof. The cause was this. The forenamed Watkins came vpon a season vnto the said sir Thomas, requesting him to lend a thousand markes vpon good suretie, wherevnto he answered, that first he would know for whome it should be and for what intent.

At length, vnderstanding it should be for the vse of quene Margaret, he answered he had no curraunt wares thereof anie gifts might be made without too much losse: and therefore required Watkins to moue him no farther in that matter, for he intended not to deale withall: yet the said Watkins exhorted him to remember, what benefitts he had receiued by hir when she was in prosperitie, as by making him hir wardrober, and custומר of Hampton, &c.

But by no meanes the said Coke would grant goods nor monie, although at last the said Watkins required but an hundred pounds, he was faine to depart without the value of a penie, and neuer came againe to moue him, which so rested two or three years after, till the said Watkins was cast in the Tower, and at length brought to the stake, called the duke of Excessers daughter, by meanes of which paine he shewed manie things, amongst the which the motion was one that he had made to sir Thomas Coke, and accused himselfe so farre, that he was put to death.

By meane of which confession, the said sir Thomas was troubled (as before is shewed) when the said sir Thomas had laine in the Tower from Whitsuntide till about Michaelmas, in the which season manie inquiries were made to find him guiltie, and euer quit, till one turtie (by meanes of sir John Fog) indicted him of treason, after which an oier and terminer was kept at the Cusshall, in which sat with the maior the duke of Clarence, the earle of Warwicke, the lord Rivers, sir John Fog, with other of the kings council.

To the which place the said Thomas was brought, and there arraigned vpon life and death, where he was acquitted of the said indictment, and had to the counter in Breadstreet, and from thence to the kings bench. After a certeine time that he was thus acquitted, his wife got againe the possession of hir house, the which she found in an euill plight; for such seruants of the lord Rivers and sir John Fog, as were assigned to keepe it, made haucke of what they listed.

Also at his place in Essex named Cusshall, were set an other sort to keepe that place, the which destroyed his deere in his parke, his comes, and his fish, without reason, and spared not bazzle, pettiter, bedding, & all that they might carie, for the which might neuer one penie be gotten in recompense, yet could not sir Thomas Coke be deliuered, till he had paid eight thousand pounds to the king, and eight hundred pounds to the quene.]

In this meane time, the earle of Warwicke bearing a continuall grudge in his hart toward king Edward, since his last returne out of France, persuaded so with his two brethren, the archbishop, and the marques, that they agreed to ioinc with him in anie attempt which he should take in hand against the said king. The archbishop was easilie allured to the earles purpose, but the marques could by no meanes be reduced to take anie part against king Edward of a long time, till the earle had both promised him great rewards and promotions, and also assured him of the aid and power of the greatest princes of the realme. And euen as the marques was loth to consent to his unhappie conspiracie, so with a faint hart he shewed himselfe an enimie vnto king Edward, which doubled dissimulation was both the destruction of him and his brethren. ¶ And that they were persuasions of no small force, which the earle of Warwicke used to the archbishop and marques, I haue thought good here to interlace, as I find remembred by Edward Hall in forme following.

The persuasions of the earle of Warwicke vnto his two brethren against king Edward the fourth.

My deere and welbeloued brethren, the incredible faithfulness, the secret sobernesse, and the politike prudence that I haue euer by long continuance of time experimented in you both, doth not onelie encourage my heart, yea and setteth me in great hope of obtaining my purpose, but also putteth me out of all dread and mistrust, firmelie beleauing, and surerlie iudging, that you both will with tooth and naile endeavour your selues, to the uttermost of your power, to bring to effect and purpose the thing that I now shall declare vnto you. Surcelie, I would in no wise that you should thinke, that that which I shall speake to you of king Edward and king Henrie, should rise of any highnesse or phantasie of my mind, or anie trifeling toie latelie fallen in my imagination; but the true experience and iust iudgement that I haue of them both, their qualities and conditions, in manner compell and constrainc me to saie as I say, and to doo as I doo.

Abt. Flex.
Edw. Hall. 6.
Edw. 4. fol.
ccxviii. &c.

for suerlie, king Henrie is a godlie, good, and a vertuous person, neither forgetting his friends, nor putting in obliuion anie benefit by him of a meane person receiued, nor yet anie paine for his causes susteined, hath he left unrewarded: to whome God hath sent a sonne, called prince Edward, borne to be of great worthinesse & praise, of much bountifullnesse and liberalitie, of whome men may manie laudable things coniecture, considering the paine, labour, and trauell, that he taketh to helpe his father out of captiuitie and thraldome. King Edward on the contrarie side, is a man contumelious, opprobrious, and an iniurious person; to them that deserue kindnesse he sheweth unkindnesse, and them that loue him he deadiie hateth, now detesting to take anie paine for the preferment or maintenance of the publike wealth of this realme, but all giuen to pastime, pleasure, and daliance; sooner preferring to high estate men descended of low blood and base degree, than men of old and vndeiled houses, which haue both supported him and the commonwealth of his realme.

So that I now perceiue, that it is euen come to this point, that he will destroe all the nobilitie; or else the nobilitie must shortly be of vertie necessitie destroe and confound him. But reason would, that we that were first hurt, should first reuenge our cause: for it is not vnknownen to you both, how that he, immediatlie after he had obtained the crowne, began first secretlie, & then openlie to enuie, disdain, and impugne the fame, glorie, and renowne of our house and familie; as who said, that all the honor, preferment, and authoritie that we haue, we had onelie receiued at his hands, and that we had neither obtained dignitie nor rule by our great labour, aid and trauell. Which to all men may seeme vntrue, that consider that our name, chiefe title, and principall authoritie, was to vs giuen by king Henrie the first, and not by him. But if euery man will remember, who first toke part with his father, when he claimed the crowne (who at that time, for that cause was in great iopardie, and almost slaine by the kings meniall seruants, and who neuer left this man in prosperitie nor aduersitie, till he had the garland, and the realme in quietnesse) shall manifestlie perceive, that we and our blood haue shewed our selues more like fathers to him, than he like a friend to vs.

If we haue receiued any benefits of him, suerlie they be not so much as we haue deserved, nor so much as we looked for; and yet they be much more than he would we should know, as ye both well perceiue and know. Let these things ouerpasse, and speake of the vngentle, vntrue, and vnprincipall handling of me in the last ambassage, being sent to the french king for to treat a marriage for him, hauing full authoritie to bind and to lose, to contract and conclude. Which thing when I had finished & accomplished:

how lightlie his mind changed, how priuie he bowed, and how secretlie he married, both you know better than I. So that by this meanes, I was almost out of all credence in the court of France, both with the king and quene, as though I had come thither like an elpiall, to moue a thing neuer minded; or to treat of a marriage determined before neuer to take effect. Whereby the fame of all our estimation, which all kings and princes haue conceived in vs (partlie obtained by the vertue & proffesse of our noble ancestors, and partlie atchiued by our owne paines & forward acts) shall now be obfuscate, vtterlie extingwished, and nothing set by.

What woyme is touched, and will not once turne againe: What beast is stricken, that will not roze or sound: What innocent child is hurt that will not crie: If the poore and vnreasonable beasts, if the selie babes that doe lacke discretion, grone against harme to them proffered; how ought an honest man to be angrie, when things that touch his honestie be daillie against him attempted: But if a meane person in that case be angrie: how much more ought a noble man to fume & stirre coales, when the high type of his honour is touched, his fame in maner brought to infamie, and his honour almost blemished & appalled, without his offense or desert: All this brethren you know to be true, the dishonor of one is the dishonor of vs all, and the hurt of one is the hurt of all: wherefore, rather than I will liue vnreuenged; or suffer him to reigne, which hath sought my decarie and dishonor, I will suerlie spend my life, lands, and goods, in setting by that iust and good man king Henrie the first: and in deposing this vntrue, vnfaithfull, and unkind prince (by our onelie means) called king Edward the fourth.

Before all this, the earle of Marwike, being a far casting prince, perceiued somewhat in the duke of Clarence, whereby he iudged that he bare no great good will towards the king his brother; and thereby on, feeling his mind by such talke as he of purpose ministred, vnderstood how he was bent, and so won him to his purpose: and for better assurance of his faithfull friendship, he offered him his eldest daughter in marriage; with the whole halfe deale of his wines inheritance. And hereupon, after consultation had of their weightie businesse and dangerous affaires, they sailed ouer to Calis, of the which towne the earle was capitaine, where his wife & two daughters then sojourned, whome the duke (being in love with his person) had great desire to visit.

But the earle, hauing in continuall remembrance his purposed enterprize, appointed his brethren, the archbishop and the marquess, that they should by some meanes in his absence stirre up some new rebellion in the countie of Worke, and other places adjoining, so that this ciuill warre should seeme to all men to haue bene begun without his assent or knowledge, being on the further side of the seas. The duke of Clarence being come to Calis with the earle of Marwike, after he had sworn on the sacrament to keepe his promise and pact made with the said earle whole and inuiolate, he married the ladie Isabel, eldest daughter.

daughter to the earle, in our ladies church there. Shortly after, according as had bene aforehand devised, a commotion was begun in Yorkeshire, to the great disquieting of that countrie. The same chanced by this means.

There was in the citie of Yorke an old and rich hospitall, dedicated to saint Leonard, for the harbouring and relieving of poore people. Certaine euill disposed persons of the earle of Marwikes faction, intending to set a boile in the countrie, perswaded the husbandmen to refuse to giue anie thing to the said hospitall, affirming that the corne giuen to that good intent, came not to the vse of the poore; but was conuerted to the behoofe of the maister of the hospitall, and the preests, whereby they grew to be rich, and the poore people wanted their due succour and reliefe. And not content with these sayings, they fell to doings: for when the proctors of the hospitall, according to their vsage, went about the countrie to gather the accustomed corne, they were soze beaten, wounded, and euill intreated.

Shortly after, the conspiracie of the euill disposed people grew to an open rebellion, so that there assembled to the number of sixtene thousand men, euen readie bent to set on the citie of Yorke. But the lord marquisse Pontacute, gouernour and president of that countrie for the king, taking spedic counsell in the matter, with a small number of men, but well chosen, incountred the rebels before the gates of Yorke: where (after a long conflict) he took Robert Hildborne their captaine, and before them commanded his head to be stricken off, and then (because it was a darke euening) he caused his souldiers to enter in to Yorke, and there to refresh them. Here manie men haue marvelled, why the marquisse thus put to death the captaine of those people, which had procured this their rebellious enterpryse.

Some saie he did it, to the intent to seme innocent and faultlesse of his brothers doings. But other iudge, that he did it, for that contrarie to his promise made to his brother, he was determined to take part with king Edward, with whom (as it shall after appeare) he in small space entered into grace and fauour. The rebels being nothing dismayed with the death of their captaine, but rather the more bent on mischief, by faire meanes and craftie persuaasions got to them Henric, sonne to the lord Fitz Hugh, and sir Henric Percill sonne and heire to the lord Latimer, the one being nephue and the other cousine germane to the earle of Marwike. Although these yong gentlemen bare the names of captains, yet they had a gouernour that was sir John Coniers, a man of such courage & balliantnesse, as few were to be found in his daies within the north parts.

After they saw that they could not get Yorke, because they wanted ordinance, they determined with all speed to march toward London, intending to raise such a tole in the peoples minds, that they should thinke king Edward neither to be a lawfull prince, nor yet profitable to the common-wealth. King Edward hauing perfect knowledge of all the doings of the earle of Marwike, and of his brother the duke of Clarence, was by diuerse letters certified of the great armie of the northerne men, with all speed comming toward London; and therefore in great haste he sent to William lord Herbert, whom (as ye haue heard) he had created earle of Penbroke; requiring him without delate to raise his power, and incounter with the northerne men.

The earle of Penbroke, commondie called the lord Herbert, both readie to obeie the kings commandement, according to his dutie, and also desirous to reuenge the malice which he bare to the earle of Marwike, for that he knew how he had bene the onelie let whie he obtained not the wardship of the lord Bonnevilles daughter and heire for his eldest sonne, accompanied with his brother sir Richard Herbert, a ballant knight, and aboue sir 20 seauen thousand Welshmen, well furnished, marched forward to incounter with the northerne men. And to assist him with archers, was appointed Humfrie lord Stafford of Southwike, named but not created earle of De. The lord Stafford by the king, in hope that he would serue as ballantlie in that iourne: he had with him eight hundred archers.

When these two lords were met at Cotesfold, they heard how the northerne men were going toward Southampton: whereupon the lord Stafford, and sir Richard Herbert, with two thousand well horsed Welshmen, rode forth afore the maine armie, to see the demeanour of the northerne men: and at length, vnder a woods side, they conertlie espied them passing forward, and suddenlie set on the rearward: but the northerne men with such nimblenesse turned about, that in a moment the Welshmen were discomfited, and manie taken, the remnant returned to the armie with small gaine. The northerne men well cooled with this small victorie, went no further southwards, but toke their waie toward Marwike, looking for aid of the earle, which was lathie come from Calles, with his sonne in law the duke of Clarence, and was raising men to aid his friends and kinsfolke.

The king likewise assembled people to aid the earle of Penbroke, but before either part received succour from his friend or partaker, both the armies met by chance in a faire plaine, nere to a towne called Hedgocote, foure miles distant from Banberie, where there are three hilles, not in equall quantitie, but lieng in manner (although not fullie) triangle. The Welshmen got first the west hill, hoping to haue recovered the east hill also, which if they might haue obtained, the victorie had bene theirs, as their foolish prophesiers told them before. These northerne men incamped on the south hill; the earle of Penbroke and the lord Stafford of Southwike were lodged in Banberie, the daie before the fielde, which was saint James daie, and there the earle of Penbroke put the lord Stafford out of an inn, wherein he delighted much to be, for the loue of a damosell that dwelled in the house: and yet it was agreed betwixt them, that which of them sooner obtained first a lodging, should not be displaced.

The lord Stafford in great despite departed with his whole band of archers, leauing the earle of Penbroke almost desolate in the towne, who with all diligence returned to his host, lieng in the fielde surrounded of archers. Sir Henric Percill, sonne to the lord Latimer, toke with him certaine light horsemen, and skirmished with the Welshmen in the euening, iust before their campe, where doing right ballantlie, but a little too hardilie aduenturing himselfe, was taken and yelded, and yet cruellie slaine. Which very mercifull act the Welshmen soze rued the next day per night: for the northerne men soze displeased for the death of this noble man, in the next morning ballantlie set on the Welshmen, and by force of archers caused them quicklie to descend the hill, into the valley, where both the hostis fought.

The earle of Penbroke did right ballantlie, and so likewise did his brother sir Richard Herbert, in so much that with his polar in his hand, he twice by fine force passed thorough the battell of his aduersaries, and without anie hurt or moztall wound returned. But see the hap, euen as the Welshmen were at point to haue obtained the victorie, John Clapam esquier, seruant to the earle of Marwike, mounted by the side of the east hill, accompanied onelie onelle with five hundred men, gathered of the rascals of the towne of Southampton, and other villages about, having bozre before them the standard of the earle of Marlowe, with the white beare, crying; A Marlowe, a Marlowe.

The Welshmen, thinking that the earle of Marlowe had come on them with all his puissance, suddenly as men amazed, fled: the northerne men them pursued, and five without mercie, so that there died of the Welshmen that date, above five thousand, besides them that fled and were taken. The earle of Penbroke, and his brother sir Richard Herbert, with diuerse gentlemen, were taken and brought to Banberie, where the earle with his brother, and other gentlemen, to the number of ten, that were likewise taken, lost their heads. But great moue was made for that noble and hardie gentleman, sir Richard Herbert, being able for his goodlie personage and high balliance, to haue secured the greatest prince in Christendome. [But what policie or puissance can either prevent or impugne the force of fate, whose law as it standeth vpon an inevitable necessitie; so was it not to be dispensed withall; and therefore destine hauing preordained the manner of his death, it was patientlie to be suffered, sith puissance it could not be auoided, nor politike preuented, nor violentlie resisted: for

— sua queng dies ad funera raprat.]

The Southamptonshire men, with diuerse of the northerne men by them procured, in this furie made them a capteine, called Robert Willard, but they named him Robin of Reddesdale, and suddenly came to Crasson, where they toke the earle Riners, father to the quene, and his son sir John Modulle, whome they brought to Southampton, and there beheaded them both without iudgement. The king aduertised of these mishances, wrote to the Shyrciffes of Summerfetshire, and Denonshire, that if they might by any means take the lord Stafford of Southwike, they should without delay put him to death. Whereupon search was made for him, till at length he was found in a village within Brentmarch, and after brought to Bridgewater where he was beheaded.

After the battell was thus fought at Hedgocote commonlie called Banberie field, the northerne men rested toward Marlowe, where the earle had gathered a great multitude of people, which earle received the northerne men with great gladnes, thanking sir John Coniers, and other their capteins for their paines taken in his cause. The king in this meane time had assembled his power, and was comming toward the earle, who being aduertised thereof, sent to the duke of Clarence, requiring him to come and some with him. The duke being not farre off, with all speed repaired to the earle, and so they joined their powers together, and vpon secret knowledge had, that the king (because they were entered into termes by waie of communication to haue a peace) toke small heed to himselfe, nothing doubting any outward attempt of his enemies.

The earle of Marlowe, intending not to lose such opportunitie of aduantage, in the dead of the night, with an elect companie of men of warre (as secretlie as was possible) set on the kings field, killing them that kept the watch, and per the king was ware (for he thought of nothing lesse than of that which then hapned) at a place called Molnie, foure miles from Marlowe, he was taken prisoner and brought to the castell of Marlowe. And to the intent his friends should not know what was become of him, the earle caused him by secret iournies in the night to be conueied to Spidleham castell in Dorsetshire, and there to be kept vnder the custodie of the archbishop of Dorset, and other his friends in those parties. King Edward being thus in captiuitie, spake ever faire to the archbishop, and to his other keepers, so that he had leaue diuerse daies to go hunt. [Which exercise he vsed, as it should seme, not so much for regard of his recreation, as for the recouerie of his libertie; which men esteeme better than gold, and being counted a diuine thing, both passe all the wealth, pleasure, and treasure of the world; according to the old saing:

Non bene profuluo libertas venditur auro;

Hoc celeste bonum preterit orbis opes.]

Now on a daie vpon a plaine when he was thus abode, there met with him sir William Stanleie, sir Thomas a Bozough, and diuers other of his friends, with such a great band of men, that neither his keepers would, nor once durst moue him to returne vnto prison againe. Some haue thought that his keepers were corrupted with monie, or faire promises, and therefore suffered him thus to scape out of danger. After that he was once at libertie, he came to Dorset, where he was iustlie received, and taried there two daies: but when he perceived he could get no armie together in that countie to attend him to London, he turned from Dorset to Lancaster, where he found his chamberleine the lord Hastings well accompanied, by whose aid and such others as were to him, being well furnished, he came safelie to the citie of London.

When the earle of Marlowe, and the duke of Clarence had knowledge how king Edward by the treason or negligence of them (whome they had put in trust) was escaped their hands, they were in a wonderfull chafe: but sith the chance was past, they began effsones to prouide for the warre, which they saw was like to insue; and found much comfort, in that a great number of men, desiring more in discord than in concord, offered themselves to aid their side. But other good men desirous of common quiet, and lamenting the miserable state of the realme, to redresse such mischief as appeared to be at hand by these tumults, toke paine, and road betwene the king, the earle, and the duke, to reconcile them each to other.

Their charitable motion and causes allegeded, because they were of the chiefest of the nobilitie, and therefore caried both credit and authoritie with them, so alluaged the moods both of the king, the duke, and the earle; that each gaue faith to other to come and go safelie without leopards. In which promise both the duke and earle putting perfect confidence, came both to London. At Westminster, the king, the duke, and the earle, had long communication together, so to haue come to an agreement: but they fell at such great words vpon reherfall of old matters, that in great furie without any conclusion they departed, the king to Canturburie, and the duke and the earle to Marlowe, where the earle procured a new armie to be raised in Lincolneshire, and made capteine thereof sir Robert Welles, sonne to Richard lord Welles, a man of great experience in warre.

The king aduertised hereof, without delay prepared an armie, and out of hand he sent to Richard lord Welles, willing him vpon the sight of his letters, to repaire vnto him: which to do he had oftentimes refused, excusing himselfe by sicknesse and feblenesse of bodie. But when that excuse serued not, he thinking to purge himselfe sufficientlie of all offense and blame before the kings presence, toke with him sir Thomas Dimmocke, who had married his sister, and so came to London. And when he was come, by being admonished by his friends that the king was greatlie with him displeased, he with his brother in law toke the sanctuarie at Westminster.

But king Edward, trusting to pacifie all this civile tumult without any further bloodshed, promised both those persons their pardons, causing them vpon his promise to come out of sanctuarie to his presence, sence, and calling to him the lord Welles, willed him to write to his sonne to leaue off the warre, and in the meane season he with his armie went forwarde, hauing with him the lord Welles, and sir Thomas Dimmocke. And being not past two daies iourne from Stamford, where his enimies had pitched their field, and hearing that sir Robert Welles, not regarding his fathers letters, kept his campe still, he caused the lord Welles, father to the said sir Robert, and sir Thomas Dimmocke to be beheaded, contrarie to his promise.

Sir Iohann Welles, hearing that the king approached, and that his father and sir Thomas Dinmocke were beheaded, though he was somewhat doubtful to fight, before the earle of Warburtone doubtfull his power assembled, yet hauing a yong and lustie courage, manfullie set on his enemies. The battell was forse fought on both sides, and manie a man slaine; till sir Iohann, perceluing his people at point to flie, was busilie in hand to exhort them to tarie, and in the meane time compassed about with enemies was there taken, & with him sir Thomas de L. and knight, and manie more. After the taking of their captaine, the Lincolnshire men amazed, theyr awaie their coats the lighter to run awaie, and fled amaine, and therefore this battell is called there yet vnto this daie. I. of cote field.

The king reioicing at this victorie, caused sir Robert Welles, and diuerse other to be put to execution in the same place. The same went that at this battell were slaine ten thousand men at the least. The earle of Marlowke laie at the same time at his castell of Marlowke, and meant to haue set forward the next daie toward his armie in Lincolnshire. But when he heard that the same was ouerthrowne, he toke new counsell, and with all diligence imagined how to compassse Thomas lord Stanleie, which had married his sister; that he might be one of the conspiracie. Which thing when he coult not bring to passe, (so the lord Stanleie had answered him, that he woulde neuer make warre against king Edward) he thought no longer to spend time in loase; and mistrusting he was not able to meet with his enemies, he with his sonne in law the duke of Clarence departed to Exeter, and there tarrying a few daies, determined to saile into France to purchase aid of king Lewis.

Now resting upon this point, he hired ships at Dartmouth: and when the same were readie trimm'd and deck'd, the duke and the earle with their wives, and a great number of seruants imbarked themselves, and first toke their course towards Calis, whereof the earle was capitaine, thinking there to haue left his wife and daughters, till he had returned out of France. But when they were come before the towne of Calis, they could not be suffered to enter: for the lord Auclere a Gascoigne, being the earles deputie in that towne, whether he did it by dissimulation, or bearing good will to king Edward (as by the sequelle it may be doubted whether he did or no) in stead of receiuing his master with triumph, he bent and discharged against him diuerse peeces of ordinance, sending him word he should not there take land.

This naute lieng thus before Calis at anchor, the duchesse of Clarence was there deliuered of a faire sonne, which this the earles deputie would scarce suffer to be distressed within the towne, nor without great intreatie would permit two dragons of wine to be conuied aboard to the ladies lieng in the haven. The king of England aduertised of the refusal made by monsieur de Glauciere to the earle of Marlowe, was so much pleased therewith, that incontinentlie he made him chiefe captaine of the towne of Calis by his letters patents, which he sent to him out of hand, and thereof discharged the earle as a traitor and rebell. Thus was the one in respect of his accepted service honorable advanced; and the other, in regard of his disloyaltie shamefullie disgraced; whereof as the one took occasion of inward delight; so the other could not be void of grudging conceits.

The duke of Burgognie (unto whome king Edward had writtten, that in no wise he should receive the earle of Warwicke, nor anie of his friends within his countries) was so well pleased with the dooings of monsieur de Waulerue, that he sent to him his servant Philip de Cumins, and gaue him pence, lie a thousand crownes in pension, praieng and requirring him to continue in truth and fidelitie toward king Edward, as he had shewed and begun. But although monsieur de Waulerue swore in the said Philips presence, trulie to take king Edwards part, yet he sent priuillie to the earle of Warwicke lieng at Whitlanbate, that if he landed, he should be taken and loof: for all England (as he said) took part against him; the duke of Burgognie, and all the inhabitants of the towne, with the lord Duras the kings marshall, and all the retinue of the garrison were his enemies.

The earle, hauing this aduertisement from his feigned enimie, with his nauie sailed toward Normandie, and by the waie spoiled and toke manie ships of the duke of Burgognies subiects, and at the last (with all his nanie and spoiles) he toke land at Diepe in Normandie, where the gouernor of the countrie friendly welcomed him, and aduertised king Lewis of his arrivall. The French king, desirous of nothing more than to haue occasion to pleasure the erle of Warwick, of whom the yle reuoluntie caused all men to haue him in admiration, sent by to him, requirung both him and his sonne in law the duke of Clarence, to come vnto his castell of Ambois, where he then sojourned. The duke of Burgognie, hearing that the duke and earle were thus receiued in France, sent a post with letters vnto king Lewis, partly by waie of request, and partly by waie of menacing, to dissuade him from aiding of his aduerfaries, the said duke and earle.

But the French king little regarded this sale of the duke of Burgognie, and therefore answered, that he might and would succour his friends, and yet breake no league with him at all. In the meane time, Edward made inquirie for such as were knowne to be aidors of the earle of Warwicke within his realme, of whom some he apprehended as guiltie, and some (doubting themselves) fled to sanctuary, and other tending to the kings pardon, submitted themselves, as John marques of Montacute, whom he courteously received. When quene Margaret that sojourned with duke Kelner hir father, heard tell that the earle of Warwicke was come to the French court, with all diligence she came to Ambois to see him, with hir onlie sonne prince Edward.

60 With hit also came Jasper earle of Penbrooke, and John earle of Arford, which after diuers imprisonment lastlie escaped, fled out of England into France, and came by fortune to this assembly. These persons, after intreatie had of their affaires, determined by meanes of the French king to conclude a league and amitie betwene them. And first to begin withall, for the sure foundation of their new intreatie, Edward prince of Wales wedded Anne second daughter to the earle of Warwick, which ladie came with hit mother into France. After which marriage, the duke and the earles tooke a solemne oth, that they should neuer leaue the warre, till either king Henrie the first, or his sonne prince Edward, were restored to the crowne: and that the quene and the prince should should depuſe and appoint the duke and the earle to be gouernours & conſeruatoꝝ of the common wealthe, till time the prince were come to eſtate. Manye other conditions were agreed, as both reaſon & the weighe- tinneſſe of ſo great buſineſſe required.

Whyleſt theſe things were thus in doing in the French court, there landed a damſell, belonging to the duchelle of Clarence; as ſhe ſaid: which made monſieur de Clauclere beleeue, that ſhe was ſent from king Edward to the duke of Clarence and the earle of Warwike with a plaine ouerture and declaration of peace. Of the which thing Clauclere was verie glad for the earles ſake. But this damſell comming to the duke, perſuaded him ſo much to leaue off the purſute of his conceiued diſpleaſure to- wards his brother king Edward, that he promiſed at his returne into England, not to be ſo extreme e- nimie againſt his brother as he was taken to be: and this promiſe afterward he did keepe. With this an- ſwer the damſell returned into England, the earle of Warwike being thereof clearely ignorant.

The French king lent both ſhips, men, and mo- nie vnto queene Margarete, and to hir partakers, and appointed the baſſard of Bourbon, admirall of France, with a great nauie to defend them againſt the nauie of the duke of Burgognie, which he laid at the mouth of the riuer Saine, readie to encounter them, being of greater force than both the French nauie and the Engliſh fleet. And yet king Reiner did alſo helpe his daughter with men and munition of warre. When their ſhips and men were come to- gether to Harflue, the erle of Warwike thought not to linger time: becauſe he was certified by letters from his friends out of England, that alſone as he had taken land, there would be readie manie thou- ſands to do him what ſeruice and pleaſure they could or might. And beſide this, diuerſe noble men wrote that they would helpe him with men, armor, monie, and all things neceſſarie for the warre, and further to aduenture their owne bodies in his quarell.

Suerly his preſence was ſo much deſired of all the people, that almoſt all men were readie in ar- mour, looking for his arriuall: for they iudged that the verie ſunne was taken from the world when hee was abſent. When he had receiued ſuch letters of comfort, he determined with the duke, and the earles of Orford and Penbroke (becauſe queene Margarete and hir ſonne were not yet ſullie furniſhed for the iournie) to go before with part of the nauie, and part of the armie. And euen as fortune would, the nauie of the duke of Burgognie at the ſame time by a tem- peſt was ſcattered, & driuen beſide the coaſt of Fla- mandie: ſo that the earle of Warwike in hope of a boune voiage, cauſed ſailes to be halſed vp, and with good ſped landed at Dartmouth in Deuonſhire, from whence almoſt fix moneths paſſed he toke his iour- nie toward France (as beſore ye haue heard.) When the earle had taken land, he made proclamation in the name of king Henrie the firſt, vpon high paines commanding and charging all men able to beare ar- mor, to prepare themſelues to fight againſt Edward duke of Boike, which contrarie to right had ſurped the crowne. It is almoſt not to be beleeued, how ma- nie thouſands men of warre at the firſt tidings of the earles landing reſorted vnto him.

King Edward awakened with the newes of the earles landing, and the great repaire of people that came flocking in vnto him, ſent forth letters into all parts of his realme to raiſe an armie: but of them that were ſent for, few came, and yet of thoſe few the more part came with no great good willes. Which when he perceived, he began to doubt the matter, and therefore being accompanied with the duke of Glouceſter his brother, the lord Haſtings his cham-berlaine, which had married the earles ſiſter, and yet was euer true to the king his maſter, and the lord Scales brother to the queene, he departed into Lin- colneſhire. And becauſe he underſtood that all the realme was vp againſt him, and ſome part of the earle of Warwikes power was within halfe a daies iournie of him, following the aduiſe of his counſell, with all haſt poſſible he paſſed the Waſhes in great ſeopardie, & comming to Lin found there an Eng- liſh ſhip, and two hulkes of Holland readie (as ſo- tune would) to make ſaile.

Wherevpon he with his brother the duke of Glo- ceſter, the lord Scales, and diuerſe other his truſtie friends, entered into the ſhip. The lord Haſtings tar- ried a while after, exhorting all his acquaintance, that of neceſſitie ſhould tarie behind, to ſtay themſelues openlie as friends to king Henrie for their owne ſafegard, but hartlie required them in ſecret to cor- tinue faithfull to king Edward. This perſuaſion de- clared, he entered the ſhip with the other, and ſo they departed, being in number in that one ſhip and two hulkes, about ſeuene or eight hundred perſons, ha- uing no furniture of apparell or other neceſſarie things with them, ſauing apparell for warre. [For it was no taking of leaſure to prouide their coppozall neceſſaries (though the want of them could hardlie be borne) in a caſe of preſent danger; conſidering that they were made againſt by the contrarie faction with ſuch ſwift purſute. And it had bene a point of ex- treme follie, to be carefull for the accidents, permit- ting in the meane time the ſubſtance vnto the ſpoile.]

As king Edward with ſaile and oar was thus ma- king courſe towards the duke of Burgognies coun- trie (whether he determined at the firſt to go) it chan- ced that ſeuene or eight gallant ſhips of Caſſerlings, open enemies both to England and France, were a- bzode on thoſe ſeas, and eſpieng the kings beſels, be- gan to chaſe him. The kings ſhip was god of ſaile, and ſo much gat of the Caſſerlings, that he came on the coaſt of Holland, and ſo deſcended lower beſore a towne in the countrie called Alquemare, and there caſt anchor as neere the towne as was poſſible, be- cauſe they could not enter the hauen at an ebbing water. The Caſſerlings alſo approached the Engliſh ſhip, as neere as their great ſhips ſhould come at the low water, intending at the flood to haue their prey: as they were verie like to haue attained it in deed, if the lord Cronture, gouernor of that countrie for the duke of Burgognie, had not by chance bene at the ſame time in that towne.

This lord (vpon knowledge had of king Edwards arriuall there in the hauen, and in what danger he ſtood by reaſon of the Caſſerlings) commanded them not to be ſo hardie as once to meddle with anie Eng- liſhmen, being both the dukes friends and allies. When did king Edward & all his companie come on land. Who after they had bene well reſreſhed & gent- lie comforted by the lord Cronture, they were by him brought to the Haghe, a rich towne in Holland, where they remained a while, hauing all things neceſſarie miniſtered to them by order of the duke of Burgog- nie, ſent vnto the lord Cronture, immediatlie vpon certifi- cat from the ſaid lord Cronture of king Edwards arriuall. [Here we ſee in what perplexities king Edward and his retinue were, partly by eni- mies at home in his owne countrie, whoſe hands he was conſtrained to ſlee from by the helpe of the ſea; partly alſo by aduerſaries abzoard, ſeeking opportuni- tie to offer him not the encounter onelie, but the o- uerthrow. And ſuerly, had not god fortune fauoured him, in preparing readie meannes for him to avoid thoſe imminent dangers; he had doubtleſſe fallen a- mong the weapons of his owne countrimen, and ſo neere

fol. cxc.

Now let all Englishmen (saith Edward Hall) consider (as before is rehearsed) what profit, what commodity, and what helpe in distresse, the mariage of the ladie Margarete, king Edwards sister to the duke Charles, did to him in his extreme necessitie; and but by that meane incurable extremitie: for his allies and confederats in Castile and Arragon were too far from him, either speedie to flie to, or thortlie to come fro with anye aid or armie. The French king was his extreme enemie, and frend to king Henrie, for whose cause in the king of Scots (for all the leage betwene them) he did put little confidence and lesse trust. The states and all Castile were with him at open war, and yet by this mariage, God provided him a place to flie to, both for refuge and reliefe.

Abr. Flein.

[But for the further and clearer explanation of these stratagems, or rather ciuill tumults, it shall not be amisse to insert in this place (sith I cannot hit by on one more convenient) a verie good note or addition received from the hands of maister Iohn Hooker chamberlaine of Excester; the contents whereof are of such qualitie, that they cannot stand in concurrence with anye matter introduced within the compassse of the ninth yeare of this kings reigne (as he had quoted it) and therefore I thought it meet to transfer the same to this tenth yeare; considering that some part of the matter by him largely touched, is byiesle in the premisses already remembred.]

Iohn Hooker, alias Vowell.

This yeare (saith he) was verie troublefome, and full of ciuill wars and great discords. For after that king Edward the fourth was escaped out of prison, at Wolneic besides Warwike, he mustered and prepared a new armie. Whereupon the earle of Warwike and the duke of Clarence, mistrusting themselves, prepared to passe the seas over to Calis, and first of all sent awaite the duchesse of Clarence daughter to the said earle, who was then great with child, and she being accompanied with the lord Fitz Warren, the lord Dintaham, and the baron of Carew, and a thousand fighting men came to this cite of Excester the eighteenth daie of March, and was lodged in the bishops palace. Sir Hugh, or (as some saie) sir William Courtneie, who then favoured the partie of king Edward the fourth, assembled a great trope and armie of all the frends he could make, and ironing the cite, besieged the same; he pulled downe all the bridges, rampered by all the waies, and stopped all the passages, so that no vittels at all could be brought to this cite for twelue daies together, which being done upon a sudden and unlooked for, vittels wared short and scant within the cite, and by reason of so great a multitude within the same, the people for want of fod began to murmur and mutter.

Lord Dintaham, and baron Carew, with their power came to Excester.

The duchesse and the lords of hir companie, mistrusting what might and would be the sequele hereof, began to deale with the maior, and required to haue the keies of the gates to be deliuered into their hands and that they would undertake the safe custodie of the cite. Likewise sir William Courtneie did send his messenger to the maior, and required the gates to be opened and to giue him entrance: or els he would with sword and fier destroye the same. The maior and his brethren being in great perplexities, and hauing to answer not onelie the lords within and the knight without, but most of all doubting the common people within, who being impatient of penurie, were deafe to all persuasions and listen to any counsels: did so order and handle the matter, as that by good speeches and courtesous usages, euerye partie was stopped and staied, untill by means and mediations of certeine good and godlie men, an intreatie was made, the matter was compounded and the siege raised, and euerye man set at libertie.

The next daie after which conclusion, the gates being opened, to wit, the third of Aprill 1470, the earle of Warwike and the duke of Clarence came to this cite, and here rested, and sojourned themselves untill sufficient shipping was provided for their passage over the seas, and then they all imbarked themselves, and passed over to Calis. The king in this meane time mustered his armie, and prepared with all speed all things necessarie to follow and pursue his said aduersaries, and came to this cite, thinking to find them here the foureteenth of Aprill being saturdaye 1470, with fortye thousand fighting men: but the birds were fled awaite before his comming. Neuerthelesse the king came and entred into the cite, being accompanied with sundrie noble men; namely, the bishop of Elie then lord treasurer, the duke of Norfolk the earle marshall, the duke of Suffolke, the earle of Arundell, the earle of Wiltshire sonne to the duke of Buckingham, the earle of Worcester constable of England, the earle of Shrovetuburie, the earle Rivers, the lord Hastings, the lord Craie of Codnor, the lord Audelie, the lord Saie, the lord Sturton, the lord Dacres, the lord Pontiole, the lord Stanleie, the lord Ferris, and the baron of Dupleie.

Before whose comming, the maior being aduertised thereof, took order, and gaue commandement to euerye citizen and inhabitant, being of abilitie, to provide and prepare for himselfe a gowne of the cities liuerie, which was then red colour, and to be in a readinesse for receiuing of the king, which was accordinglye done. And when the king was come nere to the cite, the maior being verie well attended with foure hundred persons well and seemelie apparelled in the cities liuerie, went to the south gate, and with out the same attended the kings comming. Who when he was come, the maior did his most humble obeisance, and therewith Thomas Wolwith then recorder of the cite made unto his grace an humble oration, congratulating his comming to the cite: which ended, the maior deliuered unto the king the keies of the gates and the maces of his office, and therewith a purse of one hundred nobles in gold, which his grace took verie thankfullie. The monie he kept, but the keies and the maces he deliuered backe to the maior; and then the maior took the mace and did beare it through the cite bare-headed before the king, untill he came to his lodging.

The next daie following, being Palmesundate, the king in most princelie and roiall maner came to the cathedraall church of saint Peters, to heare the diuine seruice, where he followed and went in procession after the maner as was then used, round about the churchyard, to the great ioy and comfort of all the people: he continued in the cite three daies untill the tuesdaye then following; who when he had dined toke his horse and departed backe towards London, and gaue to the maior great god thanks for his intertainment. About foure moneths after this, in August, the duke of Clarence and the earle of Warwike returned againe from Calis, with all their retinue, and landed some at Plimmonth, some at Dartmouth, and some at Exmouth: but all met in this cite, and from hence they all passed towards London, and at euerye place they proclaimed king Henrie the first, which when king Edward heard, he was very much troubled therewith: and not able then to withstand their force, he passed the seas to his brother in law the duke of Burgognie.

gouernement vncertaine, men were in great perplexities, & wist not what to do. And among manie there was one speciallie to be remembred, who to rid himselfe out of these troubles, did devise this practise: his name was sir William Haukefloyd knight, a man verie well learned in the lawes of the realme, and one of the chiefe iustices at the law: he dwelled at Annozie in Devonshire, a gentleman of great possessions, and hauing neuer a sonne, the lord Fitz Warren, sir John Bentleger, & sir William Bulkeine, who married his daughters, were his heires. This man being one of the chiefeest lawyers in the land, was daile sought to and his counsell asked: and he considering that when the sword ruled, law had a small course, and finding by experience what fruits inluse such counsell as doth not best like the parties, was verie heauie, sorrowfull, and in great agonies.

whereupon innocente he called vnto him the keeper of his parke, with whom he fell out and quarreled, because (as he said) he was slothfull and careles, and did not walke in the nights about the parke, but suffered his game to be spoiled and his deere to be stolen, therefore he desired him to be more vigilant and careful of his charge: and also commanded him that if he met any man in his circuit and walke in the night time, and would not stand nor speake vnto him, he should not spare to kill him what so euer he were. This knight, hauing laid this foundation, and minding to performe what he had purposed for the ending of his dolefull daies, did in a certaine darke night secretlie conueie himselfe out of his house, and walked alone in his parke. Then the keeper in his night walke hearing one stirring and coming towards him, asked who was there: but no answer was made at all.

Then the keeper tolled him to stand, which when he would not do, the keeper nocked his arrow and shot into him, and killed him; who when he perceived that it was his maister, then he called to remembrance his maisters former commandement. And so this knight, otherwise learned and wise, being affraid to displease man, did displease God, and verie disorderlie ended his life. It is inrolled amongst the records of this cite, of a commission directed to John earle of Devonshire, & from him sent to the maior of the cite of Excestre to be proclaimed. The words be these: Decimo quarto die Aprilis, vix. in vigilia Pasche, An. 49. Hen. 6. commissio domini regis directa Iohanni comiti Devon. missa ad maiori v. proclamaretur. And likewise in an other place: Quatuor marcae sunt solute Iohanni comiti Devon. ex assensu maioris. Nowbeit, certaine it is there was no such earle of that name, onelie there was John Holland then living duke of Excestre, wherefore something is mistaken herein.

But was this a practise (thinke you) beſeeming a man of woſhip, learning, and indgement, to make auaie himſelfe, becauſe he ſaw a tempoꝛall interruption of his proſperitie : Suerlie how much learning ſo euer he had in the labors of the land, liſte at all or none (as appeareth) had he in ſuffering the forces of aduerſitie, whom the feare of it did ſo terrifie, that it dꝛoue him to his end. While therefore is the counſell of the comēdie-writer, and woꝛthy of imitation, that a man, when he is in beſt caſe and higheſt degꝛee of welfare, ſhould euen then meditate with himſelfe how to auaie with hardneſſe, with penurie, perils, loſſe, baniſhment, and other afflictions : for ſo ſhall he prepare himſelfe to beate them with patience when they happen : as ſouldiers trained by in militarie exerciſes at home, are ſo much the ſoꝛwarder for the field, ſitter to encounter their foes (with leſſe dread of danger) when they come abroad to be tried : and therefore it is wiſelle (& to the purpoſe) ſaid of Virgil :

But to returne to the princes affaires. When the faine was once spzed abroad that K. Edward was fled the reime, an innumerable number of people resorted to the earle of Warwicke to take his part, but all K. Edwards trustie friends went to diuerse sanctuaries, and amongst other his wiue quene Elizabeth toke sanctuary at Westminster, and there in great penurie forsaaken of all hir friends, was deli-uered of a faire son called Edward, which was with small pompe like a poore mans child chiffered, the godfathers being the abbat and prioz of Westminster, and the godmother the labie Scrope. [But what might be the heauinesse of this ladies hart (thinke we) upon consideration of so manie counterblasts of unhappinesse inwardlie conceived: Hir husband had taken flight, his adherents and hir friends sought to shroud themselves vnder the couert of a new protector, the diuinen in distresse forsaoke not that simple resuge which hir hard hap forced vpon hir; and (a kings wiue) wanted in hir necessitie such things as meane mens wiues had in superfluitie, & (a cozofue to a noble mind) a prince of renowned parentage was (by constraint of vnkinde fortune) not boughfated the solemnitie of chifferdome due and decent for so honorable a personage.]

The Kentithmen in this felon (whose minds be ever moueable at the change of princes) came to the suburbs of London, spoiled mansions, robbed barres-houses, and by the counsell of sir Gessrie Gates and other sanctuarie men, they brake vp the kings Bench and deliuered prisoners, and fell at Kitchiffe, Lime-house, & S. Katharins, to burning of houses, slaughter of people, and rauishing of women. Which small sparke had growne to a greater flame, if the earle of Marlowke with a great power had not suddenlie quenched it, and punished the offenders: which benefitt by him done, caused him much more to be esteemed and liked amongst the commons than he was before. When he had fettle all things at his pleasure, vpon the twelue daie of October he rode to the Tower of London, and there deliuered king Henrie out of the ward, where he before was kept, and brought him to the kings loddging, where he was serued according to his degree.

On the fix and twentieth day of the said moneth, the duke of Clarence accompanied with the earles of Marlowe and Shrewsburie, the lord Strange, and other lordes and gentlemen, some for feare, and some for loue, and some onelie to gaze at the wauning world, went to the Towler, and from thence brought king Henrie appareled in a long gowne of blew velvet, through London to the church of saint Paule, the people on euerie side the streets resiofing and crieng; God saue the king: as though ech thing had succeded as they would haue had it: and when he had offered (as kings vse to do) he was conuied to the bishops palace, where he kept his household like a king. Thus was the principallitie passed ouer sometimes to Henrie, sometimes to Edward; according to the waite of the partie preuailling: ambition and disdaine still casting fagots on the fire, whereby the heat of hatred gathered the greater force to the consumption of the peres and the destruction of the people. In the meane time, neither part could secretly possesse the regalitie, when they obtained it; which highmindednesse was in the end the overthrow of both principals and accessaries, according to the nature thereof noted in this discription by the poet:

Fastus habet licet, offensifastus abundat, Fastus ad interitum precipitare solet.]

When king Henrie had thus reapedt and eff-sions gotten his regall power and anthozitie, he called his high court of parlement to begin the six and twentieth day of November, at Westminster, in the which king Edward was adjudged a traitor to the countrie, and an usurper of the realme. His goods were confiscat and forfeited. The like sentence was given against all his partakers and friends. And besides this it was enacted, that such as for his sake were apprehended, and were either in captiuitie or at large upon suerties, should be extremelie punished according to their demerits, amongst whom was the lord Tiptoft earle of Worcester lieutenant for king Edward in Ireland, exercising there more extreme crueltie than princelie pietie, and namelie on two infants being sonnes to the earle of Desmond. [This earle of Worcester, being found in the top of an high thye, in the forest of Warbridge, in the countie of Huntingdon, was brought to London, and either for treason to him laid, or malice against him conceived, was atteinted, and beheaded at the Tower hill, and after buried at the Blacke friers.] Moreover, all statutes made by king Edward were clearlie revoked, and the crownes of the realmes of England and France were by authoritie of the same parlement intailed to king Henrie the first, and to his heires male; and for default of such heires, to remaine to George duke of Clarence, & to his heires male: and further, the said duke was enabled to be next heire to his father Richard duke of Yorke, and to take from him all his landes and dignities, as though he had bene his eldest sonne at the time of his death. Jasper earle of Penbroke, and John earle of Oxford, with diuerse other by king Edward atteinted, were restored to their old names, possessions, and ancient dignities.

Beside this, the earle of Marwicke, as one to whom the common-wealth was much bounden [and ever had in great fauour of the commons of this land, by reason of the exceeding household which he daile kept in all countreies where euer he sojourned or late: and when he came to London, he held such an house, that six oxen were eaten at a breakfast, and euerie tauerne was full of his meat, for who that had any acquaintance in that house, he should haue had as much sod and rost as he might carrie vpon a long dagger] he [I fate] was made gouernour of the realme, with whom as fellow was associat George duke of Clarence. And thus was the state of the realme quite altered. To this parlement came the marquesse Montacute, excusing himselfe, that for feare of death he declined to take king Edwards part, which excuse was accepted. When quene Margaret vnder stood by hir husbands letters, that the victorie was gotten by their friends, the with hir sonne prince Edward and hir traine entered their ships, to take their vantage into England: but the winter was so sharpe, the weather so stormie, and the wind so contrarie, that she was faine to take land againe, and to deferre hir iournie till another season.

Jasper earle
of Penbroke.

About the same season, Jasper earle of Penbroke went into Wales, to visit his lands in Penbroke shire, where he found lord Henrie sonne to his brother Edmund earle of Richmond, hauing not full ten yeares of age; he being kept in maner like a captiue, but honorable brought vp by the ladie Herbert, late wife to William earle of Penbroke, beheaded at Banburie (as ye before haue heard.) This Henrie was borne of Margaret the onelie daughter and heire of John the first duke of Summerset, then not being full ten yeares of age, the which ladie though she were after ioined in marriage with lord Henrie sonne to Humfreie duke of Buckingham, and after to Thomas Stanleie earle of Derby, both being young and apt for generation, yet she had neuer any more children, as though she had done hir part to bring forth a man child, and the same to be a king (as he after was indeed) intituled by the name of Henrie the seventh (as after ye shall heare.)

The earle of Penbroke took this child, being his nephew, out of the custodie of the ladie Herbert, and at his returne brought the child with him to London to king Henrie the first, whom when the king had a good while beheld, he said to such princes as were with him: Lo, suerlie this is he, to whom both we and our aduersaries leauing the possession of all things shall hereafter giue counte and place. So this holie man shewed before the chance that should happen, that this earle Henrie so ordeined by God, should in time to come (as he did indeed) haue and enjoy the kingdome and whole rule of this realme of England. So that it might seme probable by the coherence of holie Henries predictions with the issue falling out in truth with the same; that for the time he was indured with a propheticall spirit. And suerlie the epistle of titile of holie is not for naught attributed vnto him, for it is to be read in wilters, that he was by nature giuen to peaceablenesse, abhorring blood and slaughter, detesting ciuill tumults, addicted to deuotion, deuie frequent in praier, and not eschewing so highlie of courtlie gallantnesse as stood with the dignitie of a prince. In consideration wherof, he procured against himselfe an apostasie of his people both native and forren, who revolted and fell from fealtie. And whie? The reason is rendred by the same wilter, namelie:

Quod tales homines populus scelerator odit, Fastidit, desestatur: non conuenit inter Virtutem & vitium, lucem fugere tenebra.

The earle of Marwicke, vnderstanding that his enemye the duke of Burgognie had receiued king Edward, and meant to aid him for recouerie of the kingdome, he first sent ouer to Calis foure hundred archers on horsebacke to make warre on the dukes countreies; and further, prepared foure thousand balli-ant men to go ouer shortly, that the duke might haue his hands euen full of trouble at home. And where ye haue heard that the erle of Marwicke was kept out of Calis at his fleeing out of England into France, ye shall note that within a quarter of an houre after it was knowne that he was returned into England; and had chased king Edward out of the realme; not onelie monsieur de Clauclere, but also all other of the garrison & towne shewed themselves to be his friends; so that the ragged staffe was taken vp and weene in euerie mans cap, some wore it of gold enameled, some of silver; and he that could haue it neither of gold nor silver, had it of whitish silke or cloth: such wauering minds haue the common people, bending like a red with euerie wind that bloweth.

The duke of Burgognie, hauing an armie ready at the same time to invade the frontiers of France, to recouer the townes of saint Quintines and Amiens, latelie by the French king taken from him, doubted to be hindered greatly by the Englishmen, if he should be constrained to haue warre with them: for the duke of Burgognie held not onlie at that season Flanders, but also Bulleine, and Wallemois, and all Artois, so that he was thereby in danger to receiue harme out of Calis on each side. Wherefore he sent ambassadores thither, which did so much with the counsell there, that the league was newlie confirmed betwixt the realme of England and the dukes countreies; onelie the name of Henrie put in the witting in stead of Edward. This matter hindered soe the sute of king Edward, daile suing to the duke for aid at his hands, the more earnestlie indeed, because of such promises as by letters were made vnto him out of England, from his assured friends there.

But duke Charles would not consent openlie to aid king Edward; but yet secretlie vnder hand by others he lent vnto him fiftie thousand florens of the cross of St. Andrew, and further caused foure great ships to be appointed for him in the haven of de Clere, otherwile called Camphire in Zelano, which in those daies was free for all men to come unto, and the duke hired for him foureteene ships of the Easterlings well appointed, & for the more suertie took a bond of them to serve him trulie, till he were landed in England, and sixtene daies after. The Easterlings were glad of this tournie, trusting if he got againe the possession of England, they should the sooner come to a peace, and obtaine restitution of their liberties and franchises, which they claimed of former time to have within this realme. The duke of Burgogne cared not much, on whose side the victorie fell, saving for payment of his monie: for he would not saie, that he was friend to both parties, and either part was frendlie to him.

In daies, as he was brother in law to the one, so was he of kin to the other, as by his grandmother being daughter to John of Gant duke of Lancaster. When therefore all king Edwards furniture and provision for his tournie were once readie, having now with him about two thousand able men of warre, beside mariners, he entered into the ships with them, in the haven before flishing in Zelano, upon the second day of March: and because the wind fell not good for his purpose, he tarried still aboard for the space of nine daies, before it turned meet for his tournie. But after that the wind once came about (as he wished) the sails were hoisted up on the 11 of March being monday, & forward they sailed, directing their course straight over towards the coast of Dorsetholke. On the next day being tuesday, & the twelfth of March, toward the evening, they roode before Cromer, where the king sent to land sir Robert Chamberleine, with sir Gilbert Debenham knights, and divers other, to the end they might discover the countrie, and understand how the people within the land were bent towards him, especiallie those countries there next adjoining.

Upon their returne, he understood that there was no suertie for him to land in those parties, by reason of the good order which the earle of Marlowe, and the earle of Oxford speciallie had taken in that countrie to resist him: for not onelie the duke of Dorsetholke, but all other the gentlemen (whome the earle of Marlowe had in anie suspicion) were by letters of privie seale sent for, or else enforced to find suertie for their losall demeanour towards king Henrie: yet those knights and other that were thus sent forth to make inquirie, were well received of their friends, and had good cheare. But after the king perceived by their report, how things stood thereabouts, he caused his ships to make course towards the north parts.

The same night following, a great storme of winds and weather rose, soze troubling the seas, and continued till the fourteenth day of that moneth being thursday, on the which day with great danger, by reason of the tempestuous rage and torment of the troubled seas, he arrived at the head of Humber, where the other ships were scattered from him, each one severed from other; so that of necessitie they were driven to land in sundre where they best might, for doubt to be cast awate in that perillous tempest. The king with the lord Hastings his chamberleine, and other to the number of five hundred men being in one ship, landed within Humber on Holderness side, at a place called Haulenburgh, even in the same place where Henrie erle of Derby, after called king Henrie the fourth landed, when he came to depriue king Richard the second of the crowne, and to usurpe it to himselfe.

Richard duke of Glocester, and three hundred men in his companie, took land in another place foure miles distant from thence, where his brother king Edward did land. The earle Rivers, and with him two hundred men, landed at a place called Poole, foureteene miles from the haven where the king came on land. The residue of his people landed some here some there, in place where for their suerties they thought best. On the morrow, being the sixteenth of March, now that the tempest ceased, and everie man being got to land, they drew from everie of their landing places towards the king, who for the first night was lodged in a poore villiage, two miles from the place where he first set foot on land. (As for his traine, though the season of the yeere was naturallie cold, & therefore required competent refection by warmth, it is to be supposed, that all their lodgings were hard enough, with the principals provision was soze enough. But what of that? Better (in cases of extremite) an hard shift than none at all.)

Touchoing the folks of the countrie, there came few or none to him. For by the incensing of such as had bin sent into those parts from the erle of Marlowe, and other his aduersaries, the people were thewolle induced to stand against him. But yet, in respect of the good will that manie of them had borne to his father, they could have bene content, that he should have inioied his right to his due inheritance of the duchie of Yorke, but in no wise to the title of the crowne. And hereupon they suffered him to passe, not seeking to annoie him, till they might understand more of his purposed meaning. The king, perceiving how the people were bent, noised abroad that he came to make none other chalenge but to his inheritance of the duchie of Yorke: and withall ment to passe first into the citie of Yorke, and so forward towards London, to incounter with his aduersaries that were in the south parts.

For although his nearest waite had bene thorough Lincolnshire: yet because in taking that waite he must have gone againe to the water, in passing over Humber; he doubted least it would have bin thought that he had withdrawne himselfe to the sea for feare. And to avoid the rumors that might have bene spread thereof, to the hinderance of his whole cause, he refused that waite, and took this other, still yuting it (as before we said) that his coming was not to chalenge the crowne, but onelie to be restored unto his fathers right and inheritance of the duchie of Yorke, which was descended to him from his father. And here it seemed that the colour of justice hath ever such a force in it selfe amongst all men, that where before few or none of the commons could be found that would offer themselves to take his part: yet now that he did (as they thought) claime nothing but that which was his right, they began straight to have a liking of his cause.

And where there were gathered to the number of six or seven thousand men in diverse places, under the leading chieftie of a priest and of a gentleman called Martine de la Mare, in purpose to have stopped his passage: now the same persons took occasion to assist him. And when he perceived mens minds to be well qualified with this feined devile, he marched forth till he came to Beverleie, which stood in his direct waite as he passed toward Yorke. He sent also to Kingston upon Hull, distant from thence six miles, willing that he might be there received: but the inhabitants, who had bene laboured by his aduersaries, refused in anie wise to grant thereunto.

The earle of Marlowe advertised by messengers of king Edwards arrivall, and of his turning toward Yorke, with all hast wrote to his brother the marquesse Montacute, who had laine at the castell of Domfret all the last winter with a great number of

of soldiers, willing him to consider in what case their affaires stood, and thereupon with all speed to set upon king Edward, or else to keepe the passages, and to staie him from comming anie further forward, till he himselfe as then being in Warwicke thre buis to assemble an armie, might come to his aid with the same. [Thus laboured the earle of Warwicke by policie and puissance, as well of his owne as others power, to further his owne purpose, hauing sworne in heart a due performance of that, which he had solemnlie vowed and promised before.]

But this notwithstanding, although there were great companies of people of the countries there abouts assembled, yet they came not in sight of the king, but suffered him quietly to passe; either because they were persuaded that he went (as he in outward words pretended) not to claime anie title to the crowne, but onelie his right to the duchie of Yorke; or else for that they doubted to set upon him, although his number were farre vnquall to theirs; knowing that not onelie he himselfe, but also his companie were minded to sell their liues dearelie, before they would shynke an inch from anie that was to incounter them. It maie be that diuerse of the captiues also were corrupted: and although outwardlie they shewed to be against him, yet in heart they bare him right good will, and in no wise minded to hinder him. So forward he marched, till he came to Yorke, on a monday being the eighteenth day of March.

Before he came to the citie by the space of thre miles, the recorder of Yorke, whose name was Thomas Coniers (one knotone in deed not to beare him anie faithfull good will) came vnto him; & gaue him to vnderstand, that it stood in no wise with his swerthe, to presume to approach the citie: for either he should be kept out by force, or if he did enter, he should be in danger to be cast away by his aduersaries that were within. King Edward neuertheless, sith he was come thus farre forward, knew well enough there was no going backe for him, but manfullie to proceed forward with his begun iournie, and therefore kept on his way. And shortly after there came to him out of the citie, Robert Clifford, and Richard Burgh, who assured him that in the quarrell which he pretended to pursue, to wit, for the obtaining of his right to the duchie of Yorke, he should not faile but be receiued into the citie.

But immediatlie after came the said Coniers againe, with the like tale and information as he had brought before. And thus king Edward one while put in comfort, and another while discouraged, marched forth till he came to the gates of the citie, where his people staied; whilst he and about fiftene or seuentene other such as he thought meetest, went forth and entered the citie with the said Clifford & Burgh. And (as some write) there was a priest readie to saie masse, in which masse time the king receiued the sacrament of the communion, & there solemnlie swore to keepe and obserue two speciall articles: although it was farre unlike that he minded to obserue either of them: the one was that he should vse the citizens after a gentle and courteous maner: and the other, that he should be faithfull and obedient vnto king Henries commandements.

For this wilfull perjurie (as hath bene thought) the issue of this king suffered (for the fathers offense) the deprivation not onelie of lands and worldly possessions, but also of their naturall liues, by their cruell uncle R. Richard the third. [And it may well be. For it is not likelie that God, in whose hands is the bestowing of all soueraintie, will suffer such an indignitie to be done to his sacred maieste, and will suffer the same to passe with impunitie, And surely, if an oth among priuate men is religi-ouslie to be kept, sith in the same is an exact triall of faith and honestie; doubtlesse of princes it is verie nicelie and perfectlie to be obserued: yea they should rather susteine a blemish and disgrace in their realtie, than presume to go against their oth and promise, speciallie if the same stand vpon conditions of equalitie: other wise they proue themselves to be impugnors of fidelitie, which is a iewel surpassing gold in price and estimation, as the poet prudentlie saith:

Charior est auro non simulate fides.

When king Edward had thus gotten into the citie of Yorke, he made such meanes among the citizens, that he got of them a certeine summe of monie; and leauing a garison within the citie contrarie to his oth, for feare least the citizens after his departure, might hapilie moue some rebellion against him, he set forward the next day toward Doncaster, a towne ten miles from thence, belonging to the earle of Northumberland. The next day he took his waie toward Wakefield and Sendall, a castell and lordship belonging to the inheritance of the dukes of Yorke, leauing the castell of Pomfret vpon his left hand, where the marques Montacute with his armie laie, and did not once offer to stop him.

Whether the marques suffered him to passe by so, with his good will or no, diuerse haue diuerslie coniectured. Some thinke that it lay not in the power of the marques greatlie to annoie him, both for that the king was well beloued in those parties; & againe, all the lords & commons there for the most part were towards the earle of Northumberland, and without him or his commandement they were not willing to stirre. And therefore the earle in sitting still and not moving to and fro, was thought to do king Edward as good seruice as if he had come to him, and raised people to assist him; for diuerse hapilie that should haue come with him, remembryng displeasures past, would not haue bene so faithfull as the earle himselfe, if it had come to the lumpe of anie hazard of battell.

About Wakefield and the parts there adioining, some companie of his frends came to him, whereby his power was increased; but nothing in such numbers as he looked for. From Wakefield he crossed on the left hand, so to come againe into the high waie, and came to Doncaster, and from thence vnto Nottingham. Here came to him sir William Barre, and sir James Harrington, with six hundred men well armed and appointed: also there came to him sir Thomas Burgh, & sir Thomas Montgomerie with their aids, which caused him at their first comming to make proclamation in his owne name, to wit, of R. Edward the fourth, boldly affirming to him, that they would serue no man but a king.

Whilst he remained at Nottingham, and also before he came there, he sent abroad diuerse of his auant contrers to discourge the countrie, and to vnderstand if there were anie power gathered against him. Some of them that were thus sent, approached to Spetwarke, and vnderstood that within the towne there, the duke of Excester, the earle of Orenford, the lord Warbolse, and other were lodged with a great power to the number of foure thousand men, which they had assembled in Essex, Northfolke, Suffolke, and in the shires of Cambridge, Huntington, and Lincoln. The duke of Excester, and the earle of Orenford, with other the chiefe captiues, aduertised that king Edwards foreriders had bene afore the towne in the evening, supposed hereof that he and his whole armie were comming towards them.

Whereupon, they not thinking it good to abide longer there, determined with all speed to dislodge, and so about two of the clocke after midnight they departed from Spetwarke, leauing some of their people ple behind, which either shal awake from them, and tard of purpose, or could not get awake so soon as their fellows. In deed the foreriders that so discou-red them within the towne of Newmarke, advertised the king thereof in all post haste, who incontinentlie assembled his people, and forthwith marched towards them; but before he came within three miles of the towne, he had knowledge that they were fled and gone from Newmarke. Whereupon he returned again to Nottingham, intending to keepe on his nee-rest waie towards the earle of Warwicke, whome he understood to be departed from London, and to be come into Warwicke shire, where in the countreies adjoining he was busied in levelling an armie, with the which he purposed to distress him.

The king then from Nottingham came to Leicester, where three thousand able men, and well furnished for the warre came unto him. These were such as he knew would live and die in his quarrell, the most part of them belonging unto the lord Hastings the kings chamberlaine. And thus he, being more strongly accompanied than before, departed from Leicester, and came before the walls of the citie of Coventrie, the nine and twentieth daie of March. The earle of Warwicke was withdrawne into this citie, keeping himselfe inclosed therein with his people, being in number six or seven thousand men. The king sent to him, and willed him to come forth into the field, and there to make an end of the quarrell in plaine battell; but the earle at that present refused so to do.

For although, under pretence of king Henries anthonie, he was reputed the kings generall lieutenant of the whole realme, whereby he had got such power together, as was thought able enough to match with the king for number; yet because he doubted how they were bent in his favour, he durst not commit the matter unto the doubtful chance of battell, till he had more of his trustie friends about him. The king therefore three daies together prouoked him to come forth, but when he saw it would not be, he removed to Warwicke an eight miles from Coventrie, where he was received as king, and so made his proclamations from that time forth in all places where he came, under his accustomed name and title of king.

He lodged here at Warwicke, the rather (as was thought) to provoke the earle to issue forth of Coventrie to give him battell, howbeit that denie nothing availed. But yet there came daile diverse persons on the earls behalfe to treat with the king about a peace, that some good composition might have bene concluded; & the king for the advancement of peace and tranquillitie within the realme, offered large conditions; as a free pardon of life to the earle, and all his people, with many other beneficiall articles on their behalves, which to manie seemed verie reasonable, considering their heinous offenses. But the earle would not accept any offers; except he might have compounded so as it pleased himselfe, & as was thought in no wise to stand with the kings honour, and libertie of his estate.

In this meane while, the earle of Warwicke still looked for the duke of Clarence, who by the said earls appointment had assembled a power of men of war about London; but when the earle perceived that the duke lingered forth the time, and did not use such diligence as was requisite, as one that had bene in doubt of warre or peace, he began to suspect that the duke was of his brother corrupted, and therein he was nothing deceived. For true it is, that whilest the king was as yet beyond the seas, in the dominion of the duke of Burgonie, the duke of Clarence began to weie with himselfe the great inconvenience into the which as well his brother king Edward, as himselfe and his yonger brother the duke of Gloucester were fallen, through the dissention betwixt them: (which had bene compalled and brought to passe by the politike working of the earle of Warwicke and his complices.)

As first the dissentering of them all from their right full title to the crowne; secondlie the mortall and detestable war that could not but insue betwixt them, to such mischance, that to whether part the victorie inclined, the victor should remaine in no more suertie of his owne person or estate after the upper hand got, than before; and thirdlie he well perceived alreadie, that he was had in great suspicion, and not heartilie beloued of any the lords and rulers that were assured partakers with king Henrie and the Lancastrian faction: insomuch they sticke not daile to go about to breake and make void the appointments, articles, and covenants, made and promised to him, and of likelihood would daile more and more intend thereto: for in truth he saw, that they purposed nothing so much as the destruction both of him and all his blood.

All which things throughlie considered, with manie other as they were laid afoze him by right wise and circumspect persons, which in this behalfe had conference with him, he consented that by some secret waies and meanes a reconciliation might be had betwixt him and his brethren, the king and the duke of Gloucester. The which to bring to some good and full effect, these honorable personages following became dealers therein. First of all the duchess of Borgie their mother, the duchess of Excester, and the duches of Suffolke their sisters; the lord cardinal of Canturburie, the bishop of Bath, the earle of Essex; but most speciallie the duchess of Burgonie their sister also, and diverse other right wise and prudent personages, who wrought by mediation of certeine preests, and others, such as they bled for messengers betwixt them.

Finallie, by the earnest travell and diligence shewed by the said duchess of Burgonie (who incessantlie sent to and fro such hir trustie messengers now to the king being on that side the seas, and then to the duke remaining here in England) at length they were made friends, and a perfect agreement concluded and ratified, with assurance betwixt them so strong-lie as might be. To the furthering whereof the kings chamberlaine the lord Hastings failed not to do his best, so as by his good diligence, it was thought the king was the sooner induced to wish to some ef-fones in true friendship with his said brother of Clarence. And as it well appeared, the duke of Clarence acquitted himselfe faithfully therein.

For hearing now that his brother king Edward was landed and coming forthward towards London, he gathered his people, outwardlie pretending to passe with them to the aid of the earle of Warwicke against his brother: although inwardlie he meant the contrarie, and so accompanied with about four thousand men, he marched forth towards the place where he thought to find his brother. King Edward being then at Warwicke, and understanding that his brother of Clarence approached, in an after-none issued forth of that towne with all his forces, and passed on till he came into a faire large field three miles distant from Warwicke towards Banburie, where he might behold his brother of Clarence in good array of battell, comming towards him.

When they were now within halfe a mile appro-ched together, the king placed his people in order of battell under their baners, and so left them standing still, and appointed them to keepe their ground, whilest he taking with him his brother of Gloucester, the lord Buchan, in

p. 41. 133.

Rivers, the lord Hastings, & a few other, went forth to meet his brother of Clarence: and in like sort the duke of Clarence took with him a few of the nobilitie that were about him, and leaving his armie in good order, departed from them to meet the king, and so they met betwixt both the hoasts, with so sweet salutations, loving demeanour, and good countenances, as better might not be devised betwixt brethren of so high and noble estate. And what a hearts joy was this to the people, to see such an accord and mutuall attonement betwene these peeres! It was the onelie pleasure in the world, to the which all other compared are but countrefet, and that doth the psalmist testifie,

Nil charitate mutua fratrum, nihil Incundum concordia.

Besides this, the like friendlie intertainment, and courteous demeanour appeared in the salutations of other noble men that were on them attendant; whereof all such as saw it, and loved them, greatlie rejoiced; giving God thanks for that sofull meeting, brittle, and concord, appearing thus manifestlie betwixt them: and herewith the trumpets and other instruments sounded, & the king withall brought the duke unto his armie, whom he saluting in most courteous wise, welcomed them into the land; and they humbly thanking him, did to him such reverence as appertained to the honour of such a worthy personage. This was a goodlie and a gracious reconcilment, beneficiall to the princes, profitable to the peeres, and pleasurable to the people, whose part had bene depeest in dangers and losse, if discord had not bene discontinued.

This done, the king leaving his hoast againe, keeping their ground with the same few persons which he took with him before, went with his brother of Clarence unto his armie, and saluting them with sweete and courteous words, was sofullie of them welcomed: and so after this, they all came togither joining in one. And either part shewing themselves glad thus to meet as friends with the other, they went lovinglie togither unto Warwicke with the king, where and in the countrie thereabouts they lodged, as they thought stood most with their ease and safeties. Herewith the duke of Clarence desired above all things to procure some good and perfect accord betwixt his brother the king, and the earle of Warwicke.

Clarence seeketh to make peace betwixt the king and
Warwicke.

In this was he the more studious, because he saw that such an accord should bring great quietnesse to the land, and delivier the common-wealth of manie dangers that might insue by reason of such numbers of partakers, as well lords as other that were confederat with the earle. The said duke treated with the king present, and sent messengers unto Conventrie to the earle, moving as well the one as the other most instantlie to frame their minds unto a pacification. The king at the instance of his brother was contented to offer large conditions, and verie beneficiall for the earle and his partakers, if they would have accepted them.

But the earle, whether bitterlie despairing of his owne safetie, if he should agree to any peace; or else happlie for that he thought it stood with his honour to stand unto such promises and covenants as he had made with the French king, and with the queene Margaret, and his sonne prince Edward (to whom he was bound by oth not to shew any favour from the same) he refused all manner of such conditions as were offered. In much that when the duke had sent to him, both to excuse himselfe of the same which he had done, and also to require him to take some good waie with king Edward, now while he might, the earle after he had patientlie heard the dukes message, he seemed greatlie to abhorre his unfaithfull dealing, in turning thus from his confederats and allies, contrary to his oth and fidelitie.

To the messengers (as some write) he gave none other answer but this, that he had rather be like himselfe, than like a false and perfured duke; and that he was fullie determined neuer to leave warre, till he had either lost his owne life, or bitterlie subdued his enemies. As it was thought, the earle of Devonshires persuasion wanted not, to make him the more listlie to hold out; and rather to trie the bittermost hazard of warre, than to agree to acknowledge king Edward for his lawfull sovereign lord and king. Whereupon no appointment nor any agreement at all could be brought to passe; and so all that treatie, which the duke of Clarence had procured, brake off & toke none effect. There came to the earle of Warwicke, whilste he lay thus at Conventrie (besides the earle of Devonshires) the duke of Gloucester, and the lord marquisse Montacute, by whose coming that side was greatlie strengthened, and the number much increased.

The king, upon consideration hereof, and perceiving he could not get the earle to come forth of Conventrie, departed from Warwicke, and escones the loving himselfe with his people before the citie of Conventrie, desired the earle and his power to come forth into the fields, that they might end their quarrell by battell: which the earle and the other lords with him bitterlie refused as then to do. This was the first of April being fridaie. The king hereupon was resolved to march towards London, where his principall adherentie king Henrie remained, using his kinglie authority by diversie such of the nobilitie as were about him, whereby king Edward was barred and dis-appointed of manie aids and assistants, which he was sure to have, if he could once breake that force of the royal authority, that was still thus exercised against him in king Hentries name.

Wherefore (by the aduise of his brethren and others of his counsell) accordinglie as it had bene ordained before this his last setting forth from Warwicke, he kept on his waie towards London, coming to Dantrie on the saturday at night: & on the morrow being Palmesunday, he heard service in the church there, & after rode to Northampton, where he was sofullie received. From thence he took the next way towards London, leaving continuallie behind him (as he passed forth) a competent band of speares and archers, to heat backe such of the earle of Warwicks people, as peradventure he might send abroad to trouble him and his armie by the waie. Which providence and foresight he thought it not unnecessary to use; for that he knew well enough, that the heart of an enimie, friend in the fire of hateful hostility, will pretermitt no opportunitie, either of time or place to laie in wait for his destruction, against whom he beareth an inward grudge, with a desire of vengeance to the death.

In this meane while, that things passed in manner (as before we have heard) Edmund duke of Summerset, & his brother John marquisse Dorset, Thomas Courtneie earle of Devonshires, and others being at London, had knowledge by advocations out of France, that queene Margaret with her sonne prince Edward, the countesse of Warwicke, the pils of St. Johns, the lord Wenlocke, and diversie others their adherents and partakers, with all that they might make, were ready at the sea side, purposing with all speed to saile over into England, and to arrive in the west countrie. Whereupon they departed forth of London, and with all hast possible drew westward, there to raise what forces they could, to come with those their friends, immediatlie after they should once come on land, and so to assist them against king Edward.

True it is, that the quene with hir sonne, and the other persons before mentioned, took their ships, the four and twentieth daie of March, continuing on the seas before they could land (thorough tempests and contrarie winds) by the space of twentie daies, that is, till the thirteenth of Aprill: on which daie, or rather on the fourteenth, they landed at Westmouth, as after shall appeare. But now touching king Edwards proceeding forward on his iourne toward London, ye haue to vnderstand, that vpon the Tuesday the ninth of Aprill he came to saint Albons, from whence he sent comfortable aduertisements to the quene his wife remaining within the sanctuarie at Westminster, and to others his faithfull friends in and about London, to vnderstand by couert meanes how to deale to obtaine the fauour of the citizens, so as he might be of them receiued.

The earle of Marlowe, vnderstanding all his doings and purposes, wrote to the Londoners, willing & charging them in arie wise to keepe king Edward out of their citie, and in no condition to permit him to enter: and withall he sent to his brother the archbishop of Poike, willing him by all meanes possible to persuade the Londoners not to receiue him; but to defend the citie against him for the space of two or thre daies at the least: promising not to faile but to come after him, and to be ready to assaile him on the backe, not doubting but wholie to distresse his power and to bring him to utter confusion. The archbishop hereupon, on the ninth of Aprill, called vnto him at Paules, all such lords, knights, and gentlemen, with others that were partakers on that side, to the number in all of six or seauen thousand men in armour.

Herevith also he caused king Henrie to mount on horsebacke, and to ride from Paules thorough Cheape downe to Watpoeke, & so to fetch a compass (as the custome was when they made their generall processions) returning backe againe to Paules vnto the bishops palace, where at that time he was lodged. The archbishop supposed, that shewing the king thus riding thorough the streets, he should haue allured the citizens to assist his part. True it is, the mayor & aldermen had caused the gates to be kept with watch and ward: but now they well perceived that king Henries power was too weak, as by that they saw it had well appeared, so to make full resistance against king Edward, and so not for them to trust vnto, if king Edward came forward, and should attempt to enter the citie by force: for it was not unknowne vnto them, that manie of the worshipfull citizens, and others of the commons in great numbers, were faine bent to aid king Edward, in all that they might, as occasion served.

Thus, that thorough lone that manie bare to king Edward, and that thorough feare that diuerse stood in, least the citie being taken by force might happlie haue bene put to the sacche, with the losse of manie an innocent mans life, the mayor, aldermen, and others the worshipfull of the citie fell at a point among themselves, to keepe the citie to king Edwards use, so as he might haue free passage and entrie into the same at his pleasure. The archbishop of Poike, perceiving the affections of the people, and how the most part of them were now bent in fauour of king Edward vpon the said kings approach towards the citie, he sent forth secretly a messenger to him, beseeching him to receiue him againe into his fauour, promising to be faithfull to him in time to come, and to acquit this good turne hereafter with some singular benefit and pleasure.

The king, vpon good causes and considerations therevnto him moving, was contented to receiue him againe into his fauour. The archbishop hereof assured, reioiced greatly, well & truly acquitting him concerning his promise made to the king in that behalf. The same night following was the Tower of London recovered to king Edwards use. And on the morowe being Thursday, and the eleuenth of Aprill, king Edward quietly made his entrie into the citie with his power, hauing five hundred noble gunners marching foremost, being strangers, of such as he had brought ouer with him. He first rode vnto Paules church, & from thence he went to the bishops palace, where the archbishop of Poike presented himselfe vnto him, and hauing king Henrie by the hand, deliuered him vnto king Edward, who being seized of his person, and diuerse other his aduersaries, he went from Paules to Westminster, where he made his deuout prayers, giuing God most heartie thanks for his safe returne thither againe.

This done, he went to the quene to comfort hir, who with great patience had abidden there a long time, as a sanctuarie woman, for doubt of hir enemies; and in the meane season was deliuered of a young prince, whome she now presented vnto him, for his great hearts reioicing & comfort. From Westminster the king returned that night vnto London againe, hauing the quene with him, and lodged in the house of the duchesse his mother. On the morowe being good Friday, he tooke advice with the lords of his blood, and other of his counsell, for such business as he had in hand; namelie, how to subdue his enemies as sought his destruction. Thus with consultation preuenting his actions, he obtained fortunate successe, wherewith his hart was the more advanced to some issue with his aduersaries, whome (rather than they should triumph ouer him) he was resolute minded to vanquish, if his proceedings might proue prosperous as his present good lucke.

The earle of Marlowe, calling himselfe lieutenant of England, vnder the pretended authoritie of king Henrie, hoping that king Edward should haue much ado to enter into London, marched forth from Couentrie with all his puissance, following the king by Northampton, in hope to haue some great advantage to assaile him, speciallie if the Londoners kept him out of their citie, as he trusted they would; for then he accounted himselfe sure of the upper hand: or if he were of them rescued, yet he hoped to find him vnprepared in celebrating the feast of Easter, and so by setting vpon him on the sudden, he doubted not by that meanes to distresse him. But king Edward, hauing intelligence of the earles intention, provided all things necessarie for battell, & hearing that the earle of Marlowe was now come vnto saint Albons with his armie, he determined to march forth to encounter him before he should approach neare the citie.

The earle of Marlowe, accompanied with John duke of Excester, Edmund duke of Summertset, John earle of Oxford, and John Penill marquisse Montacute his brother, vnderstanding that king Edward was not onelie receiued into London, but also had got king Henrie into his hands, perceived that the result of the matter must needs be committed to the hazard of battell, and therefore being come to the towne of saint Albons, he rested there a while, partly to refresh his soldiers, and partly to take counsell how to proceed in his enterprise. At length, although he knew that his brother the marquisse Montacute was not faine well persuaded with himselfe, to like of his quarrell which they had in hand, yet the brotherlie affection betwixt them tooke auaile all suspicion from the earle, and so he utterly resolved to giue battell, meaning to trie thereto all his might, not to prosecute that with the sword, which he had so kennele bolued to down his word.]

Yerbyon remoued they towards Barnet, a towne standing in the midwaie betwixt London and saint Albons aloft on a hill; at the end whereof towards saint Albons there is a faire plaine for two armies to meet vpon, named Gladmoze heath. On the further side of which plaine towards saint Albons the earle fight his campe. King Edward on the other part, being furnished with a mightie armie (hauing ioined to that poluer which he brought with him certeine new supplies) vpon Easter euen the thirtieth of Aprill in the after none marched forth, hauing his said armie diuided into foure battells. He toke with him king Henrie, and came that euening vnto Barnet, ten small miles distant from London; in which towne his foreriders finding certeine of the earle of Warwikes foreriders, beat them out, & chased them somewhat further than halfe a mile from the towne, where, by an hedge side they found readie assembled a great number of the earle of Warwikes people.

The king after this comming to Barnet, would not suffer a man to remaine in the towne (that were of his host) but commanded them all to the field, and with them drew toward his enemies, and lodged with his armie more nere to them than he was aware of, by reason it was darke, so as he could not well discern where they were incamped, fortifying the field the best he could for feare of some sudden inuasion. He toke his ground not so enen afore them as he would haue done, if he might haue discovered the place where they had lien; and by reason thereof he incamped somewhat afooe slips of them, causing his people to keepe as much silence as was possible, [least making any noise with the buseling of their armour and weapons or otherwise with their tongues, the enimie might haue come to some knowledge of the kings private purpose, and so by preuention haue disappointed his policie by some ppointed deuise; which because they wanted for the present time, it turned to their disadvantage; after the old prouerbe:

They had great artillerie on both parts, but the earle was better furnished therewith than the king, and therefore in the night time they shot off from his campe in maner continually; but doing little hurt to the kings people, till ouershotting them, by reason they late much narer than the earle or any of his men did esteem. And such silence was kept in the kings campe, that no noise betrayed them where they late. For so the end it should not be knowne to the enemies, how nere the king with his armie was lodged vnto them, the king would not suffer any of his gunnes to all that night to be shot off, least thereby they might haue gessed the ground, and so leuelled their artillerie to his annoyance.

Careles on the next morning betwixt foure and five of the clocke, notwithstanding there was a great mist that letted the sight of both parts to discover the fields, the king aduanted his banners, and caused his trumpets to sound to the battell. On the other part, the earle of Warwike, at the beie beake of the daie, had likewise set his men in order of battell in this maner. In the right wing he placed the marquisse Montacute, and the earle of Arford with certeine horsemen, and he with the duke of Gloucester toke the left wing. And in the middell betwene both, he set archers, appointing the duke of Summarset to guide them as their chiefeine. King Edward had set the duke of Gloucester in the foreward. The middell ward he himselfe with the duke of Clarence, hauing with them king Henrie, his sole & gouerne. The lord Hastings led the reerward, and beside these three battells, he kept a compaignie of fresh men in store, which did him great pleasure before the end of the battell.

Here is to be remembred, that aswell the king on his part, as the earle of Warwike on his, used manie comfortable words to encourage their people, not forgetting to set forth their quarrels as iust and lawfull; the king naming his aduersaries traitors and rebels, & the earle accounting him a tyrant, & an inuious usurper. But when the time came that they once got sight either of other, the battell began verie sharpe and cruell, first with shot, and after by ioining at hand blowes. Yet at the first they toined not front to front, as they should haue done, by reason of the mist that toke auaie the sight of either armie, and suffered the one not to discern perfectly the order of the other; insomuch that the one end of the earle of Warwikes armie ouerrought the contrarie end of the kings battell which stood westward, and by reason thereof (through the balliance of the earle of Arford which led the earles toward) the kings people on that part were ouermatched, so that manie of them fled towards Barnet, and so to London, bringing newes that the earle of Warwike had towne the field.

[Which report happlie might haue bene iustified and fallen out to be true, had not preposterous fortune happened to the earle of Arford and his men, who had a sharre with streames on their lueries; as king Edwards men had the sunne with streames on their lueries: whereupon the earle of Warwikes men, by reason of the mist not well discerning the badges so like, shot at the earle of Arfords men that were on their owne part, and then the earle of Arford and his men cried treason, and fled with eight hundred men.]

But touching the kings people which were pursued in the chase as they fled, and were put to the worst, manie were wounded, and manie slaine outright. But the residue of those that fought in other parts could not perceiue this distress of the kings people, because the thicke mist would not suffer them to see any space farre off, but onelie at hand; and so the kings battell that saw not any thing what was done beside them, was nothing discouraged. For (as few excepted that stood next to that part) there was not any one that wist of that discomfort; and the other of the earle of Warwikes men, that fought in other places somewhat distant from them, were nothing the more encouraged by this prosperous successe of their fellows, for they perceived it not. And in like sort as at the west end the earles battell ouerreached the kings, so at the east end the kings over-reached the earle, and with like successe put the earles people in that place to the worst.

At length after long fight, and greater slaughter made on both sides, king Edward hauing the greater number of men (as somewhat before, though other as firme the contrarie began some what to preuaile; but the earle on the other side remembering his ancient fame and renowne, manfully stucke to it, and encouraged his people, still supplying with new succors in places where he saw expedient) was in the fight renewed more cruell, fierce, & bloodie than before, insomuch that the battell remained still doubtful, though they had fought from morning till it was now far in the daie. King Edward therefore willing to make a rend of so long a contest, caused new poluer of fresh men (which he had for this purpose kept in store) to set on his enemies.

The earle of Warwike was nothing abashed herewith, but understanding that this was all the residue of king Edwards power, comforted his men to beare out this last brunt, and in so doing the victorie was side on their side, and the battell at an end; but king Edward so manfully and valiantly assailed his aduersaries, in the middle and strongest part of

of their battell, that with great violence he bare downe all that stood in his waie; for he was followed and assisted by a number of most hardie and faithfull men of warre, that shewed notable proofe of tried manhood in that instant necessitie. The earle of Warwicke (when his souldiers all wearied with long fight, and soe weakened with woundes and hurts re-celined in the battell) gaue little heed to his words (being a man of an inuincible stomack) rushed into the middest of his enimies, whereas he (aduenturing so farre from his companie, to kill and slea his aduersaries, that he could not be rescued) was amongst the preasse of his enimies stricken downe and slaine.

The marquessle Pontacute, thinking to succour his brother, was likewise overthworne and slaine, with manye other of good calling, as knights and esquires, befere other gentlemene. [But some saie that the said marquessle, having agreed pyllie with king Edward, did weare his luerie, whome one of his brother the earle of Warwicks men espiong, fell vpon him and killed him outright.] Some wyite that this battell was so dyuene to the vttermoost point, that king Edward was constrained to fight in his owne person, and that the earle of Warwike, which was wont euer to ride on horsebacke from place to place, and from ranke to ranke, comforting his men, was now aduised by the marquessle his brother, to leaue his horse, and to trie the extremitie by hand strokes, [which may be probable & likelie. But by the report of some it seemeth that he was not slaine in the heat of the conflict, among the rout of the fighting men, but afterwards in this sort. For when he saw the kings power periaile and his owne foze impaired and past hope of good speed, with the slaughter of his adherents (gentlemen of name) and himselfe in the verie mouth of the enimie in possibilitie to be denoured, he kept vpon a horse to flie, and comming into a wood where was no passage, one of king Edwards men came to him, killed him, and spoiled him to the naked skin. Sir William Cirrell knight was killed on the earle of Warwicks part.]

On both parties were slaine (as Ed. Hall saith) ten thousand at the least, where Fabian saith but fifteene hundred and somewhat above. After whiche that there died in all about thre thousand. Upon the kings part were slaine, the lord Crumwell, the lord Saine, the lord Montions sonne and heire, sir Humfre Bourcier lonie to the lord Berners, and diuerse other knights, squiers, and gentlemen. The batell ended the space of thre hours herie doubtfull by reason of the mist, and in skirmishing and fighting, now in this place, now in that, but finallie the victorie fell on the kings side; and yet it could not be esteemed that his holie armie passed nine thousand fighting men (as some write) where his aduersaries (as by the same writers appeareth) were farre about that number. But because those that so write, seeme altogether to fauor king Edward, we maie beleue as we list.

The duke of Summerfet, and the earle of Orford fled in companie of certeine northerne men, which had bene at the battell, and (as some wyte) the earle of Orford kept forth with them, and retired after into Scotland. But yet as well the duke of Summerfet, as the said earle of Orford, in fleeing toward Scotland, changed their purpose upon the waie, and turned into Wales to Jasper earle of Penbrok. The duke of Crefester being stricken downe and sore wounded, was left for dead in the field, amongst other the dead bodies, because he was not known, and by reason the reof committing to himselfe, got up, and in great danger escaped unto Welfminster, and there toke sanctuary. [But some say, that after he had lien in the field, spoiled, wounded, and (to say to) void of life, from seven of the clocke in the morning, till foure at after none, he was caried to a seruants house of his there by (named Authland) where (after his wounds were searched and dyessed by a surgian) he was conueied into Westminster sanctuarie.]

King Edward hauing got this viciozie, refreshing himselfe and his people a while at Barnet, returned the same daie vnto London, like a triumphant conqueror, leading with him king Henric as a captiue prisoner : & fo making a solemne entrie at the church of saint Paule, offred his standard. The dead bodies of the earle and marques were brought to London in a coffin, & before they were buried, by the space of three daies laie open visaged in the cathedrall church of S. Paule, to the intent that all men might easilie perceiue, that they vnseineable were dead. The common buzzet ran, that the king was not so ieiuous of the erles death, as sorrowfull for the losse of the marques, whoin he full well knew (and no lesse was euident to other) to be his faithfull friend and well-willer ; for whose onelie sake, he caused both their bodies to be buried with their ancestors in the priorie of William.

On the tuesdaye in Easter weeke came knowledge to king Edward, that quene Margaret the wife of king Henrie, with hir sonne prince Edward was landed vpon Easter day at Weimouth in Dor-setshire, accompanied with John Longbrother prioz of saint Johns, commonlie called lord tresauror of England, who went ouer into France to fetch them : also the lord Wenloche, a man made onelie by king Edward, beside diuerse other knights and esquiers, of whome part had bene long forth of the realme, and part newlie gone ouer thither to them, in com-panie of the lord tresauror. They toke their ships at Hundue, the foure and twentieth of March (as before you haue heard) but through contrarie winds and tempestes, they were driuen backe, and constrained to abide for conuenient wind.

Now, although it came sometimes about fifteen for their purpose, yet it continued not long in that end; so as if thereupon they took the sea at any time, they were forced to returne backe againe to land, yet they could passe halfe the way ouer. And thus being diuerse times vnder saile, in hope to passe the seas hither into England, they were still diuen backe againe, till the thirtieth of Aprill being Easter euen-on which day the wind comming fauorablie about, they took the seas, and sailed forward towards this land. The countesse of Warwicke, hauing a ship of aduantage, arriued before the other at Dorsetmouth, and from thence she went to Southhampton, meaning to haue gone to Wilemouth, where she vnder-stood that the queene was landed: but here had she knowledge of the losse of Warner field, and that hir husband was there slaine. Whereupon she went no further towards the queene, but secretlie got hir ouer the water into the new forest, and took sanctuarie within the abbey of Beaulieu.

Quene Margaret, and hir sonne prince Edward, with the other that landed at Welmouth, went from thence to an abbeye nere by called Cerne. Whither came vnto them Edmund duke of Summerset, and Thomas Conrincie earle of Denonshire, with others, and welcommed them into England, confirming the quene in the best maner they could, and willed hir not to be paire of god successe; for albeit they had lost one field (whereof the quene had knowledge) the same day being mondaye in eafter weeke, the fifteenth of Aprill, and was therefore right forowfull) yet they doubted not but to assemble such a puissance (and that verie shortly) south of diuerse parts of the realme, as being faithfull, and wholy bent to spend their liues, and shed the best blond in their bodies for hir sake, & hir sonnes, it should be hard for king Edward to resist them with all the powler he had & could.

The presence of these noble men greatlie comforted hir, and relieved hir of the sorowes that in manner overwhelmed hir pensive heart: for she doubted for the end of all these proceedings, the which they concluded to follow upon the advancement of hir and hers. Speciallie it misgaue hir, that some evil should chance to hir sonne prince Edward, for she greatlie feared not of hir owne perill (as she hir selfe confessed) and therefore she would gladlie have had them either to have deferred the battell till a more convenient time: or else that hir sonne might have bene conveyed over into France againe, there to have remained in safetie, till the chance of the next battell were tried: but they being of a contrarie mind, and namelie the duke of Summerfet, she at length consented unto that which they were resolved upon.

Thus euerie man being bent to battell, gathered his power by himselfe, first in Summerfetshire, Dorsetshire, and part of Wiltshire, and after in Devonshire and Cornewall. For the better incouraging of which countries to ioine with them in their quarrell, they repaired to Excester. Here they sent for sir John Arundell, and sir Hugh Courtenie, and manie other in whom they had anie confidence. To be short, they wrought so, that they raised the whole powers of Cornewall and Devonshire, and with a great armie departing forth of Excester, they toke the right waie to Glasfenburie, and from thence to Bath, raising the people in all parts where they came: for those countries had bene so laboured, first by the earle of Marwick, and after by the duke of Summerfet, and the earle of Devonshire (which two noble men were reckoned as old inheritors of the same countries) that the people seemed there greatlie inclined to the fauor of king Henrie.

Edward
feareth for ward against his enemies.

King Edward, being at London, was dailie advertised by faithfull espials of all the doings of his aduersaries, and was in no small agonie, because he could not learne what waie his enemies ment to take: for he purposed to encounter them in one place or other, before they should approach nere to London. And upon such resolution, with such an armie as he had got about London, furnished with all artillerie and other provisions necessarie, he set forward the nineteenth of Aprill, and came to Windesore, where he staid a season, as well to celebrate the feast of saint George, as to abide the coming of such hands as he had appointed to repaire thither unto him, making there his generall assemble.

The enemies to mask him the more, sent forth their foreriders unto sundrie townes, both a swell to raise people in the countries about, as to make the king beleue that their purpose was to passe those waies, where they ment not once to come. And hereupon when they departed from Excester, they sent first their foreriders straight to Shasseburie, and after to Salisburie, and then they toke the straight waie to Taunton, Glasfenburie, and after to Wells, where howering about in the countrie, they sent another time their foreriders to a towne called Puell, and to Wuton, as if their meaning had bene to draw towards Reading, and so through Warkeshire, and Dorsetshire to have marched straight to London, or else to have set upon the king at some advantage, if it were offered.

But king Edward, considering aduisedlie of the matter, perceived well that they being in an angle of the realme, if they ment to go to London, they must either hold the straight waie forth by Salisburie, or else drawing up to the sea side, passe alongst through Hampshire, Sussex and Kent; or happilie if they mistrusted their owne strengths, as not able to match with his puissance, they would then slip on the left hand, and draw towards Cheshire, and Lancashire, there to increase their forces, and peradventure by the waie to ioine with a power of Welshmen, under the leading of Jasper earle of Penbrooke, who had bene sent into Wales long afore, to frame and put in a readines the people there to assist king Henries friends at their coming thitherwards. And such was there purpose in deed, for they had great confidence in such aid, as they trusted to haue of the Cheshire and Lancashire men.

King Edward, meaning to approach nere unto them, that he might the sooner make waie to stop them of their passage, on which hand soeuer they drew, departed from Windesore the morrow after saint Georges day, being the fourte and twentieth day of Aprill, keeping forth his iournie, till on saturday the twentieth and seventh of Aprill he came to Abington, where he laie sundae all daie. On mondaie he marched forward to Chichester, where he had sent advertisement, that they intended to be at Bath the next daie being tuesday, and on wednesday to come forward to giue him battell. Whereupon king Edward, desirous to see his people in order of battell, drew them forth of the towne, and incamped in the field thre miles distant from thence, still busieng himselfe about his necessarie affaires, allowing no time to idleness or loitering: for he knew that there was no waie more expedite and readie to fire him in trauell, than to be giuen to negligence and sloth, the two wearers of well doing, as the old saying is:

Desidia pressus erit in studio citofessus.

On the morrow, hearing no certaintie of their coming forward, he marched to Spalnesburie, still seeking to encounter them: but here he had knowledge, that they hauing changed their purpose, meant not to giue him battell; and therefore were turned aside, and gone to Wiltshire, where they were receiued, relieved, and well refreshed by such as fauoured their cause, as well with vittells, men, and monie, as good store of artillerie. Whereupon they were so incouraged, that the thursdaie after they toke the field againe, purposing to giue king Edward battell indeed; and for the same intent had sent their foreriders to a towne, distant from Wiltshire nine miles, called Sudburie, appointing a ground for their field, a mile from the same towne, toward the kings campe, called Sudburie hill.

The king herof advertised, the same thursdaie, being the first of Maie, with his armie faire ranged in order of battell, came towards the place by them appointed for their field: but they came not there. For hearing that king Edward did thus approach, upon a new change of resolution, they left that waie: albeit some of their herbingers were come as farre as Sudburie towne, and there surprised five or six of the kings partie, which were rashlie entred that towne, attending onelie to prouide lodgings for their masters. The lords thus hauing effones changed their purpose, not meaning as yet to fight with the king, directed their waie straight towards Warkeshire, trauelling all that night. From Warkeshire they marched forward towards Gloucester.

The king in the meane time, on the thursdaie in the after none, came to the same ground called Sudburie hill, and there staid a certaine space, sending forth scowlers, to hearken what they might discover of the enemies, whome he toke to be some where at hand. But when he could not heare anie certaintie of them, he advanced forward, leading his vanguard in a ballie beyond the hill, towards the towne of Sudburie, and laie himselfe (with the residue of his people) at the same place, called Sudburie hill. About thre of the cloke after midnigh, he was advertised, that his enemies had taken their waie by Berkeley, towards Gloucester. Whereupon, taking aduise of his counsell what was best to do, he was counselled to send some of his seruants with all speed vnto Gloucester, to Richard Beauchampe, sonne and heire to the lord Beauchampe of Powike, to whome he had (before this present) committed the rule and custodie of the towne and castell of Gloucester.

The king sent therefore with all speed vnto him, commanding him to do his best to defend the towne and castell against his enemies, if they came to assault the same, as it was supposed they intended: and if they so did, he promised to come with his whole armie presentlie to the rescue. The messengers did their diligence, and so being sofallie receiued into Gloucester the towne and castell, by the vigilant regard of the said Richard Beauchampe, was put in safe keeping. And this message was done in good time, for true it is, there were diuerse in the towne, that could haue bene well contented that the quene, and the lords with hir, should haue bene receiued there, and would haue aduencured to haue brought it to passe, if they had not bene thus prevented.

Againe, the quene and the lords with hir had good intelligence, with diuerse in the towne, so as they were put in great hope to haue entred the same: whereupon they trauelled their people right soe all that night and morning, conning before the towne of Gloucester vpon the fridaie about ten of the clocke. And when they perceiued that they were disappointed of their purpose, and their entrie flatlie denied, they were highlie therewith displeased; for they knew verie well, that diuerse within the towne bare their good willes towards them: but after they had vled certeine menacing braueries, and made a shew as if they had meant to assault the gates and walles, & so to haue entred by force, they departed their waies, marching with all speed possible towards Tenkesburie.

Gloucester, where it was assaulted.

It might be marvelled at, whie they attempted not the winning of Gloucester indeed, considering the friends which they knew they had within it. But the cause which moued them chafie to forbeare, was, for that as well they without, as the other within the towne, knew that king Edward approached at hand, and was readie to set vpon them on the backes, if they had once begun to haue assaulted the towne; and so, neither they within the towne that were the kings friends doubted the enemies forces, nor the enemy indeed durst attempt anie such enterprise against them. About foure of the clocke in the afternoon, they came to Tenkesburie, hauing trauelled that night last past, and that daie, six and thirtie long miles, in a foule countrie, all in lanes and stonie waies, betwixt woods, without anie good refreshing, so that as well the men as the horses were right wearie.

A long march.

And where the more part of their armie consisted of footmen, the capitaines could not haue gone anie further, except they would haue left their footmen behind them, and so of necessitie they were drinen to staie there, determining to abide the aduenture that God would send them. For well they knew that the king followed them verie nere at hand, so as if they should haue gone further, and left the most part of their companie behind, as it could not otherwise haue chanced, he would haue bene readie to haue taken the aduantage wholie, so to distresse them. Whereupon they pight their field in a close, euen hard at the townes end, hauing the towne and the abbacie at their backes; and dircallie before them, and vpon each side of them, they were defended with cumber, some lanes, deepe ditches, and manie hedges, beside hills and dales, so as the place seemed as noisome as might be to approach vnto.

The king on this fridaie, verie erlie in the morning, aduanced his standards, and in good order of battell hauing diuided his armie into thre wards, marched through the plaines of Cotteswold. The daie was verie hot, and hauing in his armie about thre thousand footmen, he trauelled with them and the residue thirtie miles and more. By all which waie, they could find neither horsemeat, nor mans meat, no not so much as water for their horses, except one little brooke, of the which they receiued no great reliefe; for what with the horses and carriages that passed thorough it, the water became so troubled, that it serued them to no vse: and still all that daie king Edward with his armie was within five or six miles of his enemies, he in the plaine countrie, and they among the woods.

The painful march of king Edward with his armie.

King Edward had euer good espials, to aduertise him still what his enemies did, and which waie they toke. At length he came with all his armie vnto a village called Chilttenham, like a five miles distant from Tenkesburie, where he had certeine knowledge that his enemies were already come to Tenkesburie, and were incamped there, purposing to abide him in that place, and to deliuer him battell. King Edward thereupon made no long delai, but toke a little resceion himselfe, and caused his people to do the like, with such prouision of vittells as he had appointed to be conueied forth with him for the reliefe of himselfe and his armie. This done, he set forward towards his enemies, and lodged that night in a field not past thre miles distant from them.

Chilttenham.

On the morrow being saturday, and fourth of Maie, he drew towards his enemies, and marshalled his armie, diuided into thre battells in this sort. He put his brother the duke of Gloucester in the foreward, and himselfe in the middle-ward. The lord Marques, and the lord Hastings led the reer-ward. Where with he approached the enemies campe, which was right hard to be assailed, by reason of the deepe ditches, hedges, trees, bushes, and cumberfome lanes, wherewith the same was fenced, both a front, and on the sides, so as the king could not well approach them to anie aduantage: and to be the better in a readinesse to beat backe the kings power, when he should come to assault them, they were imbattelled in this order.

The ordering of king Edwards battell.

The duke of Summerfet, and his brother the lord John of Summerfet led the fore-ward. The middle-ward was gouerned by the prince, vnder the conduct of the lord of saint John, and the lord Wenlocke (whome king Edward had aduanced to the degree of a baron.) The reer-ward was appointed to the rule of the earle of Deuonshire. Thus may yee perceiue, that king Edward was put to his shifts, how (to anie aduantage) to assault his enemies. Nevertheless, he being well furnished with great artillerie, the same was aptlie lodged to annoie the enemies, that they receiued great damage thereby; and the duke of Gloucester, who lacked no policie, galled them greuouslie with the shot of arrowes: and they rewarded their aduersaries home againe with like payment, both with shot of arrowes, and great artillerie, although they had not the like plentie of guns as the king had. The passages were so cumberfome, that it was not possible to come vpon anie euen hand, to ioine at handblowes.

The ordering of the lords host.

The duke of Gloucester.

Tenkesburie field.

The duke of Gloucester, vpon a politike purpose (as some haue written) recoiled backe with all his companie, which when the duke of Summerfet perceived, either moued therewith; or else bicause he was too sore annoied with the shot in that place where he and his fore-ward stood, like a knight more courageous than circumspect, came out of his strength with his whole battell, and aduanced himselfe some what what aside slips the kings bowward, and by certeine passages afoze hand, and for that purpose prouided (to the kings part, although unknowen) he passed a lane, and came into a faire open close right before the king, where he was imbattelled, not doubting but the prince and the lord Wenlocke, with the middle-ward, had followed tust at his backe. But whether the lord Wenlocke dissembled the matter for king Edwards sake, or whether his hart serued him not, still he stood, and gaue the looking on.

Edw. Hall.

The king, (as other haue) the duke of Glocester, taking the aduantage that he aduantaged for, turned againe face to face vnto the duke of Summerfet his battell, and winning the hedge and ditch of him, entered the close, and with great violence put him and his people by towards the hill from whence they were descended. Here is to be noted, that when the king was come before his enemies, yet he gaue the onset, he perceived that vpon the right hand of their campe there was a parke, and much store of wood growing therein; and doubting least his aduersaries had laid an ambush within that wood, he chose forth of his companies two hundred speares, commanding them to keepe a file, like a quarter of a mile from the field, to attend vpon that corner of the wood out of the which the ambush, if anye were, was to issue, and to encounter with them, as occasion serued: but if they perceived that there was no ambush at all, then to imploye their seruice as they should see it expedient and behoouefull for the time.

The politike foresight of the king.

This politike prouision for danger that might haue ensued (although there was none that waile forth) serued yet before the end of the battell, to great god purpose. For when those speares perfectlie understood that there was no ambush within the wood, and withall saw convenient time to imploye themselves, they came and brake with full randon vpon the duke of Summerfet and his bowward a flanke, in so violent wise vpon the sudden, that where they had before mough to doe with those with whom they were first matched, now with this new charge giuen on them by those two hundred speares, they were not a little dismayed; and to conclude, so discouraged, that freightwaie they toke them to flight. Some fled into the parke, other into the meadowe there at hand, some into the lanes, & some hid them in ditches, each one making what shift he could, by the which he hoped best to escape: but manie neuerthelesse were beaten downe, slaine, and taken prisoners.

The battagard of the lords distressed.

The duke of Summerfet seeing this vnfortunate chance, as some write, turned to the middle-ward, and there finding the lord Wenlocke standing still, after he had reuiled him, and called him traitor, with his ar he stroke the bzaines out of his head. The duke of Glocester pursuing after them that fled with the duke of Summerfet to their campe, where the rest of their armie stood, entered the trench, and after him the king, where he bare himselfe so knightlie, that thereupon the quenes part went to woracke, and was put to flight; the king and other falling in chase after them, so that manie were slaine, but especiallie at a mill in the meadowe fast by the towne a great sort were drowned. Manie ran towards the towne, some to the church, and diuerse to the abbey, and other to other places, where they thought best to saue themselves. [This was the last fought field or pight battell tried betwene the potentats of this land in king Edward the fourths daies (which chanced on the fourth of Maie, being saturday, in the eleauenth yeare of his reigne, and in the yeare of our Lord, 1471) as Anglorum praelia affirmeth, saieing: ultima postrema locus est Tewkesburia pugna.]

Edw. Hall.
Prince Edward taken.

In the winning of the campe, such as stood to it were slaine out of hand Prince Edward was taken as he fled towards the towne, by sir Richard Cross, and kept close. In the field and chase were slaine, the lord John of Summerfet, called marquisse Dorset, Thomas Courtenie earle of Denonshire, sir John Welues, sir Edward Hampden, sir Robert Whittingham, and sir John Leukerier, with three thousand others. After the field was ended, proclamation was made, that whosoever could bring forth prince Edward alieue or dead, should haue an annuite of a hundred pounds during his life, and the princes life to be saued, if he were brought forth alieue. Sir Richard Cross, nothing mistrusting the kings promise, brought forth his prisoner prince Edward, being a faire and well proportioned young gentleman; whom when king Edward had well aduised, he demanded of him, how he durst so presumptuously enter into his realme with banner displayed.

Sir Richard Cross vnto the prince in hope that his life should be saued.

Wherevnto the prince boldly answered, saieing; To recouer my fathers kingdome & heritage, from his father and grandfather to him, and from him after him to me lineallie descended. At which words king Edward said nothing, but with his hand thrust him from him, (as some saie) stroke him with his gantlet; whom incontinentlie, George duke of Clarence, Richard duke of Glocester, Thomas Greie marquisse Dorset, and William lord Hastings that stood by, suddenlie murdered: for the which cruell act, the more part of the doers in their latter daies dranke of the like cup, by the righteous iustice and due punishment of God. His bodie was homelie interred with the other simple corpses, in the church of the monasterie of blacke monks in Tewkesburie.

After the victorie was thus achieved, the king repaired to the abbey church there, to giue God thanks for that good successe, which it had pleased him to bestow on him with; and there finding a great number of his enemies, that were fled thither to saue themselves, he gaue them all his free pardon; albeit there was no franchise there for rebels, but that he might haue commanded them to haue bene drawn forth without breach of anye liberties of that church. He granted also that the dead bodie, as well of the lords as other, slaine in that battell, might be buried in the same church, or else where it pleased their friends or seruants, without anye quartering & heading, or setting vp the heads or quarters in any publicke places. [The patience and clemencie of this good king, who (besides the putting vp of wrongs done to him by violence of foes without vengeance) freely forgave the offenders, and did so honorable temper his affections!]

There were found in the abbey and other places of the towne, Edmund duke of Summerfet, John Lonsfrother lord priore of S. John, sir Thomas Kelsham, sir Gervais Clifton, and diuerse other knights and esquiers, which were apprehended, and all of them being brought before the duke of Glocester, sitting as constable of England, and the duke of Northfolke, as marshall in the middell of the towne, they were arreigned, condemned, and iudged to die; and so vpon the tuesday, being the seventh of Maie, the said duke and the lord priore, with the two forenamed knights, and twelue other knights, were on a scaffold, set vp in the middle of the towne for that purpose, beheaded, and permitted to be buried, without anye other dismembryng, or setting vp of their heads in anye one place or other.

The bodies of the duke of Summerfet and others beheaded.

The same tuesday, the king departed from Tewkesburie towards Worcester, and by the waie had knowledge that quene Margaret was found in a poore house of religion, not far from thence, into the which she was withdrawen for safegard of hir selfe, on saturday in the morning, being the daie of the battell. She was after brought to London as prisoner, ner, and so kept, till his father ransomed him with great summes of monie, which he bestowed of Lelwes the eleventh king of France. And because he was not able to make repayment thereof, he sold unto the said Lelwes (as the French writers affirme) the kingdomes of Naples, and both the Sicils, with the countie of Provence. King Edward being at Worcester, had advertisements brought forth of the north parts, that the people there were about to assemble in armour against him, in favour of king Henrie: whereupon he left the right way to London, and rode to Coventrie, meaning to increase the number of his people, and so with a puissant armie to go northwards.

Whereupon, comming to Coventrie the eleventh of Maie, and remaining there three daies, he well refreshed such as had bene with him at Teukesburie field. Whither was brought to him quene Margarete, from whence she was conveyed to London, there to remaine in safe keeping (as before you have heard.) Whilst he was busie in sending abroad unto his friends to leaue an armie, he was advertised that the commotion in the north was pacified. For after it was knowne abroad, how he obtained the victorie, as well at Teukesburie, as at Barnet, and in manner subdued all his enemies, the captains that had stirred the people to that rebellion, began to quail, and forsooke their companies.

Duerse of them made sute to the earle of Northumberland, that it might please him to be a mediator to the king for their pardon; so that now, there was no rebellion in all the north parts, but that as well the citie of York, as all other places, were at the kings commandement, ready in all things to obey him as true and loiall subiects. And this was confirmed by the earle of Northumberlands owne mouth, who on the fourteenth of Maie came to the king, as yet remaining at Coventrie: by reason whereof it was not thought needfull, that the king should trauell anie further northward at that time, either about the pacifying of the people, or to see execution done upon the offenders, sith all was there in good tranquillitie and quiet.

But now when all things seemed to be at rest, and no rebellion after so happie victories doubted, newes came to him before his coming to Coventrie, from the lords of his blood, abiding at London, that one Thomas Beull, bastard sonne to that valiant captaine the lord Thomas Fauconbridge (who had lately before bene sent to the sea by the earle of Marwick, and after fallen to practise piracie) had spoiled duerse merchants ships, Portugals and others, in breach of the ancient amitie that long had continued betwixt the realms of England and Portugall; and furthermore, had now got to him a great number of mariners, out of all parts of the land, and manie traitors and misgouerned people from each quarter of the realme, beside duerse also forth of other countries that delighted in theft and robberies, meaning to worke some exploit against the king.

And verelie, his puissance increased daily, for having bene at Calis, and brought from thence into Kent manie euill disposed persons, he began to gather his power in that countie, meaning (as was thought) to attempt some great and wicked enterprise. After the kings comming to Coventrie, he receiued advertisements, that this bastard was come before London, with manie thousands of men by land, and also in ships by water, purposing to rob and spoile the citie. Manie Kentishmen were willing to assist him in this mischieuous enterprise, and other were forced against their wills to go with him, or else to aid him with their substance and monie, inasmuch that within a short time, he had got together sixtene or seuentene thousand men, as they accompted themselves.

With these he came before the citie of London the twelue of Maie, in the quarrell (as he pretended) of king Henrie, whome he also meant to haue out of the Tower, & to restore him againe. unto his crowne & roiall dignitie. And for that intent, he required to enter the citie with his people, that receiuing king Henrie forth of the Tower, they might passe with him through the citie, and so to march streight towards king Edward, whose destruction they vowed to pursue, with all their bittermost inuencions. But the maiors and aldermen of the citie would not in anie wise agree to satisfie their request herein, butterlie refusing to receiue him or anie of his companie into the citie.

King Edward from time to time by posts was informed of all these doings, & by aduise of his council, the fourteenth of Maie, sent to the succours of the maiors and aldermen sixtene hundred of the choicest souldiers he had about him, that they might helpe to resist the enemies, till he had got such an armie together as was thought necessarie, meaning with all conuenient speed to come therewith to the rescue of the citie, and preservation of the quene, prince, and his daughters, that were within the Tower, not in verie good safeguard, considering the euill dispositions of manie within the citie of London, that for the favour they had borne to the earle of Marwick, and desire to be partakers of the spoile, cared not if the bastard might haue attained to his full purpose and wished intent.

On the sixteenth of Maie, king Edward set forth of Coventrie towards London. But here ye haue to vnderstand, that when the bastard could not be receiued into the citie, neither by gentle persuasions, nor greuous threatnings, he made semblance to passe ouer the Thames at Kingston bridge, ten miles from London, and thitherwards he drew with his whole power by land, leauing his ships afore saint Katharines and thereabouts. His pretense was, to spoile and deströie Westminster, and the suburbs of the citie on that side, and after to assault the citie itselfe, to trie if he might enter by force, and so to be renewed of the citizens that had refused to receiue him. [Notwithstanding all which stirring of coles & proud port, with haughtinesse of hart & violence of hand thinking to beate downe the people, as an inundation of flowing of water streams doth all before it: yet he came short of his purpose, & pulled vpon his owne pate small destruction: though he thought himselfe a man ordeined to glorie, & was tickled with the like flattering persuasion that one had in his hart, who said:

Magnum iter ascendo, sed dat mihi gloria vires.

Now as he was on wards vpon his toynie, he was advertised, that king Edward was preparing to come for wards against him, assisted in manner with all the great lords of the realme, and others in great number, more than he had bene at anie time before. By reason whereof, doubting what might follow, if passing the river he should fortune so to be inclosed, that he should be diuinen thereto to incounter with the kings power at such odds, he thought it best to alter his purpose; and so returning, came backe againe before London, & mustered his people in St. Georges field, ranged and placed in one entier battell.

And to the intent they might worke their purpose best, before the kings comming to the rescue, they resolved with all their forces to assault the citie, and to enter it if they could by plaine strength, that putting it to the sacke, they might conueie the riches to their ships, which lay in the river betwixt saint Katharines and Blacketwall, nere to Ratcliffe. Whereupon having brought certeine peces of artillerie forth of their ships, they planted the same alongst the water side, right over against the citie, and shot off lustilie, to annoy the citie within so much as was possible.

But the citizens on the other side lodged their great artillerie against their adversaries, and with violent shot therof so galled them, that they durst not abide in any place alongst the water side, but were driven even from their owne ordinance. Yet the bassard not meaning to leave any waie unassailed that might advance his purpose, appointed a great number of his retinue to set fire on the bridge, so to open the passage, and to enter into the citie that way forth; and withall, he caused about three thousand other to passe by ships over the Thames; giving order, that when they were got over, they should divide themselves into two battels, the one to assault Algate, and the other Bishops gate, which order accordingly was executed.

Algate and Bishops gate assaulted.

For they did their best at both places to force the gates, not sparing to bend and discharge such guns as they had brought with them against the same, nor ceasing with arrowes to annoy those that there stood at defense: whereby much hurt was done, as well at the one place as the other, fire being set on both the gates, in purpose to have burnt them up, and so to have entered. The fire which they had kindled on the bridge little availed them, although they burnt there to the number of a threescore houses. For the citizens had laid such peeces of ordinance directlie in their waie, that although the passage had bene whole open, they should have had hard entering that waie forth. The maiors, aldermen, and other worshipfull citizens were in good arraie, and each man appointed and bestowed where was thought needfull.

Houses burnt on the bridge.

The earle of Essex, and manie knights, esquires, and gentlemen, with their friends and servants, came to aid the citizens, taking great paine to place them in order, for defense of the gates and walles: and furthermore, devised how and in what sort they might make a sallie forth upon the enemies to distresse them: and suerlie, by the intermingling of such gentlemen and lords servants in euerie part with the citizens, they were greatlie incouraged to withstand their enemies. Yet the rebels, under the leading of one Spilsing, bare themselves so scuttie at Algate, that they wan the bulwarks there, and drove the citizens backe within the portculice, & entered with them, to the number of six or eight: but some of them were slaine with the fall of the portculice that was let downe upon them, to keepe the residue out, and those that were entered within the gate were suddenlie dispatched.

Where with they lashed frelie the one part at the other with guns and bolles, although no great hurt was done with shot; till at length Robert Bassett alderman (that was appointed to the keeping of this gate, with the most part of the citizens) and the recorder, named Wilselike, either of them being well armed in strong iaches, commanded the portculice to be drawn up, and maintainantlie rushed forth upon their enemies, putting them backe unto saint Botolphes church. At the same instant, the earle Rivers, having got together a foure or five hundred men, well chosen and apparelled for the warre, issued forth at the posterne by the Tower, and assailing the Benthemen, even upon the point as they were thus put backe, mightilie laid upon them.

The ballancie of Robert Bassett alderman.

And first he plaged them with the swift and thicke flight of his arrowes, and after joining with them at hand strokes, slue and toke manie of them prisoners; so that the rebels were fullie put to flight, and followed first to Wile-end, and from thence some unto Poplar, some to Stratford, and Stepnith, and in maner each waie forth about that part of the citie, the chase being followed for the space of two miles in length. Manie of them were of Essex, and so made their course homewards; but the more part of them fled to the water side, and getting to their ships, passed over the Thames to the rest of their companie. The other likewise that were busie to assault Bishops gate, when they understood that their fellows were discomfited and fled from Algate, they likewise slipped awaie, and made the best that they could to save themselves.

There were a sequen hundred of them that fled from Algate, and other places, slaine outright, beside the prisoners. And yet there were fiers burning all at once at Algate, Bishops gate, & on the bridge, and manie houses consumed with the same fiers. But now the bassard, under whose that companie was directed that had set fire on the bridge, when he saw that he might not prevaile, and understood the small successe of those which he had set over the Thames, he withdrew also, and left the bridge. Here the hardie manhood of Rafe Josselin alderman is not to be passed with silence; who (after he had valiantlie resisted the bassard & his band that assaulted the bridge) upon their retire sallied forth upon them, and following them in chase alongst the water side, till they came beyond Kitchcliffe, slue and toke verie manie of them.

The bassard notwithstanding gathered his companies together, and with such as were willing to remaine with him incamped on Blackheath, by the space of three daies next ensuing, to wit, the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth of Maie, offering despairing of his wished preie, sith he had bene repelled from London, to his bitter confusion. And now to conclude, hearing that king Edward was coming with a right puissant armie, the said bassard and his people durst no longer abide; but brake up and dispersed themselves, some one waie, and some another. They of Calis got them thither againe with all speed, and such as were of other countries repaired likewise to their homes, and manie of the Benthemen went also to their houses. The bassard with his mariners, and such riotous rebels, robbers, and wicked persons, as sought nothing but spoile, got them to Shipbourn, and with all their vessels dyed downe to the coast.

King Edward, having assembled an armie of thirtie thousand men (as some write) and accompanied in maner with all the great lords of England, came to London the one and twentieth of Maie, being tuesday, where he was honourable receiued by the maiors, aldermen, and other worshipfull citizens: where even upon their first meeting with him he dubbed divers of them knights; as the maiors, the recorder, & other aldermen, and worshipfull commoners of the citie, which had manfullie and valiantlie acquit themselves against the bassard. Ifauncybolde & his wicked companie of rebels. Whereover, here is to be remembered, that poore king Henrie the first, a little before deprived (as ye have heard) of his realme and imperfall crowne, was now in the Tower spoiled of his life, by Richard duke of Gloucester (as the constant fame ran) who (to the intent that his brother king Edward might reigne in more sueritie) murdered the said king Henrie with a dagger.

Howbeit, some writers of that time, favouring altogether the house of York, have recorded, that after he understood what losses had chanced unto his friends, and how not onelie his sonne, but also all other his chiefe partakers were dead and dispatched, he took it so to hart, that of pure displeasure, indignation, and melancholie, he died the three and twentieth of Maie. The dead corps on the Ascension even was conveyed with billes and glaives pompositie (if you you will call that a funerall pompe) from the Tower to the church of Saint Paule, and there laid on a bier of cotten bare faced, the same in presence of the beholders did bled; where it rested the space of one whole daie. From thence he was caried to the Blackfriars, and bled there likewise: and on the next daie after, it was conueied in a boat, without priest or clerke, to the tower, singing or saying, into the monastrie of Chertsey, distant from London fiftene miles, and there was it first buried: but after, it was removed to Windesore, and there in a new vault, newlie intombed. He reigned eight and thirtie yeares, six moneths and od daies, and after his readeption of the crowne six moneths. He liued two and fiftie yeares, hauing by twice one onclie sonne, called Edward, prince of Wales.

He was of a fæmelie stature, of bodie slender, to which proportion all other members were answerable; his face beautifull, wherein continuallie was resident the bountie of mind, with the which he was inwardlie indured. Of his owne naturall inclination he abhorred all the vices as well of the bodie as of the soule. His patience was such, that of all the injuries to him done (which were innumerable) he neuer asked vengeance, thinking that for such aduersitie as chanced to him, his finnes should be forgotten and forgiven. What losses soeuer happened vnto him, he neuer esteemed, nor made anie account thereof; but if anie thing were done, that might sound as an offense towards God, he sore lamented, and with great repentance sought for it.

So then verie unlike it is, that he died of anie wrath, indignation, and displeasure because his businesse about the keeping of the crowne on his head toke no better successe: except peraduenture ye will saie, that it grieved him, for that such slaughters and mischeues as had chanced within this land; came to passe onclie through his folie and default in government: or (that moze is) for his fathers, his grandfathers, and his owne vniust vsurping and deteining of the crowne. But howsoeuer it was, for these before remembred, and other the like properties of reputed holinesse, which was said to rest in him, it pleased God to worke miracles for him in his life time, as men haue listred to report.

By reason whereof, King Henric the seauenth sued to Pope Iulio the second, to haue him canonized a saint. But for that the canonizing of a king seemed to be moze coslie than for a bishop, the said king left off his sute in that behalfe; thinking better to saue his monie, than to purchase a new holie daie of saint Henric with so great a price, remitting to God the iudgement of his will and intent. ¶ But because princes princelie qualified, can not be too highlie praised, I will here record a collection of his commendable conditions, doings, and sayings, as I find them set downe to my hand, to his perpetuall renowne; and right wortheie of imitation, not onclie of such as are singled out from among infinite thousands, to be magnified with roialtie; but also of priuat and meane men that conuerse and liue one with another in the world.

This king hauing inioied as great prosperitie as fauourable fortune could afford, & as great troubles on the other side as the frowning could poure out; yet in both the states he was patient and vertuous, that he made be a patterne of most perfect vertue, as he was a wortheie example of fortunes inconstancie. He was plaine, bright, farre from fraud, wholely giuen to praier, reading of scriptures, and almesdeeds; of such integritie of life, that the bishop which had bene his confessor ten yeares, auouched that he had not all that time committed anie mortall crime: so continent, as suspicion of vnchast life neuer touched him: and hauing in Chastmasse a shew of yong women with their bare breasts laid out presented before him, he immediatlie departed with these words: Fie, fie, for shame; forsooth you be to blame.

Before his marriage, he liked not that women should enter his chamber, and for this respect he committed his two brethren by the mothers side, Jasper and Edmund, to most honest & vertuous prelates to be brought up. So farre he was from couetousnesse, that when the executors of his vnclie the bishop of Winchester, surnamed the rich cardinall, would haue giuen him two thousand pounds, he plainelie refused it, willing them to discharge the will of the departed, and would scarceleie condescend at length to accept the same summe of monie toward the indowing of his colleges in Cambridge & Eaton. He was religionlie affected (as the time then was) that at principall holidaies, he would weare sackcloth next his skin. Wh he used none, but in most earnest matters these words: Forsooth and forsooth.

He was so pitifull, that when he saw the quarter of a traitor against his crowne ouer Crislegate, he willed it to be taken awaie, with these words: I will not haue anie christian so cruellie handled for my sake. ¶ Anie great offenses he willingly pardoned, and receiuing at a time a great blow by a wicked man which compassed his death, he onclie said; Forsooth forsooth, ye doe foullie to smite a king annointed so. An other also which thrust him into the side with a sword when he was prisoner in the Tower, was by him pardoned when he was restored to his state and kingdome. ¶ Not long before his death, being demanded whie he had so long held the crowne of England vniustlie; he replied: My father was king of England, quietlie inioieng the crowne all his reigne; and his father my grandfater was also king of England, and I euen a child in my cradell was proclaimed and crowned king without anie interruption; and so held it fortie yeares well-nere, all the states doing homage vnto me, as to my antecessors: wherefore I maie saie with king David; The lot is fallen vnto me in a faire ground; yea, I haue a goodlie heritage, my helpe is from the Lord which saueth the vpright in heart.

This good king, being of himselfe alwaies naturallie inclined to do good, and fearing least he might seme vnthankefull to almightie God for his great benefitts bestowed vpon him, since the time he first took vpon him the regiment of his realme, determined about the six and twentieth yeare of his reigne, for his primer notable worke (as by the words of his will I find expessed) to erect and found two famous colledges in the honoz and worship of his holy name, and for the increase of vertue, the dilatation of cunning, and establishment of christian faith, whereof the one in Cambridge, to be called his colledge of our ladie and saint Nicholas: and the other at Eaton beside Windesore, to be called his colledge of our blessed ladie.

And for the performance of this his deuout purpose, he infeoffed certeine bishops, with other noble and worshipfull personages, by his letters patents, with lands and possessions, parcell of his inheritance of the duchie of Lancaster, to the cleare value of well nere foure & thirtie hundred pounds by yere. Which letters patents he after confirmed by his act of parliament, declaring also by his will vnto his said scoffers, his intent and meaning, how the same should be imployed vpon the edifications of his said two colledges. Whereof (in my iudgement) the denise is so excellent, and the buildings so princelie and apt for that purpose, as I cannot omit to set forth vnto you the verie plot of the whole colledge in Cambridge, even as I find mentioned almost verbatim in his will, supposing that if the rest of the house had proceeded according to the chappell already finished (as his full intent and meaning was) the like colledge could scant have bene found againe in anie christian land. The words of the will are thus.

The chappell. As touching the dimensions of the church of my said colledge of our labie and S. Nicholas of Cambridge, I have devised and appointed, that the same church shall contene in length 288 fot of assise, without anie fies, and all of the wideness of fortie fot.

The bodie of the church. And the length of the same church from the west end unto the altars at the quiere doze, shall contene an hundred and twentie fot. And from the piousness stall, unto the grace called Gradus chori ninetie fot; for thirtie sit stalles on either side of the same quiere, answering to threescore and ten fellows, and ten priests conduits, which must be De prima forma. And from the said stalles unto the east end of the said church, threescore & two fot of assise. Also a reredosse bearing the

The roodloft. roodloft, departing the quiere and the bodie of the church, containing in length fortie fot, and in breadth fourtene fot. The walles of the same church to be in height ninetie fot unbattelled, bawted, and charerossed, sufficientlie butteraced, and euerie butterace fined with finials. And in the east end of the same church, shall be a window of nine daies, and betwixt euerie butterace a window of five daies.

The height of the chappell. And betwixt euerie of the same butteraces in the bodie of the church, on both sides of the same church, a closet with an altar therein, containing in length twentie fot, and in breadth ten fot, bawted and finished under the soile of the fies windows. And the pavement of the church to be enhanced foure fot above the ground without. And the height of the pavement of the quiere one fot and an halfe above the pavement of the church. And the pavement of the altar thre fot above that. And on the north side of the quiere a vestrie containing in length fiftie fot, and in breadth twentie and two fot, departed into two houses beneath, & two houses above, which shall contene in height twentie two fot in all, with an entrie from the quiere bawted. And at the west end of the church a cloister square, the east pane containing in length an hundred seuentie and five fot, and the west pane as much. The north pane two hundred fot, and the south pane as much, of the which the deambulatoire thirtene fot wide, and in height twentie fot to the corbill table, with cleare stoies and butteraces with finials, bawted & unbattelled. And the ground thereof foure fot lower than the church ground.

The east window. And in the middle of the west pane of the cloister a strong tower square, containing foure and twentie fot within the walles. And in the height one hundred and twentie fot to the corbill table. And foure small turrets over that fined with pinacles. And a doze into the said cloister inward, but outward none. And as touching the dimensions of the housing of the said colledge, I have devised and appointed in the south side of the said church a quadrant, closing to both ends of the same church; the east pane whereof shall contene two hundred and thirtie fot in length, and in breadth within the walles two and twentie fot. In the same panes middle, a tower for a gatehouse, containing in length thirtie fot, and in breadth two and twentie, and in height threescore fot, with thre chambers over the gate, euerie one over the other. And on either side of the same gate foure chambers, euerie one containing in length five & twentie fot, and in breadth two and twentie fot. And over euerie of these chambers, two chambers above of the same measure or more, with two towers outward, and two towers inward.

The side chappels. The south pane shall contene in length two hundred

The vestrie. And at the upper end of the hall, the piousness lodging, that is to wit, more than the chambers for him above specified, a parlour on the ground, containing five and thirtie fot in length, and two and twentie fot in breadth, & two chambers above of the same quantitie. And westward closing thereto a kitchen for him, a larderhouse, stables, and other necessarie housings and grounds. And westward beyond these houses, and the said kitchen ordained for the hall, a bakehouse, a brewhouse, and other houses of office: betwixt which there is left a ground square of foute score fot in euerie pane for wood and such stuffe. And in the middle of the said large quadrant, shall be a conduit, goodlie devised for the ease of the same colledge. And I will, that the edification proceed in large forme of my said colledge cleane and substantiall, setting apart superfluitie of so great curious workes of intaille and busie moulding.

The cloister. And I have devised and appointed that the precinct of my said colledge, as well on both sides of the garden from the colledge to the water, as in all other places of the same precinct, be inclosed with a substantiall wall, of the height of fourtene fot, with a large tower at the principall entrie against the middle of the east pane, out of the high street. And in the same tower a large gate, and another tower in the middle of the west end at the new bridge. And the same wall to be creased, unbattelled, and fortified with towers, as manie as shall be thought convenient thereunto. And I will that my said colledge be edified of the most substantiall & best abiding stuffe, of stone, lead, glasse, and iron, that mate best be had and provided thereto. & thus much I have enlarged by occasion of reading this good kings will: the cunning devill wherof I leave to the considerate judgement of such as be expert in architecture, heartlie desiring almighty God to put into the heart of some noble prince of this land, one day to make perfect this this totall worke so charitablie begun.]

But now to returne to king Edward. He shall understand, that after his comming to London, hee resided there but one daie, or two at the most, taking his fourtie forthright into Kent with all his armie, following the bassard, and other his complices, to suppress them, if they were in anie place assembled a gaine to resist him. But after they were once dispersed, they durst not shew themselves againe in armie, those onlie excepted that were withdrawne unto Sandwich with the bassard; which for the more part were mariners, about eight or nine hundred, beside certeine other evill disposed persons, that accompanied him as his souldiers, and men of warre, with whose assistance the bassard kept that towne by strength, having in the haven seven and forty ships, great and small, under his governance.

But upon the kings approaching nere unto those parties, they sent to him for pardon; promising that upon a reasonable appointment; for the safeguard of their lives, and other indemnities to be had for their benefit, they would become his faithfull subiects, and deliver into his hands all the ships. Their offer the king upon great considerations, and by good deliberate advice of counsell, thought best to accept: and thereupon (being at that time in Canturburie) hee granted to their petitions, and sent immediatlie unto Sandwich his brother Richard duke of Gloucester, to receive them to mercie, together with all the ships, which according to their promise they delivered into his hands.

But notwithstanding that (as some write) the bassard Fauconbridge, and other of his companie that were got to Sandwich, had thus their pardons by composition at the kings hand; we find neuertheless, that the said bassard Fauconbridge, being afterwards at sea (a rowing belike, as he had used before) came at length into the open haven at Southhampton, and there taking land, was apprehended, and hostile after beheaded. This chanced (as should appeare by Fabian) about the latter end of October. Whereover, Roger Waghman that had bene sent by king Edward into Wales, anon after Tencheburie field (being a man of great power in that countie) to intrap and surprize by some secret sleight the earle of Penbrooke, the said earle being thereof aduertised, took the same Roger, and without delay strooke off his head.

After this, was the earle besieged in the towne of Penbrooke by Morgan Thomas; but the siege was raised by David Thomas, brother to the said Morgan, a faithfull friend to the earle; and then the earle by his helpe was conveyed to Winbie, where he got ships, and with his nephew the lord Henrie earle of Richmond sailed into Britaine, where, of the duke they were courteously interteined; with assurance made, that no creature should doe them anie wrong or iniurie within his dominions. King Edward visiting diuerse places in Kent, saie in iudgement on such as had aided the bassard in the last commotion, of whom diuerse were condemned and executed, as spilling one of the captives that assaulted Algate, whose head was set up ouer the same gate: and so likewise was the head of one Quintine, a butcher, that was an other captaine amongst them, and chiefe of those that assaulted Bishops gate, as some write.

Whereover, at Canturburie the mayor of that citie was executed, and diuerse other at Rochester, Spaldston and Blackheath: for the lord marshall and other iudges, being appointed to hold their oier and determine in that countie of Kent, there were aboue an hundred indicted and condemned. Diuerse also of other men that had bene partakers in this rebellion with the bassard, & holpe to set fire on Bishops gate and Algate, were hanged betwixt Stratford and London. Parte also of the wealthie commons in Kent were put to grieuous fines.

Now when the king had made an end of his business in that countie, he returned to London, coming thither againe upon Whitsun euen, being the first of June. And hauing thus within the space of seven weekes recovered in maner the whole possession of his realme, being relieved of the most part of all his doubtfull feare, he ment to remove all stops out of the waie. Wherefore he sent the archbishop of Poike, brother to the earle of Marwick, and to the marques Montacute ouer to Guisnes, there to be kept in safe custodie within the castell, where he continued a long season, till at length he was by friendship deliuered, and shortly after (through verie anguish of mind) departed this life. Whome Laurence Bath, and after him Thomas Rotherham in the see of Poike, did ordinarilie succeed. Beside this, John earle of Arford, which after Barnet field both manfully and valiantlie kept saint Michaels mount in Coznewall, either for lacke of aid, or persuaded by his friends, gaue up the mount, and yielded himselfe to king Edward (his life onelie saued) which to him was granted. But to be out of all doubtfull imaginations, king Edward also sent him ouer the sea to the castell of Hammes, where, by the space of twelue yeeres hee was in strong prison thut by and warlike looked to.

King Edward was not a litle disquieted in mind, for that the earls of Penbrooke & Richmond were not onlie escaped out of the realme, but also well received and no lesse interteined of the duke of Britaine: he sent therefore in secret wise graue & close messengers to the said duke, the which should not sticke to promise the duke great and rich rewards, so that he would deliver both the earles into their hands and possession. The duke, after he had heard them that were sent, made this answer, that he could not with his honor deliver them, to whom he had giuen his faith to see them preserved from all iniurie: but this (he said) he would doe for the king of England, that they should be looked unto, as he needed not to doubt of any attempt to be made against him by them, or by their meanes.

The king receiuing this answer, wrote longinglie to the duke of Britaine, that he would consider his friendship with conuenient rewards, if it should please him to be as good as his promise. The duke, perceiving gaine comming by the abode of the two English earles in his countie, caused them to be separated in sunder, and all their seruants being Englishmen to be sequestred from them, and in their places appointed Britains to attend them. In the thirtieth yeere of his reigne, king Edward called his high court of parlement at his palace of Westminster, in the which all lawes and ordinances made by him before that daie were confirmed, and those that king Henrie had abrogated, after his readeption of the crowne, were againe renewed. Also lawes were made for the confiscation of traitors goods, and for the restoring of them that were for his sake fled the realme, which of his aduersaries had bene attainted of high treason, and condemned to die.

Whereover, towards his charges of late sustained, a competent summe of monie was demanded, and freely granted. There was also a pardon granted almost for all offenses; and all men then being within the realme, were released and discharged of all high treasons and crimes, although they had taken part with his aduersaries against him. In this season the duke of Burgognie had soze wars with the French king; and to be the more speedlie reuenged on his aduersarie, he sent ambassadors into England, to persuade persuade king Edward to make warre also on the French king, for the recoverie of his ancient right to the realme of France, by the same French king against all equitie withhelden and detained. In which attempt of his, there was some favour of discret policie, and a provident forecast for his greater safetie, besides the likelie possibilitie to obtaine that whereto he made challenge: sith the huger hostis (if the harder hearts) are of most force, according to that saying:

Virtus unita fortior.

And therefore, by procuring the king of Englands power to joine with his, he supposed his purpose achievable with the more facilitie. King Edward not so much for the love he bare to the duke of Burgonie, as for desire to be revenged on the French king, whome he toke to be his enimie for aiding the earle of Warwicke, quene Margaret, and his sonne prince Edward, with their complices, gave good eare to the duke of Burgonie his messengers, and finally (after he had taken advise of his counsell) the said messengers were answered, that king Edward in the beginning of the next yeare would land at Calis with a puissant armie, both to revenge such injuries as he had received at the French kings hands, and also to recover his right, which he wrongfullie detained from him.

Opportunitie not to be neglected.

The earle of D. Paule.

In deed the time served verie well for the Englishmen to achieve some high enterprise in France at that present. For not onelie the duke of Burgonie as then made warre against the French king, but also manie great men within the realme of France, mistaking the manners of their king, began to have secret intelligence with the said duke; and namelie Lewes of Lutzenburgh earle of saint Paule constable of France was secretlie confederate with the duke of Burgonie, intending verelie to bring the French king to some great hinderance, the better to have his purpose accomplished in certaine weightie matters. King Edward understanding all these things, was greatlie encouraged to make a journey into France, and thereupon with all diligence prepared all things readie for the same.

A shift to recover monie.

But because he wanted monie, and could not well charge his commons with a new subsidie, for that he had received the last yeare great summes of monie granted to him by parlement, he devised this shift, to call afore him a great number of the wealthiest sort of people in his realme; and to them declaring his need, and the requisite causes thereof, he demanded of everie of them some portion of monie, which they sticke not to give. And therefore the king willing to shew that this their liberalitie was verie acceptable to him, he called this grant of monie, A benevolence: notwithstanding that manie with grudge gave great sums toward that new found aid which of them might be called, A malevolence. But the king used such gentle fashions toward them, with frendlie praier of their assistance in his necessitie, that they could not otherwise do, but franklie and freelie yeld and give him a reasonable and competent summe.

Abr. Flem. ex Edw. Hall. fol. Cccxvj.

¶ But here I will not let passe a pretie conceipt that happened in this gathering, in the which you shall not onelie note the humilitie of a king, but more the fantasie of a woman. King Edward had called before him a widow, much abounding in substance, and no lesse graine in yeares, of whome he merelie demanded what she gladlie would give him toward his great charges: By my trueth quoth she, for thy louslie countenance thou shalt have even twentie pounds. The king looking scarce for the halfe of that summe, thanked hir, and lovinglie kiss hir. Whether the flauor of his breath did so comfort hir stomach, or the esteemed the kisse of a king so pretious a reward, she swoze incontinentlie, that he should have twentie pounds more, which she with the same will paid that she offered it. ¶ This yeare the duke of Brester was found dead in the sea betwene Dover and Calis, but how he came there the certeintie could not be knowne.]

¶ When all things convenient for such an enterprise were in a readinesse, the king came to Dover, where he found five hundred ships and hoies readie to transport him and his armie. And so the fourth date of Julie he passed over, and landed at Calis with great triumph; but his armie, horses, and munitions of war scarce passed over in twentie daies. In this armie (being one of the best appointed that had passed out of England into France in manie yeares before) were fiftene hundred men of armes well horsed, of the which the most part were barbed and richlie trapped, and manie of them trimmed in one sute. There were also fiftene thousand archers with bowes and arrowes, of the which a great number were on horsebacke. There were also a great companie of other fighting men, and of such as served to set by tents and pavillions, to attend the artillerie and to inclose their campe, and otherwise to labour and be employed in service.

In all this armie was there not one page. The king of England was at his arrivall highlie displeased with the duke of Burgonie, who in the word of a prince had promised to meet him at his landing, with two thousand men of armes and light horsemen, besides a great number of lanceknights and halberdiers, and that he would have begun the war three moneths before the kings transpoziting; where, as contrarie the duke laie lingering at the siege of Poule, and let passe the occasion of achieving a more profitable enterprise. King Edward incontinentlie dispatched the lord Scales in post unto the duke, to put him in remembrance of his promise, and to advise him to come and joine with him before the summer were spent.

Before king Edward departed from Dover, he sent an officer of armes unto the French king with a defiance. The French king, receiving the king of Englands letters at the messengers hand, read the same; and after he had considered thereof at leisure, he called the English herald asfor, and to him declared the little trust that was to be put in the duke of Burgonie and the constable, by whose procurement he knew that king Edward was procured to come at that season into France; and therefore it should be better for him to have peace with an old enimie, than to state upon the promises and familiaritie of a new dissembling friend, which peace did highlie please God, & was the thing that he most desired. ¶ But to give the greater grace to the matter in hand, it is good to laie downe the forme of the French kings speech to the said herald, to whome he uttered these words in his wardrobe, as Edward Hall reporteth.

Sir I knowe and well wot, that the king of England your master, is neither descended in these parts of his owne free motion, nor yet of us required; but onelie enticed and provoked by the duke of Burgonie, and somewhat enforced by the commons of his realme. But now you may see that the season of the peace passeth, and the duke of Burgonie is in poore estate, returning from Poule almost discomforted. The constable also, with whome the king your soveraigne lord (I am sure) hath some intelligence, for favour that your master hath married his neere, is not so sure a friend as he is taken for. And if all the world knew how I have promoted him, and what I have done for him, they would little thinke, that he would so untrulie handle me as he doth. For I assure you, he is a deep dissembler, & in continuall dissimulation.

on intendeth to lead his life, interteining all men for his owne profit. And although the king your master be vntrue of all his other promyses, yet of one thing he shall be sure, that is, he shall be euer displeased withall. And therefore I saie to you, and not to your maister, that he were better haue a peace with an old enemie, than the promyses and familiaritie of a new displembing friend, which peace most pleaseeth God, and is the thing that I most doe desire.]

When he had thus said, he gaue the herald three hundred crownes, promising him a thousand crownes if any good appointment came to passe. This herald was borne in Normandie, who being more courteous of the crownes than secret (according as of dutie by his office he ought to haue bene) promised to doe all things that in him lay, and further shewed waies by the which the French king might enter into the port of treatie for peace, the which he doubted not would lead to a good conclusion. The French king glad to heare these things, gaue to the herald when he should depart, beside the other reward, a peece of crimson velvet of thirtie yards long. The lord Scales, coming to the duke of Burgognie before Jussie, could not persuade him to raise his field, and (as it stood him upon) to come and ioine with king Edward, till at length constrained thereto by other means, he left Jussie unconquered, and sending the most part of his armie into Lorraine, came with a small compaignie to king Edward lying before Calis.

King Edward at the first coming of the duke vnto him, seemed much to reprove his vnwise dealing, in making so slow hast to ioine with him at this time, fith for his sake, and at his sute, he had passed the seas with his armie, to the intent to make wars in France in reuerge of both their iniuries: the time seruing their turnes so well as they could with desire, the opportunitie whereof could neuer happilie be recovered againe. The duke after he had excused himselfe, with alledging the dishonour that should haue rebounded to him, if he had left the siege of Jussie without meane of some shew of composition, encouraged king Edward to aduance forward with manie golden promyses, aswell of his owne part, as of the constable. The king agreed to the dukes persuasion, and so set forward.

But yet when he was entred into the dukes countries, the Englishmen were not so friendlie interteined as they looked to haue bene: for at their coming to Peronne, there were but a few suffered to enter the gates, the remnant were driven to lodge in the fields, better purueied of their owne, than of the dukes provision. And at their coming before saint Quintines (which towne the constable had promised to deliuer into the hands of the duke of Burgognie) the artillerie shot off, and they of the towne came forth both on horsebacke and foot to skirmish with them that approached, of the which two or three were slaine. This interteinement seemed strange to king Edward, pondering the last daies promise with this daies doing. But the duke excused the matter, and would haue persuaded him to make countenance to besiege the towne, that the constable might haue a colour to render it into his hands, as though he did it by constraint.

But the king, remembering what had bene told to his herald by the French king, how he should be displembled with, perceived the French kings words to be true, and therefore thought it more sure to heare the faire words of the constable and the duke, than to giue credit to their vntrue and deceitfull doings. The Englishmen returned vnto their campe in a great chafe towards the constable; and the next daie to increase their displeasure, an other cosolue was ministered, that smarted soper. For duke Charles of Burgognie toke his leaue suddenly of king Edward, alledging that he must needs see his armie in Artois, promising shortly with all his puissance to returne againe to the great commoditie of them both. This departing much troubled the king of England, because he looked for no such thing; but thought rather that he should haue had the duke his continuall fellow in armes; and therefore this displembing and vnstedfast working caused the king to thinke that he neuer thought, and to doe that he neuer intended.

The French king in this meane while had assembled a mightie power, ouer the which he had made monsieur Robert de Esouteille capteine, whome he sent to Artois, to defend the frontiers there against the king of Englands entrie, and he himselfe tarried still at Senlis: but though he shewed countenance thus of warre, yet inwardlie desirous of peace, according to the aduise giuen him by the English herald, he caused a varlet or yeoman (as I may call him) to be put in a coat armour of France, which for hast was made of a trumpet baner. For king Lewis was a man nothing precise in outward shewes of honoz, oftentimes hauing neither officer of armes, trumpet in his court, nor other cosall appurtenances belonging to the port of a prince, which should be glorious and replenished with pompe, as the poet saith:

Regia mirifici fulgent insignia regis.

This counterfeit herald, being thoroughlie instructed in his charge, was sent to the king of England, and so passing forth; when he approached the English campe, he put on his coat of armes, & being espied of the outriders, was brought to a tent, where the lord Howard and the lord Stanleie were at dinner, of whome he was courteously receiued, and by them conueied to the kings presence, vnto whom he declared his message so vntillie, that in the end he obtained a safe conduct for one hundred horses, for such persons as his maister should appoint to meet, as manie to be assigned by king Edward in some indifferent place betwene both armies, to haue a like safe conduct from his said maister, as he receiued from him. The words of which herald are worthy the noting, reported in writers as folloiweth.

others princes territories and dominions, with their merchandizes and wares: and finallye, the one to liue with the other, as frends with frend, brother with brother, companion with companion, in continuall loue, rest, and tranquillitie. And for his part he doth affirme & saie, that since he receiued first the crowne of his kingdome, and was annointed with the holie ampull, he neuer attempted, nor yet once imagined a nie war, or thing preiudiciall toward your roiall person, your realme, or your people.

If you peradventure will saie, that he supported & maintained the earle of Marwike against your maiestie, he suerlie that doth & will denie: for he aided him against the duke of Burgognie, whom he knew not onelie to be his extreame enemie, but also to laie in wait (both by sea and land) either to take him, or betterlie to destroye him. Which duke of Burgognie, onelie for his owne cause, hath exercised and solicited your highnesse to come ouer the troublous and tempestuous seas, to the intent to cause (yea in maner to compell) the king my master, to condescend to such treatie and appointment, as should be to his onlie profit, and neither to your honour, nor yet to your gaine. For if he & such other as daillie flattered him for their peculiar profits (as he had manie in deed that daillie sucked at his elbow) had once obtained the thing that they breathed for, all your affaires were put in obliuion, and left at large for them, or their assistants, even as they be at this daie. Hath not the duke of Burgognie caused you first to come into France: after to set forward your armie; and in conclusion, for lacke of his promise, to lose the faire season of the yeare, and to lie in the fields in winter? Which warre (if it continue) shall neither be profitable to you, nor to your nobilitie, nor yet pleasant but painefull to your communalitie: and finallye to both the realmes, and especiallie to merchant men shall bring both miserie, pouertie, and calamitie.

Came the duke of Burgognie from Pusse to Calis, onlie to visit you: Kede he all that post hall onelie to blind you: Returned he backe into Lorraine againe for anie cause, but onelie to leaue you desolate, & to abandon you: Did he or the constable keepe anie one promise with you? Why do you then belaeue, and yet still trust them, in whome you neuer found faith nor fidelitie: But if God will it so ordeine, that you and my master may toine in league and amitie, I dare both saie and sweare, that the fine stele neuer cleaued faster to the adamant stone, than he will sticke & claspe with you, both in wealth and woo, in prosperitie and aduersitie. And if it shall please you, to harken to anie reasonable treatie, I being a poore man, shall on ieopardie of my life which is my chiefe treasure) undertake, that this communication shall sort and come to such an effect, that both you & your nobilitie shall be glad and reioise, and your commons shall be contented and pleased; and they that haue deceiued you, shall be both abashed and ashamed. Most humble beseeching your highnesse, if your pleasure shall incline this waie, that I may haue a sure safe conduct for one hundred hostes, for such personages as the king my master shall send vnto you with further intimation of his mind and purpose. And if your pleasure shall be to haue the communication in anie place indifferent betwene both the armies; then shall I warrant you the like safe conduct for your men, as you do send for ours.

When he had accomplished his message and instructions, the king of England and his counsell highlie commended his audacitie, his tongue, and his sobernesse, giving to him in reward a faire gilt cup, with a hundred angels: deliuering him a safe conduct according to his request and demand, with the which he with good departed, hauing with him an English herald to bring a like safe conduct from the French king.

After that the safe conducts were deliuered on both parts, the ambassadours met at a village beside Amiens. On the king of Englands side, the lord Howard, sir Thomas Saintleger, doctor Morton after bishop of Glouc, & chancelor of England, were chiefe. For the French king, the bastard of Bourbon admerall of France; the lord Saint Pierre; & the bishop of Cueur called Heberge, were appointed as principall. The Englishmen demanded the whole realme of France, or at the least Normandie and whole Aquitaine. The allegations were proued by the Englishmen, and politikelie defended by the Frenchmen, so that with arguments, without conclusion, the day passed, and the commissioners departed, and made relation to their masters. The French king and his counsell would not consent, that the Englishmen should haue one foot of land within France; but rather determined to put him selfe & the whole realme in hazard and aduenture.

At the next meeting the commissioners agreed by on certeine articles, which were of both the princes accepted and allowed. It was first accorded, that the French king should paie to the king of England without delate sequentie & five thousand crownes of the sunne; and yereleie fiftie thousand crownes to be paid at London during king Edwards life. And further it was agreed, that Charles the Dolphin should marrie the ladie Elizabeth, eldest daughter to king Edward, and they two to haue for the maintenance of their estates the whole duchie of Guen, or else fiftie thousand crownes yereleie to be paid within the Tower of London by the space of nine yeares; and at the end of that terme, the Dolphin and his wife to haue the whole duchie of Guen, and of the charge the French king to be cleerlie acquit. And it was also concluded, that the two princes should come to an interviue, and there take a corporall oth for the performance of this peace, either in sight of other.

On the king of Englands part were comprised as allies (if they would thereto assent) the dukes of Burgognie and Britaine. It was also couenanted, that after the whole summe aforesaid of sequentie and five thousand crownes were paid to king Edward, he should leaue in hostage the lord Howard, and sir John Cheinie master of his house, untill he with all his armie was passed the seas. This agreement was verie acceptable to the French king; for he saw himselfe and his realme thereby deliuered of great perill that was at hand; for not onelie he should haue bene assailed (if this peace had not taken place) both by the power of England and Burgognie, but also by the duke of Britaine, and diuerse of his owne people, as the constable and others. The king of England also understanding his owne state, for want of monie, to mainteine the warres, if they should long continue (though otherwise he desired to haue attempted some high enterpryse against the Frenchmen) was the more easilie induced to agree by those of his counsell, that loued peace better than warre, and their wiuues soft beds better than hard armes, and a stonie lodging.

The duke of Gloucester and others, whose swords thirsted for French blood, cried out on this peace; saying that all their trauell, paines, & expenses were to their shame lost and cast awaie, and nothing gained but a continuall mocke (and daillie derision of the French king and all his minions. This imagination took effect without delay. For a gentleman of the French kings chamber, after the peace was concluded, did demand of an Englishman, how manie battels king Edward had vanquished? He answered, nine: wherein he himselfe personallie had bene. A great honour said the Frenchman. But I praise you (quoth he smiling) how manie hath he lost? The Englishman perceiving what he meant, said: one, which you by policie, and by no strength, haue caused him to lose.

Well said the Frenchman, you maie ponder in a paire of balance, the gaine of nine gotten battels, and the rebuke of this one in this manner lost: for I tell you, that we haue this saing; The force of England hath and doth surmount the force of France: but the ingenious wits of the Frenchmen excell the dull braines of Englishmen. For in all battels you haue bene the gainers, but in leagues and treaties our wits haue made you losers: so that you maie content your selues with the losse in treaties, for the spoile that you gat in warres and battels. This communication was reported to the French king, who priuie sent for the Englishman to supper, and not onlie made him good there, but also gaue him a thousand crownes, to praise the peace and to helpe to mainteine the same. Yet neuerthelesse, he being not a little moued with these braggs, declared all the communication to the duke of Gloucester; who swaie, that he would neuer haue set foot out of England, if he had not thought to haue made the Frenchmen once to assaile the strength & puissance of the Englishmen: but what so euer he thought, all things were transferred into an other end than he could imagine.]

When the duke of Burgognie heard that there was a peace in hand betwixt king Edward and the French king, he came in no small hast from Lutzeburgh, onlie accompanied with sixtene horses into the king of Englands lodging, and began as one in a great chafe soze to blame his doings, declaring in plaine termes how dishonorable this peace should be unto him, hauing attained nothing of that about the which he came. The king of England, after he had giuen him leaue to speake his fantasie, answered him somewhat roundlie againe, openlie reprouing him for his promise-breaking and vncourteous dealing with him: where for his cause chafie he had passed the seas, and now found him not to keepe touch in a tie one point which he had couenanted. But to adde more weight to the matter in hand; sith it was so seruicelie debated betwene the two potentats, let vs heare what talke hissoziens report to haue bene interchanged betwene them. The king of England (saith mine author) not a little abashed both at the dukes sudden coming, and his fierce countenance, like one that would rather bite than shine, demanded of him the cause of his sudden coming. The duke sharpelie answered, to know whether he had either entered into anie communication, or onelie had absolutelie concluded a peace betwene the French king and him. King Edward declared how that for sundrie and diuerse great and urgent causes, touching as well the vniuersall publike wealth of the whole christianitie, as their owne priuate commoditie and the quietnesse of their realmes, he and the French king had concluded a peace and amitie for terme of nine peares, in the which were comprised, as fellows and friends, both he and the duke of Britaine, requiring him to condescend and agree to the same.

Oh Lord, oh saint George (quoth the duke of Burgognie) haue you thus done in deed: Haue you passed the seas, entered into France, and without killing of a poxe ste, or burning of a sallow shepecote, and haue taken a shamefull truce? Did your noble ancestoz, Edward the third, euer make armie into France (as he made manie) in the which he did not either gaine victorie in battell, or profit in conquering cities, to townes, and countries: That victorious prince, as nere kin to me, as you to king Henrie the first, I meane whose blood you haue either rightfullie or wrongfullie (God knoweth) extinguished & destroyed, with a small puissance entered into France, conquered whole Normandie, and not alonelie conquered it, but peaceablie kept it, and neuer would either comen or agree to anie league, untill he had the whole realme of France offered him; & was thereof made regent and heire apparant. And you without anie thing doing, or anie honour or profit gaining, haue condescended to a peace, both as honourable and as profitable to you as a peasecod, and not so wholesome as a pomegranat. Thinke you that I either moued you, or once intiled you to take this iournie for my peculiar advantage or commoditie (which of my power am able to reuenge mine owne causes, without helpe of others) but onelie to haue you recouer your old rights and possessions, which were from you both tortiouslie and wrongfullie withhelden? And to the intent that you shall know that I haue no need of your aid, I will neither enter into your league, nor take truce with the French king, till you be passed the sea, and haue bene there thre moneths.

When duke Charles had thus said, he furiously threw downe his chaire, and would haue departed. But the king him staide & said: Brother Charles, sith you haue spoken at leasure what you would, you must and shall heare againe what you would not. And first, as concerning our entrie into France, no man liuing knoweth that occasion, neither so well, nor hath cause halfe so well to remember it as you: for if you haue not fallie put your greatest things (to be had in memorie) in your booke of oblivion, you be not yet out of mind how the French king, for all your power, toke from you the faire towne of Amiens, and the strong pile of saint Quintins, with diuerse other townes, which you neither durst nor yet were able either to rescue or defend. Since which time, how he hath plagued you, how he hath taken from you your friends; yea, of your priuate chamber and secret counsell (by whome all your secrets be to him reuealed and made open) you know or haue better cause to remember, and not to forget them. And when you determined to besiege the towne of Boule, you thought your selfe in a great doubt, whether you should lose more at home by your absence (the French king dreaming and waiting like a fox for his preie) or gaine more in Germanie by your power and presence. And to keepe the wolfe from the fold, that is, the French king from your castles and dominions, was the chiefe and principall cause whie you

The duke of Gloucester and others, whose swords thirsted for French blood, cried out on this peace; saying that all their trauell, paines, & expenses were to their shame lost and cast awaie, and nothing gained but a continuall mocke (and daillie derision of the French king and all his minions. wanted, and had plenty of wine: for the French king had sent into their armie a hundred carts of the best wine that could be gotten, and good chere made them of his owne costs. For at the enterie of euery gate, there were two long tables set on euery side of the street where they should passe; and at euery table five or six gentlemen of the best companions of all the countie were appointed to intertaine the Englishmen as they entered, not onelie to see them served without lacking (but also to drinke and make good chere, and keepe companie with them. And euery as they entered into the towne, they were taken by the bidels and in maner inforced to drinke, wherefore euery they came they paid no monie, but were sent scot free.] This chere lasted thre or foure daies not onelie to the French kings cost, but also to his vniuersitie at length, doubting to haue bene disposed of his towne.

For on a date there entered the number of nine thousand Englishmen well armed in sundrie companies, so that no Frenchman durst once forbid them to enter. But finally, order was taken by the king of England, who meant no deceit, that no greater number should enter than was convenient, and the other were called backe; so that the French king and his counsell were well quieted, and rid of casting further perils than need required. After this, both the kings interuiewed together at Picquenie on the water of Some thre leagues about Amiens, theiuing great courtelie either to other. The letters of both their agreements were opened and red, & then either prince laid his right hand on the missall, and his left hand on the holie crosse (as it was termed) and took there a solenne oth to obserue and keepe the treatie for nine yeares concluded betwene them, with all their confederates and allies, compyled, mentioned and specified in the same, and further to accomplish the marriage of their children.

There was with either prince twelve noble men at this meeting, which was upon a bridge cast ouer the water of Some, a grate being set ouerthwart the same in the midst, so from side to side, that the one prince could not come vnto the other; but onelie to embrace ech other, in putting their armes through the holes of the grate. There were foure Englishmen appointed to stand with the Frenchmen on the bridge to see their demeanour; and likewise foure Frenchmen were appointed to the Englishmen for the same purpose. There were with the king of England his brother the duke of Clarence, the earle of Northumberland, the bishop of Ely his chancellor, the lord Hastings his chamberlaine, and eight others. They had louing and vertie familiar talke together a good space, both afore their companie, and secretlie alone, whilst their companie (of courtelie) withdrew somewhat backe.

But it is notable, which I read touching both the kings meeting, the manner of their attire, and demeanour; namelie that when the token of meeting by the shot of the artillerie was knowne, the French king with twelve noble men entered the bridge, and came to the cloister, with whom was John duke of Bourbon, and the cardinall his brother, a prelat more meet for a ladies carpet, than for an ecclesiasticall pulpit, and ten other, amongst whom the lord of Argenton was in like disguised attire as the French king wore, for so was his pleasure that saie to haue him adorne. The king of England and foure other with him were apparelled in cloth of gold frised, hanning on his bonnet of blake velvet a flower: delice of gold, set with vertie rich and orient stones; he was a goodlie faire and beautifull prince, beginning a litle to grow in flesh. Now when he approached nere the grate, he took off his cap, and made a low and solenne obli-sance: the French king made to him an humble reuerence, but after his fashion somewhat homelie. King Lewes embraced king Edward through the barriers, saying: Cousine you be right heartilie welcome into these parties, assuring you that there is no man in the world that I haue more desired to see and speake with, than with you: and now landed be almighty God, we be here met together for a good and godlie purpose, whereof I doubt not but that we shall haue cause to reioice. The king of England thanked him, and answered to his words so soberlie, so grauelie, and so princelie, that the Frenchmen thereat not a litle miled. The chancellor of England made there a solenne oration in laud and praise of peace, concluding on a prophesie, which said that at Picquenie should be concluded a peace both honorable and profitable to the realmes of England and France.

When the oth was taken and swoyne (as before you haue heard) the French king said merilie to king Edward, Brother, if you will take paines to come to Paris, you shall be feasted and intertained with ladies; and I shall appoint you the cardinall of Bourbon for your confessor, which shall gladlie absolue you of such finnes, if anie be committed. The king of England took these words pleasantlie and thankesfullie, for he was informed that the cardinall was a good companion, and a chapelaine meet for such a dallieng pastime. When this communication was merilie ended, the French king, intending to shew himselfe like a maister amongst his seruants, made all his companie to draw backe from him, meaning to commune with the king of England secretlie. The Englishmen withdrew them without any commandement: When the two kings communed alone secretlie, I thinke not to the profit of the constable of France. The French king demanded of king Edward, whether the duke of Burgonie would accept the truce: King Edward answered that he would once againe make an offer; and then upon the refusal, he would referre and report the trust to them both. Then king Lewes began to speake of the duke of Britaine, whom he would faine haue excepted out of the league. To whom the king of England answered: Brother, I require you to moue no warre to the duke of Britaine; for on my fidelitie, in the time of my need and aduersitie, I neuer found a more friendlie, sure and stedfast louer than he.

Then king Lewes called his companie againe, and with most lololie and amiable commendations took his leaue of the king of England, speaking certeine friendlie words to euery Englishman: king Edward doing likewise to the Frenchmen. When both at one time departed from the barriers, & mounted on horsebacke, and departed; the French king to Amiens, and king Edward to his armie. To whom was sent out of the French kings house, all things necessarie for a prince, inso much that neither torches nor torchets lacked valent. When the French king was departed from Picquenie, he called to him the lord of Argenton, saying: By the peace of God, the king of England is an amorous and a faire prince; he at the first becke would gladlie see Paris, where he might fortune to find such pleasant and talkatiue dames, which with faire words & pleasant pastimes might so allure him to their fantasies; that it might be occasion in him to come ouer the sea againe, which I would not gladlie see. For his progenitors haue bene so long and too often both in Paris and Normandie. On this side the sea I loue neither his sight nor his companie; but when he is at home I loue him as my brother, and take him as my friend. The French king, after this departing, soe desired to make warre on the duke of Britaine: which he could not doe, except he were left out of the treatie.

Wherefore he sent the lord of Buchage, and the lord of saint Pierre, to the king of England, intreating him by all waies and motions possible, to leaue the duke of Britaine for his alie, and not to haue him comprehended in the league. The king of England hearing them so feruently and so feruently speake against the duke of Britaine, with an earnest countenance answered, saing: My lords, I assure you; if I were peaceable at home in my realme, yet for the defense of the duke of Britaine and his countrie, I would passe the seas againe, against all them that either would do him inturie, or make warre vpon him. The French lords nothing further saing, much marvelled why the king of England so suerly claue to the duke of Britains partie: but they knew not (nor else at the least remembred not) that Henrie earle of Richmond was within the power and dominion of the duke of Britaine, whome king Edwards than- talle euer gaue him would make once a title to the crowne of England, as next heire to the house of Lancaster. For he knew well, that if the duke of Britaine would transport him into England (where hee had both kinfolks and friends) with neuer so small an aid (yea, though it were but the shadow of an ar- mate) then were he enforced netolie to begin againe a conquest, as though he had neuer wone the crowne, nor obtained the possession of the realme, which was the verie cause why he stucke so fast to the duke of Britains part.

The same night the lords returned to Amiens, and reported to their maister king Edwards answer, who therewith was not the best pleased. But please or displeasure, there was no remedie: but to dis- semble the matter. This same night also, there came the lord Howard, and two other of the king of Englands counsell, who had bene roadiutoys to- ward the peace, to the French king to supper. The lord Howard said to the French king secretly in his eare, that if it stood with his pleasure, he could per- suade the king of England to come to Amiens, yea, peradventure as farre as Paris, familiarly and friendly to solace himselfe with him, as his trustie friend and faithfull brother. The French king, to whom this motion was nothing pleasant, calling for water, washed, and rose without anie answer ma- king: but he said to one of his counsell, that he ima- gined in his owne conceipt, that this request would be made. The Englishmen began againe to com- mune of that matter, the Frenchmen politikelie brake their communication, saing: that the king with all celeritie must march forward against the duke of Burgognie.

Although this motion seemed onelie to increase loue and continuall amitie betwene the princes; yet the Frenchmen, hauing in their perfect remem- brance the innumerable damages and hurts, which they of late daies had sustained by the English na- tion (whereby continuall hatred increased against them in France) thought by policie and wisdom, with faire words and friendly countenance, to put by this request, and to motion them rather to depart homeward, than to picke them forward to Paris; where peradventure they might be so intertained at this time, that they would at another come thither, both undesired and unwelcomed. This peace was said to be made onelie by the Holie-ghost, because that on the daie of meeting, a white dove sat on the top of the king of Englands tent: whether she came there to dize him, or came thither as a token given by God, I referre it to your iudgment. At this treatie and meeting was not the duke of Gloucester, nor o- ther lords which were not content with this truce; but the duke came afterwards to Amiens, with di- uerse other lords of England, to the French king, which both highly pleased them; and also presented them with plate and harness well garnished.

King Edwards, considering what gaine the Eng- lishmen had gotten by making warre in France; and what miserie, what calamitie, and what pouertie the French nation had suffered, and manie peeres sustained, by reason of the said warres; determined clearely rather to pacifie and intertaine the Eng- lish nation by faire words and great rewards (al- though it were to his great charge) than by too much hardnesse to put himselfe, his nobilitie & realme in hazard, by giving them battell, as his predecessors had vnto selfe done at Poitiers, and at Agincourt. Wherefore to breie peace, he granted king Edwards for a yearely tribute fiftie thousand crownes, to be paid at London; which, accounting a crowne at foure shillings, amounteth to ten thousand pounds. And to haue the fauour and good will of his chiefe counsellors, he gaue great pensions, amounting to the summe of sixteene thousand crownes a yeare, that is to saie: to his chancelor, to the lord Hastings his chiefe chamberleine, a man of no lesse wit than ver- tue, and of great authoritie with his maister, and that not without cause; for he had as well in time of ad- uersitie, as in the faire flattering world, well and tru- lie serued him: and to the lord Howard, to sir Tho- mas Spontgomerie, to sir Thomas Senteleger, to sir John Cheinie maister of the kings harness, to the marques Dorset, sonne to the queene, and diuerse o- ther, he gaue great and liberrall rewards, to the in- tent to keepe himselfe in amitie with England, while he liued and obtained his purpose and desire in other places.

These persons had giuen to them great gifts, be- side yearely pensions. For Argenton his counsellor affirmed of his owne knowledge, that the lord Ho- ward had in lesse than the tearme of two yeares, for reward in monie and plate, foure and twentie thou- sand crownes; at the time of this meeting, he gaue to the lord Hastings the kings chiefe chamberleine, (as the Frenchmen write) an hundred markes of sil- uer, made in plate: whereof enerie marke is eight ounces sterling. But the English writers affirme, that he gaue the lord Hastings foure and twentie do- zen bolles, that is to saie, twelue dozen gilt, & twelue dozen bright, enerie cup twelue hundred nobles: which gift, either betokened in him a great liberrall nature, or else a great and especial confidence that he had reposed in the said lord chamberleine. Beside this, he gaue him yearely two thousand crownes pension; the which summe he sent to him by Piers Cleret, one of the maisters of his house, giuing him in charge to receiue of him an acquittance for the re- ceipt of the same pension, to the intent that it should appeare in time to come, that the chancelor, chamber- leine, admerall, maisters of the harness to the king of England, and manie other of his counsell, had bin in fee and pensionaries of the French king, whose yearely acquittances (the lord Hastings onelie re- cepted) remained of record to be shewed in the cham- ber of accounts in the palace of Paris.

When Piers Cleret had paid the pension to the lord Hastings, he gently demanded of him an ac- quitance for his discharge. Which request when he denied, he therevnto asked of him a bill of three lines to be directed to the king, testifying the receipt of the pension: to the intent that the king your maister should not thinke the pension to be imbevelled. The lord Hastings, although he knew that Piers de- manded nothing but reason, answered him: Sir this gift cometh onelie of the liberrall pleasure of the king his maister, and not of my request: if it be his determinat will that I shall haue it, then put you it into my skene; and if not, I praye you render to him his his gift againe: for neither he nor you shall haue either letter, acquittance, or scroll signed with my hand of the receipt of anye pension, to the intent to buy another daie, that the kings chamberleine of England hath bene pensionarie with the French king, & theto his acquittance in the chamber of accounts, to his dishonour: Wiers left his monie behind, and made relation of all things to his maister: which although that he had not his will, yet he much more praised the wisdom and policie of the lord Hastings, than of the other pensionaries, commanding him pearly to be paid, without anye discharge demanding.]

When the king of England had receiued his monie, and his nobilitie their rewards, he trusted by his tents, laded his baggage, and departed towards Calis. [But yet he came there, he remembryng the craftie dissimulation, and the vntreue dealing of Kewes earle of saint Paule, high constable of France, intending to declare him to the French king in his verie true likenesse and portrature, sent him two letters of credence, twixten by the said constable, with the true report of all such wordes and messages as had bene to him sent, and declared by the said constable and his ambassadours. Which letters the French king gladly receiued, and thankesfully accepted, as the these instrument to bring the constable to his death: which he escaped no long season after, such is the end of dissemblers.] When king Edward was come to Calis, and had set all things in an order, he toke ship, and sailed with a prosperous wind into England, and was roiallie receiued vpon Blackheath by the maior of London and the magistrates, and five hundred commoners apparelled in murrie, the eight and twentieth daie of September, and so conueyed through the citie of Westminster, where for a while (after his long labour) he reposed himselfe: euery daie almost talking with the queene his wife of the marriage of his daughter, whome he caused to be called Dolphinelle: thinking nothing sorer than that marriage to take effect, according to the treatie. The hope of which marriage caused him to dissemble, and do things which after ward chanced greatlie to the French kings profit, & smallie to his.]

About the same season, the French king, to compass his purpose for the getting of the constable into his hands, toke truce with the duke of Burgognie for nine yeares, as a contractor in the league, and not comprehended as an other princes alie. The king of England aduertised hereof, sent ouer sir Thomas Montgomerie to the French king, offering to passe the seas againe the next summer in his aid, to make warres on the duke Burgognie, so that the French king should paie to him fiftie thousand crownes for the losse which he should susteine in his custome, by reason that the wolles at Calis (because of the warres) could haue no vent, and also paie halfe the charges and halfe the wages of his souldiers and men of warre. The French king thanked the king of England for his gentle offer, but he alledged that the truce was already concluded, so that he could not then attempt anye thing against the same without reproch to his honour.

But the truth was, the French king neither loved the sight nor liked the companie of the king of England on that side the sea; but when he was here at home, he both loved him as his brother, and toke him as his friend. Sir Thomas Montgomerie was with plate richly rewarded, and so dispatched. Where returned with him the lord Howard and sir John Cheynie, which were hostages with the French king, till the English armie were returned into England. King Edward, hauing established all things in good order, as men might iudge, both within his realme and without, was yet troubled in his mind, for that

Henrie the earle of Richmond (one of the blood of king Henrie the first) was aliue, and at libertie in Britaine: therefore to attempt crosse the mind of Francis duke of Britaine, he sent ouer vnto the said duke, one doctor Stillington, and two other his ambassadours laden with no small summe of gold.

These ambassadours, declaring their message, affirmed that the king their maister willed to haue the earle of Richmond onelle for this purpose, to ioine with him in aliance by marriage, and so to plucke by all the leanings of discord betwene him and the contrarie faction. The duke gentlie heard the orators. And though at the first he by excuses denied their request, yet at the length, beleuing that king Edward would giue to the earle his eldest daughter, the ladie Elizabeth in marriage, he consented to deliuer him, and receiued of the English orators a great summe of monie. But yet they were imbarcked with their preie, the duke being aduertised, that the earle of Richmond was not so earnestlie sought for, to be conpled in marriage with king Edwards daughter; but rather that his head might be chopped off with an hatchet, caused his treasurer Peter Landoise to conueie the said earle of Richmond into a sanctuarie at S. Malo, where the English ambassadours then laie, onelle staleng for a conuentent wind: who complained, that they were euill vfed, to be spoiled both of their monie and merchandize.

Yet because the matter was so handled, that it seemed the earle escaped into the sanctuarie through their owne negligence, after they had receiued him into their hands, they were sone answered: but yet promise was made, that the earle should be safely kept, either in the sanctuarie, or else as prisoner in the dukes house, that they should not need to feare him more than his shadow. And thus the king of England purchased for his monie the keeping of his enemie, the space onelle of three daies and no more. King Edward was somewhat displeased with this chance, but yet trusting that the duke of Britaine would (according to promise) see the earle of Richmond safely kept from doing anye greuaunce to him or his subiects, put all doubts therof out of his mind, and began to studie how to keepe a liberall princelie house, and there vpon stozing his chests with monie, he imploied no small portion in god housekeeping.

But hauing spoken thus much of the earle of Richmond, whome Edward Hall compareth to a chepe betraied into the tath and clauies of the wolfe, you shall vnderstand, that at such time as his troubles were set fresh abroach, and he knowing that he was going towards his death, for verie penitencelle and inward thought, fell into a seruent and soze ague. In which verie season, one John Cheulet, so esteemed among the princes of Britaine as few were in all the countrie, and in much credit, and well accepted with the duke, was (when these things were thus concluded) for his solace in the countrie. Who being hereof certified, was chased with the abhominaton of the fact, resorted to the court, and familiarlie came to the dukes presence, where he stood so sadlie and so pale, without anye word speaking, that the duke was much abashed, and suddenlie marvelled at his sad and strowning countenance, and demanded of him what should signifie that dumplinesse of mind, and inward sighing, the which by his countenance manifestlie appeared and was euident: He modestlie answered; Most noble and redoubted lord, this palenesse of visage and deadlie looke doth prognosticate the time of my death to approach and be at hand, which if it had chanced to me before this daie, I assure you, it had much lesse hurt me. For then had I not bene referred to feele the dolorous pangis and sorrowfull sighings, which a fact by you done (that I thought

When the king of England had receiued his monie, and his nobilitie their rewards, he trusted by his tents, laded his baggage, and departed towards Calis. [But yet he came there, he remembryng the craftie dissimulation, and the untrue dealing of Welles earle of saint Paule, high constable of France, intending to declare him to the French king in his verie true likeness and portraiture, sent him two letters of credence, written by the said constable, with the true report of all such words and messages as had bene to him sent, and declared by the said constable and his ambassadours. Which letters the French king gladly receiued, and thankfully accepted, as the cheefe instrument to bring the constable to his death: which he escaped no long season after, such is the end of dissemblers.] When king Edward was come to Calis, and had set all things in an order, he took ship, and sailed with a prosperous wind into England, and was royally receiued upon Blackheath by the mayo^r of London and the magistrates, and five hundred commoners apparelled in murrie, the eight and twentieth daie of September, and so conueied through the citie of Westminster, where for a while (after his long labour) he reposed himselfe: euerie daie almost talking with the queene his wife of the marriage of his daughter, whome he called to be called Dolphinelle: thinking nothing sorer than that marriage to take effect, according to the treatie. The hope of which marriage caused him to dissemble, and do things which afterward chanced greatlie to the French kings profit, & smallie to his.]

About the same season, the French king, to compass his purpose for the getting of the constable into his hands, took truce with the duke of Burgognie for nine yeares, as a contrado^r in the league, and not comprehended as an other princes alie. The king of England aduertised hereof, sent ouer sir Thomas Montgomerie to the French king, offering to passe the seas againe the next summer in his aid, to make warres on the duke Burgognie, so that the French king should paie to him fiftie thousand crownes for the losse which he should susteine in his custome, by reason that the woulles at Calis (because of the warres) could haue no vent, and also paie halfe the charges and halfe the wages of his souldiers and men of warre. The French king thanked the king of England for his gentle offer, but he alledged that the truce was already concluded, so that he could not then attempt anie thing against the same without reproch to his honour.

But the truth was, the French king neither loved the sight nor liked the companie of the king of England on that side the sea; but when he was here at home, he both loved him as his brother, and took him as his friend. Sir Thomas Montgomerie was with plate richly rewarded, and so dispatched. There returned with him the lord Howard and sir John Cheolme, which were hostages with the French king, till the English armie were returned into England. King Edward, having established all things in good order, as men might iudge, both within his realme and without, was yet troubled in his mind, for that

Henrie the earle of Richmond (one of the blood of king Henrie the first) was alive, and at libertie in Britaine: therefore to attempt cōfession the mind of Francis duke of Britaine, he sent ouer unto the said duke, one doctor Stillington, and two other his ambassadours laden with no small summe of gold.

These ambassadours, declaring their message, affirmed that the king their maister willed to haue the earle of Richmond onelie for this purpose, to ioine with him in alliance by marriage, and so to plucke by all the leanings of discord betwene him and the contrarie faction. The duke gentlie heard the orators. And though at the first he by excuses denied their request, yet at the length, beleueing that king Edward would giue to the earle his eldest daughter, the ladie Elizabeth in marriage, he consented to deliuer him, and receiued of the English orators a great summe of monie. But yet they were imbarcked with their preie, the duke being aduertised, that the earle of Richmond was not so earnestlie sought for, to be coupled in marriage with king Edwards daughter; but rather that his head might be chopped off with an hatchet, caused his treasurer Peter Landouice to conueie the said earle of Richmond into a sanctuarie at S. Malo, where the English ambassadours then laie, onelie stateng for a conuenient wind: who complained, that they were euill bled, to be spoiled both of their monie and merchandize.

Yet because the matter was so handled, that it seemed the earle escaped into the sanctuarie through their owne negligence, after they had receiued him into their hands; they were some answered: but yet promise was made, that the earle should be safely kept, either in the sanctuarie, or else as prisoner in the dukes house, that they should not need to feare him more than his shadow. And thus the king of England purchased for his monie the keeping of his enemye, the space onelie of three daies and no more. King Edward was somewhat displeased with this chance, but yet trusting that the duke of Britaine would (according to promise) see the earle of Richmond safely kept from doing anie greivance to him or his subjects, put all doubts therof out of his mind, and began to studie how to keepe a liberall princelie house, and thereupon stozing his chests with monie, he employed no small portion in good housekeeping.

But having spoken thus much of the earle of Richmond, whome Edward Hall compareth to a sheepe betrayed into the teeth and claws of the wolfe, you shall understand, that at such time as his troubles were set fresh abroach, and he knowing that he was going towards his death, for verie penitence and inward thought, fell into a seruent and sore ague. In which verie season, one John Cheulet, so esteemed among the princes of Britaine as few were in all the countrie, and in much credit, and well accepted with the duke, was (when these things were thus concluded) for his solace in the countrie. Who being hereof certified, was chased with the abhominatton of the fact, resorted to the court, and familiarlie came to the dukes presence, where he stood so sadlie and so pale, without anie word speaking, that the duke was much abashed, and suddenlie marvelled at his sad and frowning countenance, and demanded of him what should signifie that dumplinesse of mind, and inward sighing, the which by his countenance manifestlie appeared and was euident. He modestlie answered; Most noble and redoubted lord, this pallenesse of visage and deadlie looke doth prognosticate the time of my death to approach and be at hand, which if it had chanced to me before this daie, I assure you, it had much lesse hurt me. For then had I not bene referred to feeble the dolorous pang and sorrowfull sighings, which a fact by you done (that I thought impossible

The Hall at Calis.

Sir Thomas Montgomerie.

1475. Anno Reg. 15.

“ (impossible to be obtained) hath printed in my stomach and in my heart deeplie grauen: so that I well per-ceiue, that either I shall lose my life, or else liue in perpetuall distresse and continuall miserie.

“ For you my singular good lord, by your vertuous acts and noble feats, haue gotten to you in manner an immortall fame, which in cuerie mans mouth is extolled & advanced about the high clouds. But alas me ſaith (I praye you pardon me my rudenesse) “ that now that you haue obtained so high praise and glorie, you nothing lesse regard than to keepe and preferue the same inuolate, considering that “ you, forgetting your faith and faithfull promise made to Henrie earle of Richmond, haue deliuered the “ most innocent yong gentleman to the cruell tormentors, to be afflicted, rent in peces, and slaine.
“ Wherefore all such as loue you, of the which number I am one, cannot chuse but lament & be sorie, when “ they see openlie the fame and glorie of your most renowned name, by such a dissolatie and vnruth-“ gainst promise, to be both blotted and stained with a “ perpetuall note of slander and infamie. Peace mine owne good John (quoth the duke) I praye thee, beleue “ me there is no such thing like to happen to the earle of Richmond: for king Edward hath sent for him, to “ make of him, being his suspected enemy, his good and faire sonne in law.

“ Well well (quoth John) my redoubted lord, give “ credence vnto me: the earle Henrie is at the very brink to perill, whome if you permit once to set “ but one foot out of your power and dominion, there is no mortall creature able hereafter to deliuer him “ from death. The duke being moued with the persuasions of John Cheulet, which either little beleued, or “ smallie suspected king Edward, to desire the earle for anie fraud or deceit, or else seduced by blind auarice and loue of monie, more than honestie, fidelitie, “ or wisdom would requite, did not consider what he vnrathfully did, or what he aduisedly should haue done. Wherefore, with all diligence he sent forth Pe“ ter Landoise his chiefe treasurer, commanding him to intercept and slay the earle of Richmond, in all “ hast possible, as before you haue heard.]

“ In this yeare deceased sir John Croftie knight, (not long before this, maior of London) and was buried in the parish church of saint Helen in Bishops gate street, vnto the repairing of which parish church he gaue five hundred marks, and thirtie pounds to be distributed to poore householders in the ward of Bi“ shops gate: to the repairing of the parish church at Heneuorth in Spiddlesef fortie pounds: to the repairing of London wall one hundred pounds: toward the making of a new towre of stone at the south end of London bridge, if the same were begun by the maior and communaltie within ten yeares next af“ ter his deceasse, one hundred pounds: to the reparations of Rochester bridge ten pounds: to euerie the prisons in and about London liberallie. Also he gaue to the wardens and communaltie of the grocers in London two large pots of silver chased halfe “ gault, weighing thirtene pounds and five ounces of Troy weight, to be occupied in their common hall, and elsewhere, at their discretions.

“ In this yeare were inherited to the honour of knighthood, after the custome of England, in the time of peace the kings eldest son Edward prince of Wales, duke of Cornewall, and earle of Chester, his second sonne the duke of Yorke, and with them the earle of Lincolnes sonne and heire, the duke of Suff-“ folke, the lord Thomas Greie, the quenes sonne, and Richard his brother, the earle of Shrewesburie, the earle of Wilthire, master Edward Woodville, the lord Beuill, the lord Barkleis sonne and heire, the lord Audelies sonne and heire, the lord saint Amand, the lord Stanleis sonne and heire, the lord Suttons sonne and heire, the lord Hastings sonne and heire, the lord Ferrers of Charles sonne and heire, ma“ ster Herbert brother to the earle of Penbrooke, master Claughan Brian chiefe iudge, Aiston one of the iudges of the common pleas, master Woodingham, master Brian Stapleton, Kincuit, Wilkinson, Ludlow, Charleton, &c. The same daie the king crea“ ted the lord Thomas marquisse, Dorset, before dinner, and so in the habit of a marquisse about the habit of his knighthood he began the table of knights in saint Edwards chamber. At that time he ordered “ that the kings chamberlaine should go with the ancient and well nurtured knight, to aduertise and com-the order of knighthood to the esquires being in the baine. The king himselfe came in person and did honour to all the companie with his noble counsell.]

This yeare the duke of Burgnie was slaine by the Switzers, before the towne of Rancie in Flo“ raine, after whose death the French king won all the townes which the said duke held in Picardie and Artois. And hisseigne that the towne of Bullen and coun-“ tie of Bullemois appertained by right of inheritance vnto the lord Berthram de la Court, earle of Au-uergne, the French king bought of him his right and title in the same, and recompensed him with other lands in the countie of Fozells, and in other places.
And because the forenamed towne and countie were holden of, the earldome of Artois, he changed the “ tenure, and aduised to hold the same towne & coun-tie of our ladye of Bolongne, and therof did homage to the image in the great church of Bolongne, offerring there an hart of gold, weighing two thousand crownes, aduising further, that his heires and suc“ cessors at their entrie into their estates, by themselues or their deputies, should offer an hart of like wright and value, as a reliefe and homage for the same towne and countie.

“ This yeare was Robert Basset maior of London, who did sharpe correction vpon bakers, for making of light bread, he caused diuerse of them to be set on the pillorie in Cornhill. And also one Agnes Daintie a butterwife for selling of butter new and old mingled together, being first trapped with butter dishes, was then set on the pillorie. The countesse of “ Arford deceased and was buried at Windsoze. And so this yeare Richard Ratson one of the shiriffes of London, caused to be builded one house in the church yard of S. Marcie hospitall without Bishops gate of London, where the maior of that cite and his bre“ thren the aldermen use to sit and heare the sermons in the Easter holidates, as in times past appeared by an inscription on the front of the same house, now by weathering defaced, which I haue read in these words: Praye for the soules of Richard Ratson late “ Mercer and alderman of London, and Isabel his wife, of whose goods this worke was made and founded. Anno Dom. 1488.]

By the diligence of Ralph Josseline maior of London, the wall about London was new made be“ twixt Algate and Creplegate: he caused the poore field to be searched for claie, and bricke to be made and burnt there: he also caused chaffe to be brought out of Kent, and in the same poore field to be burnt into lime, for the furtherance of that worke. The ma“ ior with his companie of the drapers made all that part betwixt Bishops gate and Alhalowes church in the same wall. Bishops gate itselfe was new built by the merchants Almans of the Stillard, and from Alhalowes church toward poore gate a great part of the same was builded of the goods, & by the execu“ tors of sir John Croftie sometimes an alderman of London, as may appear by his armes in two places fired. The companie of Skinners made that part of the

Also this yeare Thomas Burdet an esquier of Arrol in Warwickshire, sonne to sir Nicholas Burdet (who was great butler of Normandie in Henrie the first daies) was beheaded for a word spoken in this sort. King Edward in his progresse hunted in Thomas Burdets parke at Arrol, and slew manie of his deer, amongst the which was a white bucke, whereof Thomas Burdet made great account. And therefore when he understood thereof, he wished the buckes head in his bellie that moued the king to kill it. Which tale being told to the king, Burdet was apprehended and accused of treason, for wishing the buckes head (hones and all) in the kings bellie: he was condemned, drawne from the Tower of London to Wiltshire, and there beheaded, and then buried in the Greie friers church at London. Wherefore it is god counsell that the wiseman giueth, saying: Kepe thy tong & kepe thy life, for manie times we see, that speech offenbeth & procureth mischance, where silence is autho: neither of the one nor the other, as it is true and in praise of silence spoken by the poet:

Nulli tacuisse nocet, nocet esse loquutum.

About this season, through great mishap, the sparke of priuie malice was netwile kindled betwixt the king and his brother the duke of Clarence, inasmuch that where one of the dukes seruants was suddenly accused (I can not saie whether of truth, or vntrulie suspected by the dukes enmities) of poisoning, sorcerie or inchantment, and thereof condemned, and put to execution for the same, the duke which might not suffer the wrongfull condemnation of his man (as he in his conscience iudged) nor yet forbear but to murmur and reprove the doing thereof, moued the king with his daileie exclamation to take such displeasure with him, that finally the duke was cast into the Tower, and therewith aduinged for a traitor, and priuie downed in a butt of malmesie, the eleuenth of March, in the beginning of the threuenth yeare of the kings reigne.

Some haue reported, that the cause of this noble mans death rose of a foolish prophesie, which was, that after h. Edward one should reigne, whose first letter of his name should be a C. Wherewith the king and quene were soze troubled, and began to conceiue a greuous grudge against this duke, and could not be in quiet till they had brought him to his end. And as the diuell is wont to incumber the minds of men which delite in such diuinely fantasies, they said afterward, that that prophesie lost not his effect, when after king Edward, Gloucester vsurped his kingdome. Wher alledged, that the cause of his death was for that the duke, being destitute of a wife, by the meanes of his sister the ladie Margarete, duchesse of Burgognie, procured to haue the ladie Marie, daughter and heire to his husband duke Charles.

Which marriage king Edward (enuieng the prosperitie of his brother) both gaine said and disurbed, and thereby old malice renewed betwixt them: which the quene and his bloud (ener mistrusting, and priuie barking at the kings image) ceased not to increase. But sure it is, that although king Edward were consenting to his death; yet he much did both lament his infortunate chance, & repent his sudden execution: inasmuch that when anie person sued to him for the pardon of malefactors condemned to death, he would accustomable saie, & openlie speake: Oh infortunate brother, for whose life not one would make sute. Openlie and apparantlie meaning by such words, that by the means of some of the nobilitie he was deceiued and brought to confusion.

This duke left behind him two yong infants begot of the bodie of his wife, the daughter of Richard late earle of Marwike: which children by destinie as it were, or by their owne merits, following the steps of their ancestors, succeeded them in like misfortune and semblable euill chance. For Edward his heire, whom king Edward had created earle of Marwike was thre and twentie yeares after, in the time of Henrie the seauenth, attainted of treason, and on the Tower hill lost his head. Margarete his sole daughter married to sir Richard Pole knight, and by Henrie the eight restored to the name, title, & possessions of the earldome of Salisburie, was at length for treason committed against the said Henrie the eight attainted in open parlement; and sixtie two yeares after his father had suffered death in the Tower, she on the greene within the same place was beheaded. In whose person died the berie surname of Plantagenet, which from Geoffrie Plantagenet so long in the bloud roiall of this realme had flourished and continued.

After the death of this duke, by reason of great heat and disemperance of aire, happened so fierce & quicke a pestilence, that fiftene yeares warre past consumed not the third part of the people, that onelie four moneths miserable and pitifullie dispatched & brought to their graues. So that if the number had bene kept by multipleng of vnities, & out of them to haue raised a complet number, it would haue moued matter of verie great admiration. But it should seeme that they were infinit, if consideration be had of the comparison, inferred for the more effectual setting forth of that cruell and ceaselesse contagion. And suerlie it soundeth to reason, that the pestilence should fetch a waite so manie thousands, as in iudgement by proportion of fiftene yeares warre one maie gather; and manie more too. For euerie man knoweth that in warres, time, place, persons, and meanes are limited: time of warre begun and ended; place circumscribed; persons imbattelled, and weapons also whereby the fight is tried: so that all these haue their limitations, beyond which they haue no extent. But the pestilence, being a generall infection of the aire, an element ordained to mainteine life, though it haue a limitation in respect of the totall compasse of the world; yet whole climats maie be poisoned: and it were not absurd to saie, that all and euerie part of the aire maie be pestilentlie corrupted; and so consequentlie not limited: wherefore full well it maie be said of the pestilence (procuring so great a depopulation) as one saith of sursettingte:

Ense cadunt multi, perimit sed crapula plures.

Anon.

The counsellors of the yong duchesse of Burgognie sent to h. Edward for aid against the French king. About the same time had the quene of England sent to the ladie Margarete duchesse of Burgognie, for the preferment of his brother Anthonie erle Kinners to the yong damsell. But the counsell of Flanders, considering that he was but an earle of meane estate, and the the greatest inhertrice of all christendome at that time, gaue but deafe eare to so humble a request. To which desire, if the Flemings had but giuen a liking eare by outward semblance, and with gentle words delayed the sute, she had bene both succoured and defended. Whether king Edward was not contented with this refusal, or that he was loth to breake with the French king, he would in no wise consent to send an armie into Flanders against the French king: but yet he sent ambassadoers to him with louing and gentle letters, requiring him to grow to some reasonable order & agreement with the yong duchesse of Burgognie, or at the least to take a truce with his request.

The ambassadours of England were highlie re-ceiued, bountifullie feasted, and liberalie rewarded, but answer to their desire had they none; sauing that thozillie after, the French king would send ambassa-dours, hostages, and pledges to the king of England their maister, for the perfecting and concluding of all things depending betwene them two; so that their soueraine lord & they should haue cause to be contented and pleased. These faire words were one-lie delaies to dylue time, vntill he might haue space to spoile the yong damsell of hir townes and countries. And beside this, to staie king Edward from taking part with hir, he wrote to him; that if he would ioyne with him in aid, he should haue and insoie to him and his heires the whole countie & coun-trie of Flanders, discharged of homage, superiourtie and refoyt, to be claimed by the French king, or his successors.

Large offers made to the king of England by the French king.

He also wrote that he should haue the whole duchie of Brabant, wherof the French king offered at his owne cost and charge to conquer foure of the chiefest and strongest townes within the said duchie, & them in quiet possession to deliuer to the king of England: granting further to paie him ten thousand angels toward his charges, with munitions of warre and artillerie, which he promised to lend him, with men and carriage for the conuesance of the same.
The king of England refused to make anie warres against those countries that were thus offered to him: but if the French king would make him partner of his conquests in Picardie, rendering to him part of the townes already gotten, as Bologne, Boulogne, and Abbeville, then he would suerlie take his part, and aid him with men at his owne costs and charges.

Thus passed faire words and golden promises be-twene these two princes: and in the meane time the yong duchesse of Burgognie was spoiled of hir townes, castles & territories, till at length for maintenance she condescended to marrie with Martinilian sonne to the emperour Frederike that he might keepe the wolfe from the fold. King Edward in the nineteenth yeare of his reigne began (more than he was before accustomed) to serch the forfeiture of penall lawes and statutes, as well of the cheefe of his nobilitie as of other gentlemen, being proprietaries of great possessions, or abundantlie furnished with goods; likewise of merchants, and other inferiour persons. By reason whereof, it was of all men iudged that he would proue hereafter a foze and a rigorous prince among his subjects. But this his new inuen-ted practise and couetous meaning (by reason of forreine affaires and abridgement of his daies in this transitorie life, which were within two yeares after consumed) toke some (but not great) effect.

Pestilence.

Unadvised & brutallie demeanor punished with a fine.

In this yeare was great mortalitie and death by the pestilence, not onelie in London, but in diuerse parts of the realme, which began in the latter end of September in the yeare last before passed, and continued all this yeare till the beginning of Nouember, which was about fourtene moneths: in the which space died innumerable of people in the said citie & else-where. This yeare also the maior of London being in Paules, kneeling in his deuotions at saint Erkenwalds thyrine, Robert Bisseld one of the thi-risses unadvisedlie kneeled doune nigh vnto the maior: wherof afterward the maior charged him to haue done more than becomed him. But the thirisse answering rudelie and stubbornlie, would not acknowledge to haue committed anie offense: for the which he was afterward by a court of aldermen fined at fiftie pounds to be paid toward the reparations of the conduits in London, which was trulie paid. This yeare Thomas Alam one of the thirisses of London newlie builded the great conduit in Cheape, of his owne charges. This yeare also king Edward began his Christmasse at Making, and at fine daies end removed to Greenwich, where he kept out the other part of his Christmasse with great roialtie.

Ambassadours were sent to and fro betwixt the king of England and France, and still the French king fed the king of England with faire words, putting him in hope to match his sonne and heire the Dolphin with the ladie Elizabeth daughter to the king of England, according to the conclusions of a grément had and made at Picquente betwixt them, although in verie deed he meant nothing lesse. His ambassadours euer made excuses if anie thing were amisse, and he vied to send change of ambassadours; so that if those which had bene here before, and were returned, had said or promised anie thing (though they were authorized so to do) which might turne to their masters hinderance, the other that came after, might excuse themselves by ignorance of that matter; as firming that they wanted commission once to talke or meddle with that matter: or if he perceived that anie thing was like to be concluded contrarie to his mind, for a thiff he would call his ambassadours home in great hast, and after send an other with new instructions nothing depending on the old.

Thus the French king vied to dally with king Edward in the case of this mariage, onelie to kepe him still in amitie. And certeinlie the king of England, being a man of no suspicious nature, thought sooner that the sunne should haue fallen from his circle, than that the French king would haue dissembled or broken promise with him. But there is none so soone beguiled, as he that least mistrusteth; nor a nie so able to decelue, as he to whome most credence is giuen. But as in mistrusting nothing, is great lightnesse; so in too much trusting, is too much follie: which well appeared in this matter. For the French king, by cloking his inward determinate purpose with great dissimulation and large promises, kept him still in frendship with the king of England, till he had wrought a great part of his will against the yong duchesse of Burgognie. Which king Edward would not haue suffered, if he had put anie great doubt in the French kings faire promises, considering that the crowne of France was in this meane time so much increased in dominions, to the great re-enforcement of that realme.

On the two and twentieth of Februarie were five notable shewes put to death, for robbing the church called saint Martins le grand in London, and other places; three of them were drawne to the Tower hill, hanged & burnt, the other two were pressed to death.
A foze and seuerer kind of execution no doubt, but yet thought by iustice meritorious in the malefactors, for their offenses of sacrilege. Veiuous enough had it bene to spoile a priuat man of his goods, and by law of nations punishabie with death; but much more horrible, that prophane persons with polluted hands should prouide or openlie so touch holie & consecrated things, as to take them out of a sacred place, where-to (for holy vses) they were dedicated, & apply them to the satisfieng of the corrupt concupiscences of their owne hearts, the bottomlesse gulfe whereof because no booties nor spoiles could satisfie; it stood with the high praise of iustice that they and their ceaselesse desires were seuered by deferred death; wherefore it is wiselie said by the comical poet of such grædie guts:

Quam quis animus possit escam auariter, Decipitur in transenna perique auaritia.

marks was trulle repaid againe in the next yeare following. ¶ Also this yeare on Whitsundaye k. Edward the fourth created the lord Berkeley, vicount Berkeley, at Grenewich. ¶ In this yeare also an house on London bridge called the common luge, or pituie, fell downe into the Thames, where thozough it five persons were drowned. ¶ This yeare the king with his quene kept a roiall Christmas at Windsoz.

¶ Also this yeare was one Richard Chawyle mafor of London, whome king Edward so greatlie favoured, that he toke him (with certeine of his brethen the aldermen, & commons of the cite of London) into the forrest of Waltham, where was orde-ned for them a pleasant lodge of greene boughs, in which lodge they dined with great chere; & the king would not go to dinner untill he saw them served.
¶ After he caused the lord chamberlaine, with other lords, to chere the said maioz and his companie sundry times whilste they were at dinner. After dinner they went a hunting with the king, and due manie deare, as well red as fallow, whereof the king gaue unto the maioz and his companie god plentie, and sent unto the ladie mairesse and hir sisters the al-dermens wives, two harts, six bucks, and a tun of wine to make them merrie with, which was eaten in the drapers hall. The cause of which bountie thus shewed by the king, was (as most men did take) for that the maioz was a merchant of wondrous adventures into manie and sundrie countries. By reason whereof, the king had pearellie of him notable summes of monie for his customes, beside other pleasures that he had shewed unto the king before times.
¶ This yeare the Scots began to stir, against whom the king sent the duke of Gloucester & manie others, which returned againe without any notable battell.]

In this verie season James the thirde of that name king of Scots sent into England a solemne ambas-sage for to haue the ladie Cicilie, king Edwards second daughter, to be married to his eldest sonne James, prince of Scotland, duke of Rothesaie, and earle of Caricke. King Edward and his counsell, perceiving that this affinitie should be both honourable and profitable to the realme, did not onelie grant to his desire, but also before hand disbursed certaine summes of monie, to the onelie intent that the marriage hereafter should neither be hindered nor broken. With this condition, that if the said marriage by anie accidental meane should in time to come take none effect; or that king Edward would notifie to the king of Scots, or his counsell, that his pleasure was determined to haue the said marriage dissolved: then the prouost and merchants of the towne of Copenburgh, should be bound for repayment of the said summes againe. All which things were with great deliberation concluded, passed, and sealed, in hope of continuall peace and indissoluble amitie.

¶ But king James was knotone to be a man so wedded to his owne opinion, that he could not abide them that would speake contrarie to his fanlie: by meanes whereof, he was altogether led by the counsell and aduise of men of base linage, whome for their flatterie he had promoted unto great dignities and honourable offices. By which persons diuerse of the nobilitie of his realme were greatlie misused and put to trouble, both with imprisonment, exactions, & death: insomuch that some of them went into voluntarie exile. Amongst whome Alexander duke of Al-banie, brother to king James, being exiled into France, & passing through England, tarried with k.
Edward: and upon occasion moued him to make warre against his brother, the said king James, for that he forgetting his oth, promise, and affinitie concluded with king Edward, caused his subjects to make roads and forraies into the English borders, spoiling, burning, and killing king Edwards liege people.

King Edward, not a little displeased with this inprincelie doing, prouoked and set on also by the duke of Albanie, determined to invade Scotl and with an armie, as well to reuenge his owne iniuries recei-ued at the hands of king James, as to helpe to reistoz the duke of Albanie unto his countrie and possessions againe. Hereupon all the winter season he mustered his men, prepared his ordinance, rigged his ships, and left nothing unprouided for such a tour-nie: so that in the beginning of the yeare, all things appertaining to the warre, and necessarie for his voi-age, were in a readinesse. To be the chiefe of his hoast, and lieutenant generall, Richard duke of Glocester was appointed by his brother king Edward; and with him were adioined as associates, Henrie the fourth earle of Northumberland, Thomas lord Stanleie lord steward of the kings hoist, the lord Lonell, the lord Greystocke, and diuerse other noble men and twothe knights.

These ballant captains came to Alnewike in Northumberland, about the beginning of Julie, where they first incamped themselves, & marshalled their hoast. The fore-ward was led by the earle of Northumberland, vnder whose standard were the lord Scrope of Bolton, sir John Spiddleton, sir John Dichfield, and diuerse other knights, esquires, & soldiers, to the number of six thousand and seauen hundred. In the middle-ward was the duke of Gloucester, and with him the duke of Albanie, the lord Louell, the lord Greystocke, sir Edward Mowbray, and other, to the number of five thousand & eight hundred men. The lord Penill was appointed to follow, accompanied with three thousand. The lord Stanleie led the wing on the right hand of the dukes battell with foure thousand men of Lancashire & Cheshire.
The lord Fitz Hugh, sir William a Harre, sir James Harrington, with the number of two thousand soldiers, guided the left wing. And beside all these, there were one thousand appointed to giue their attendance on the ordinance.

¶ In this yeare Edmund Shaw goldsmith and mafor of London newlie builded Creplegate from the foundation, which gate in old time had bene a prison, whereunto such citizens and other as were arrested for debt (or like trespasses) were committed, as they be now to the counters, as maie appeare by a writ of king Edward the second, in these words: Rex vi- London salutem. Ex gravi querela capti & detenti in prisona nostra de Creplegate, pro x. li. quas carum Radulpho Sandwico, tunc custode civitatis nostre London, & I. de Blackwell custode recognis. debitorum, &c. King Edward held his Christmas at Eltham, and kept his estate all the whole feast in his great chamber; and the quene in hir chamber, where were daily more than two thousand persons. The same yeare on Candlemas day, he with his quene went on procession from saint Ste-phans chappell into Westminster hall, accompanied with the earle of Angus, the lord Greie, & sir James Liddall, ambassadors from Scotland. And at his proceeding out of his chamber he made sir John Mowbray-treasurer of England, & sir William Cates-bie one of the iustices of the ocmoplas, knights.]

¶ But to returne to the kings affaires concerning Scotland. The roiall armie aforesaid, not intending to lose time, came suddenly by the water side to the towne of Berwike, and there (with force, and that with feare of so great an armie) toke and entered the towne: but the earle of Northwell, being capteine of the castell, would in no wise deliuer it; wherfore the captains, upon good and deliberate aduise, planted a strong siege round about it. When this siege was laid, the two dukes and all the other soul-diers

diers except the lord Stanleie, sir John Clovington treasurer of the kings house, sir William a Barre, and foure thousand men that were left behind to keepe the siege before the castell departed from Berwikke toward Edenburgh; and in marching thitherward, they burnt and destroyed manie towne and bastilles. King James having small confidence in his communitie, and lesse trust in his nobilitie, kept himselfe within the castell of Edenburgh.

The duke of Gloucester entered into the towne, and at the respectall desire of the duke of Albanie saved the towne, and the inhabitants from fire, blood, and spoile, taking onelie of the merchants, such presents as they gentlie offered to him and his capteins, causing Earlier principall king at armes to make a publike proclamation at the high crosse in the market place of Edenburgh; by the which he warned and admonished king James, to keepe, observe, and performe, all such promises, compacts, covenants, and agreements, as he had concluded and sealed with the king of England, and also to make sufficient recompense unto his subjects, for the tyrannie, spoile, and crueltie which he and his people had committed and done, contrarie to the league, within the marches of his realme of England, before the first daie of August next insuing; and further without delay to restore his brother the duke of Albanie to his estate, and all his possessions, offices, and authorities, in as large maner as he occupied and enjoyed the same before. Whereupon the duke of Gloucester, lieutenant generall for the king of England, was readie at hand to destroy him, his people, and countries, with slaughter, flame, and famine.

King James would make no answer, neither by word nor writing, but kept himselfe close within the castell. But the lords of Scotland being at Haddington with a great puissance, determined first to practice with the duke of Gloucester for a peace, and after by some meanes to allure the duke of Albanie from the English amitie. And upon this motion, the second daie of August they wrote to the duke of Gloucester, requiring that the marriage betwene the prince of Scotland, and king Edwards daughter might be accomplished, according to the covenants; and further, that a peace from thenceforth might be longlie concluded betwene both the realmes. The duke of Gloucester answered againe unto these demands; that for the article of the marriage, he knew not the king his brothers determinate pleasure, either for the affirmance or deniall of the same; but nevertheless he desired full restitution of all the sums of monie pressed out in lone upon the same marriage. And as for peace, he assured them that he would agree to none, except the castell of Berwikke might be to him deliuered; or at the least wise, that he should undertake that the siege lying afore the same should not be troubled by the king of Scots, nor by any of his subjects, nor by his or their procurement or meanes.

The bishop elect of Durham sent to the duke of Gloucester.

The Scottish lords, upon this answer and demands of the duke of Gloucester, sent to him the elect of Durham, and the lord Dornleie, which executed the matter touching the repayment of the monie: for that the time of the lawfull contract of the said marriage was not yet come, and no daie appointed for the monie to be paid before the contract begun. But for further assurance either for the contract to be made, or for the payment of the monie, they promised the rebitter accordingly (as reason should require) to agree. So concordant, as touching the castell of Berwikke, they alledged that it appertained to the realme of Scotland, as the old inheritance of the same.

The duke, notwithstanding all that they could saie, would agree to no peace, except the castell of Berwikke might be deliuered to the king of England,

And so the messengers departed. The same daie the archbishop of St. Andrews, the bishop of Dunkeld, Colin earle of Argile, lord Campbell, and lord Andrieu lord of Anandale chancelor of Scotland, wrote to the duke of Albanie, a solemne and an autenticall instrument, signed and sealed with their hands and seales, concerning a generall pardon to him and his servants, upon certeine conditions to be granted; which conditions seemed to be so reasonable, that the duke of Albanie, desirous to be restored to his old estate, possessions, and native countrie, willingly accepted the same.

But before he departed from the duke of Gloucester, he promised both by word and writing of his owne hand, to do and performe all such things, as he before that time had sworn and promised to king Edward: notwithstanding any agreement now made, or after to be made with the lords of Scotland. And for performance of the effect hereof, he againe took a corporall oath, and sealed the writing before the duke of Gloucester, in the English campe at Levington besides Haddington, the third daie of August, in the yeare 1482. After he was restored, the lords of Scotland proclaimed him great lieutenant of Scotland; and in the kings name made proclamation, that all men within eight daies should be readie at Crauthaus, both to raise the siege before the castell, and for the recovering againe of the towne of Berwikke.

The duke of Albanie wrote all this preparation to the duke of Gloucester, requiring him to have no mistrust in his dealings. The duke of Gloucester wrote to him againe his mind verie roundlie, promising that he with his armie would defend the besiegers from all enemies that should attempt to trouble them; or else die in the quarrell. To be briefe, when the lords of Scotland saw that it booteth them not to assaie the raising of the siege, except they should make account to be fought withall, they determined to deliuer the castell of Berwikke to the Englishmen, so that thereupon there might be an abstinence of warre taken for a season.

And herewith they sent to the duke of Gloucester a charter indented, which was dated the four and twentieth daie of August, in the said yeare 1482, contracted betwene the duke of Gloucester lieutenant generall for the king of England, and Alexander duke of Albanie lieutenant for James king of Scots; that an especiall abstinence of warre should be kept betwixt the realmes of England and Scotland, as well by sea as by land, to begin the eighth daie of September next comming, and to endure till the fourth daie of November next following. And in the same season, the towne and castle of Berwikke to be occupied and remaine in the roall possession of such, as by the king of England's deputie should be appointed.

Whereunto the duke of Gloucester agreed, and so then was the castell of Berwikke deliuered to the lord Stanleie; and after thereto appointed; who therein put both Englishmen and artillerie, sufficient to defend it against all Scotland, for six months. The duke of Albanie also desired the prouost and bargesses of Edenburgh, to make a sufficient instrument obligatorie to king Edward, for the true satisfaction and contentation of the same monie, which he also sent by the said prouost to the duke of Gloucester at Berwikke; the verie copie whereof hereafter followeth.

The true copie of the said instrument obligatorie.

whole fellowship, merchants, burgesses, & communalitie of the same towne, to be bound and obliged by these presents, unto the most excellent, and most mightie prince Edward, by the grace of God king of England. That where it was communed and agreed betwene his excellencie on the one part, and the right high & mightie prince our soueraigne lord, James king of Scots on the other part, that mariage and matrimonie should haue bene solemnized and had betwixt a mightie and excellent prince James the first begotten sonne and heire apparant to our soueraigne lord aforesaid, & the right noble princeesse Cicilie, daughter to the said Edward k. of England; and for the said mariage to haue bene performed, certeine and diuerse great summes of monie bene paid and contented by the most excellent prince; unto our soueraigne lord aforesaid, as by certeine writings betwixt the said princes thereupon made more at large plainlie appeares.

That if it be the pleasure of the said Edward king of England, to haue the said mariage to be performed and completed, according to the said communication in writing, that then it shall be well and trulie, without fraud, deceit, or collusion obserued, kept, and accomplished on the partie of our soueraigne lord aforesaid, & the nobles spirituall and temporall of the realme of Scotland. And if it be not the pleasure of the said excellent prince Edward king of England, to haue the said mariage performed and completed; that then we Walter, prouost, burgesses, merchants, and commons of the aboue named towne of Edinburgh, or anie of vs, shall paie and content to the king of England aforesaid, all the summes of monie that was paid for the said mariage, at such like termes & daies immediatlie insuing after the refusall of the said mariage, and in such like maner & forme as the said summes were afore delivered, contented and paid; that then this obligation and bond to be void, and of no strength. Provided alwaies, that the said Edward king of England, shall giue knowledge of his pleasure and election in the premises in taking or refusing of the said mariage, or of repayment of the said sums of monie, to our said soueraigne lord, or lords of his counsell, or to vs the said prouost, merchants, or any of vs, within the realme of Scotland, being for the time betwixt this & the feast of Allhalowes next to come.

To the which paiement well and trulie to be made, we bind and oblige vs, & euerie of vs, our heires, successors, executors, and all our goods, merchandizes, & things what soeuer they be, where soeuer, or in what place, by water or by land, on this side the sea or beyond, we shall happen to be found, anie league, anie truce or safegard made or to be made, notwithstanding. In witnesse whereof to this our present writing, and letters of bond, we, the said prouost, burgesses, merchants, and communi-tie, haue set our common seale of the said towne of Edinburgh, the fourth daie of August, the yeare of our Lord God, 1482. Given in the presence of the right mightie prince Richard Duke of Gloucester, Alexander duke of Albanie, the reuerend father in God James bishop of Dunkeld, & the right noble lord Henrie earle of Northumberland, Colin earle of Argile, Thomas lord Stanleie, maister Alexander English, and others, &c.

So that you see it was contained in the said instrument or writing, that king Edward should intimate his pleasure unto the said prouost and burgesses of Edinburgh, before the feast of Allsaints next following, whether he would the mariage should take place, or that he would haue the paiement of the monie. According to which article, king Edward sent Garter his principall king of armes, and Northumberland berailo, to declare his refusall of the mariage, and the election and choise of the repayment of the monie. They came to Edinburgh eight daies before the feast of Allsaints, where (according to their commission and instructions) Garter declared the pleasure of the king his master, unto the prouost and burgesses of Edinburgh, to whom he openlie said as followeth.

The intimation of Garter king of armes to the Edinburghers.

T Garter king of armes, seruant, prouost and messenger unto the most high and mightie prince, my most dread soueraigne lord Edward, by the grace of God king of England and of France, and lord of Ireland, by vertue of certeine letters of procuracie here readie to be shewed to me, by my said soueraigne lord made and giuen, make notice and giue knowledge vnto you prouost, burgesses, merchants and communalitie of the towne of Edinburgh in Scotland, that whereas it was sometime communed and agreed betwene my said soueraigne lord on the one partie, and the right high & mightie prince James king of Scots on the other partie, that mariage and matrimonie should haue bene solemnized, and had betwene James the first begotten sonne of the said king of Scots, and ladie Cicilie, daughter to my said soueraigne lord the king of England.

And for the said mariage to haue bene performed, certeine and diuers great sums of monie bene paid and contented by my said soueraigne lord, which summes of monie, in case of refusall of the said mariage, by my said soueraigne lord to be made and declared, yet the said prouost, burgesses, merchants, and communalitie, and euerie one of you are bound and obliged by your letters, vnder your common seale of your towne of Edinburgh, to repaie vnto his highnes vnder like forme, & at such termes as they were first paid. So that the king my soueraigne lord would make notice and knowledge of his pleasure and election in taking or refusing of the said mariage, of the repayment of the said sums of monie, before before the feast of Alhalowes next to come, like as in your said letters, bearing date at Edinburgh the fourth daie of August last past, it was contained all at large.

The pleasure and election of my said soveraigne lord, for diuerse causes and considerations hummouing, is to refuse the accomplishment of the said mariage, and to haue the repayment of all such summes of monie, as by occasion of the said betruisted mariage his highnesse had paid. The said repayment to be had of you prouost, burgesses, merchants, and communalitie, and euerie of you, your heires and successours, according to your bond and obligation afore rehearsed. And therefore I giue you notice & knowledge by this writing, which I deliuer vnto you, within the terme in your said letters limited and expressed, to all intents and effects, which thereof may insue.

When Cartier had thus declared all things giuen to him in charge, the prouost and other burgesses made answer, that they now knowing the kings determinat pleasure, would (according to their bond) prepare for the repayment of the said summes; and gentle interceding Cartier conueied him to Berwikke, from whence he departed to Newcastle, to the duke of Gloucester, making relation to him of all his doings: which duke with all speed returned to Wythuton, and there abode. Shortly after Cartiers departing, the duke of Albanie, thinking to obtaine againe the high fauour of the king his brother, deliuered him out of captiuitie and prison, wherein he had a certeine space continued (not without the dukes assent, which besieged him in the castell of Edinburgh a little before) and set him at large, of whome outwardlie he receiued great thanks, when inwardlie nothing but reuenging & confusion was in the kings stomach fullie settled. So that shortly after in the kings presence he was in leopordie of his life, and all hypocrites for dread of death, constrained to take a small balinge, and to saile into France, where shortly after riding by the men of armes, which encountered at the tilt, by Lewes then duke of Orleans, after French king, he was with mischarging of a speare by fortunes peruerse countenance pittfullie slaine and brought to death, leauing after him one onelie son named John, which being banished Scotland, inhabited & married in France, and there died.

How dolorous, how sorrowfull is it to write, and much more painefull to remember the chances and infortunities that happened within two yeares in England & Scotland, betwene naturall brethren. For king Edward, set on by such as enuied the estate of the duke of Clarence, forgetting nature and brotherlie amitie, consented to the death of his said brother. James king of Scots, putting in oblivion that Alexander his brother was the onelie organ and instrument, by whome he obtained libertie & freedom, seduced and led by vile and malicious persons, which maligne at the glorie and indifferent iustice of the duke of Albanie, imagined and compassed his death, and killed him for ever. What a pernicious serpent, what a venomous toade, and what a pestiferous scorpion is that diuellish helpe, called priuate enuie? Against it no fortresse can defend, no caue can hide, no wood can shadow, no towle can escape, no beast can auoid. His poison is so strong, that neuer man in authoritie could escape from the biting of his teeth, scratching of his pawes, blasting of his breath, & filth of his taile. Notable therefore is the French epigram in this behalfe, touching enuie of this kind, which saith, that a worse thing than enuie there is not in the world, and yet hath it some goodnesse in it; for it consumeth the ries and the hart of the enuious. The words in their owne long sententious sound thus:

ὁ φθόνος ἔχει δὲ τὴν καλὴν ἐν αὐτῷ, τίμα δὲ φθόνος δὲν ὀφθαλμοῖς καὶ καρδίᾳ.

Although king Edward reioiced that his buisnesse came to so good a conclusion with the Scots, yet he was about the same time sore disquieted in his mind towards the French king, whome he now perceived to haue dallied with him, as touching the agreement of the mariage to be had betwixt the Dolphin and his daughter the ladie Elizabeth. For the lord Howard, being as then returned out of France, certified the king (of his owne knowledge) how that he being present, saw the ladie Margaret of Austrich daughter to duke Maximilian, sonne to the emperor Frederike, receiued into France with great pompe and roialtie, and at Ambois to the Dolphin contracted and espoused. King Edward highlie displeased with such double and vnjust dealing of the French king, called his nobles together, and opened to them his griefes; who promised him for redress thereof, to be readie with all their powers to make warres in France at his pleasure and appointment.

But whilest he was buis in hand to make his pursuance for warres thus against France, whether it was with melancholie and anger, which he took with the French kings doings and vn courteous usage; or were it by any superfluous surfeit to the which he was verie much giuen) he suddenly fell sicke, and was so grievously taken, that in the end he perceived his naturall strength in such wise to decaye, that there was little hope of recoverie in the cunning of his physicians, whome he perceived onlie to prolong his life for a small time. Wherefore he began to make readie for his passage into another world, not forgetting (as after shall appeare) to exhort the nobles of his realme (aboue all things) to an vnite among themselves. And having (as he took it) made an attornment betwixt the parties that were knowne to be scant friends, he commended vnto their grane wisdoms the government of his sonne the prince, and of his brother the duke of York, during the time of their tender yeares. But it shall not be amisse to adde in this place the words which he is said to haue spoken on his death-bed, which were in effect as followeth.

The words of king Edward vttered by him on his death-bed.

My welbeloued and no lesse betruisted friends, counsellors, and allies, if we mortall men would dailie and hourly with our selues reuolue, and intentiuelie in our hearts ingraue, or in our minds seriously ponder, the fraile and fading imbecillitie of our humane nature, and the vnstablenesse of the same: we should apparantly perceiue, that we being called reasonable creatures, and in that predicament compared and ioined with angels, be more worthy to be named and deemed persons vnreasonable, and rather to be associate in that name with brute beasts called vnreasonable (of whose life and death no creature speaketh) rather than in that point to be resembled to the angelicall societie and reasonable companie.

For while health in vs flourisheth, or prosperitie aboundeth, or the glosing world laugheth, which is he, so reasonable of vs all, that can saie (if he will not from the truth) that hee once in a weeke remembereth

The vanities of this woold be to vs so agreable, that when we begin to liue, we esteeme our life a thole woold; which once ouerpasse, it sheweth no better but dust dyuen awaie with a puffe of wind. I speake this to you of my selfe, and for your selues to you; for lamenting and inwardlie bewailing, that I did not performe a finallie consummate such politike deuises, & god and godlie ordinaunces, in my long life and peaceable prosperitie, which then I folke determined to haue begun, set forward, and complette to haue finished. Which now for the extream paines and tortures of my angrie maladie, and for the small terme of my naturall life, I can neither performe, neither yet liue to see either to take effect, or to sort to any god conclusion.

For God I call to record, my heart was fullie set, and my mind deliberatlie determined, so to haue adorned this realme with wholesome lawes, statutes and ordinaunces; so to haue trained and brought vp mine infants and children in vertue, learning, actitie, and policie, that, what with their soall puissance, & your friendly assistance, the proudest prince of Europe durst not once attempt to moue anye hostilitie, against them, you, or this realme. But oh Lord, all things that I of long time haue in my mind reuolued and imagined, that shalring these death goeth about to subuert, and in the moment of an houre cherlie to ouertred. Wherefore (as men saie) I now being dyuen to the verie hard wall, haue perfect confidence and sure hope in the approued fidelitie, and constant integritie, which I haue euer experimented and knowne to be rooted and planted in the hearts of your louing bodie, towards me and mine.

So that I may saie and auouch, that neuer prince bearing scepter and crowne ouer realmes and regions, hath found or proued more faithfull counselors, nor truer subiects, than I haue done of you; nor neuer potentate nor gouernour put more assistance and trust in his ballas and seruants, than I, since the adeption of the crowne, firmelie haue fired in your circumspect wisdoms and sober discretions.
And now of very force compelled, lieng in a doubtfull hope, betwene liuing and dieng, betwene remembrance and obliuion, I do require you, and instantlie moue you, that as I haue found you faithfull, obedient, and to all my requests and desires (while I was here in health conuersant with you) diligent and intentive: so after my death, my hope is with a sure anchour grounded, & mine inward concept vndoabteble resolved, that the especiall confidence and inward fidelitie, which so long hath continued betwene vs, being together liuing, shall not wholie by my death be extinct and vanished like smoke.

For what auaileth friendship in life, when trust deceiueth after death: What profiteth amitie in apparant presence, when confidence is fraudulentlie beguiled in absence: What loue groweth by coniuction of matrimonie, if the offspring after do not agree and accord: What profiteth princes to aduance and promote their subiects, if after their death, the bountifullnesse by them shewed, be of the recei-uers of the same and their sequels neither regarded nor yet remembred: The parents make the marriage for an indissoluble amitie. Princes promote som-time for fauour, sometime for desert, & sometime for pleasure: yet (if you will consider) the verie scope, to the which all gifts of promotions do finallie tend, is to haue loue, fauour, faithfull counsell, and diligent seruice, of such as be by them promoted and exalted, not onelie in their owne lines, being but breife and transitorie: but also that they and their progenie, calling to remembrance the fauor, estimation, and aduancement, which they of so liberall and munificent a prince had receiued and obtained, should with speare and shield, long and wit, hand and pen, conti-nuallie studie to defend, counsell and preserve, not onelie him during his life; but also to serue, assist, and mainteine his sequels and lineall succession, as the verie images and carnall portraictures of his stirpe, line, and stemme, naturallie descended.

In this case am I, whome you know, not without unspeakable trouble & most dangerous war to haue obtained the scepter and diademe of this realme and empire. During which reigne, I haue had either little peace, or small tranquillitie: and now when I thought my selfe sure of a quiet life, and wooldie rest, death hath blowne his terrible trumpet, calling and summoning me (as I trust) to perpetuall tranquillitie and eternall quietnesse. Therefore now, for the perfect and vnmoueable confidence that I haue euer had in you, and for the vnfeined loue that you haue euer shewed vnto me, I commend and deliuer into your gouernance, both this noble realme, and my naturall children, and your kinsmen. My children by your diligent oversight and politike prouision to be taught, informed, and instructed, not onelie in the sciences liberall, vertues morall, and god literature: but also to be practised in trickes of martiall actiuitie, and diligent exercise of prudent policie. For I haue heard clarkes saie, although I am vnlettered, that fortunate is that realme where philosophers reigne, or where kings be philosophers and louers of wisdomme.

In this tender age, you may with and turne them into euerie forme and fashon. If you bring them vp in vertue, you shall haue vertuous princes.
If you set them to learning, your gouernours shall be men of knowledge. If you teach them actiuitie, you shall haue valiant capteins. If they practise policie, you shall haue both politike and prudent rulers.
On the other side, if by your negligence they fall to vice (as youth is to all euill prone and readie) not onelie their honor, but also your honestie shall be spotted and appalled. If they be sluggish and giuen to sloth, the publike wealth of this realme must shortlie decaie. If they be vnlearned, they may by flatterie some be blinded, and by adulation often de-ceiued. If they lacke actiuitie, euerie creature (be he neuer so base of birth) shall soile and ouerthrow them like dum beasts and beastlie bassards. Therefore I desire you, and in Gods name aduise you, rather to studie to make them rich in godlie knowledge, and vertuous qualities; than to take paine to glorifie them with abundance of wooldie treasure, and mundane superfluitie.

And certeinlie, when they come to ripenesse of age, and shall peraduenture consider, that by your omission and negligent education, they haue not such graces, nor are indued with such notable qualities as they might haue bene, if you had performed the trust to you by me committed: they shall not onelie deploze and lament their vngarnished estate, and naked condition; but also it may fortune, that they shall conceiue

conceine inwardlie against you such a negligent truth, that the sequels thereof may rather turne to displeasure than thanks, and sooner to an ingratitude than to a reward. By kingdome also I leane in your gouernance, during the minoritye of my children, charging you (on your honours oths and fidelitie made and sworn to me) so indifferentlie to order and gouerne the subiects of the same, both with iustice and mercie, that the wils of malefactorz haue not too large a scope, nor the hartes of the good people by too much extremitie be neither sorrowfullie damned, nor unkindlie kept vnder. Wh I am so sleepe, that I must make an end. And now befoze you all I commend my soule to almighty God my sauour and redeemer, my bodie to the woymes of the earth, my kingdome to the prince my sonne: and to you my louing frends my heart, my trust, and my whole confidence. [And euen with that he fell on sleepe.]

Having thus spoken, and set things in good state, as might be supposed, he shortly after departed this life at Westminster the ninth of Aprill, in the yere 1483, after he had reigned two and twentie yeres, one moneth, and eight daies. His bodie was with funerall pompe conueied to Windsor, and there buried. He left behind him issue by the queene his wife two sonnes, Edward and Richard, with five daughters; Elizabeth that was after queene, married to Henrie the seauenth; Cicilie married to the vicount Welles; Biaget a nunne professed in Sion or Dertford, as sir Thomas More saith; Anne married to the lord Thomas Howard, after earle of Surrie, and duke of Norfolk; Katharine wedded to the lord William Courtenie sonne to the earle of Denonshire. Beside these he left behind him likewise a base sonne named Arthur, that was after vicount Lisle. For the description of his person & qualities I will referre you to that which sir Thomas More hath written of him in that historie, which he wrote and left unfinished of his sonne Edward the first, and of his brother king Richard the third: which we shall (God willing) hereafter make you partaker of, as we find the same recorded among his other woakes, word for word; when first we haue (according to our begun order) rehearsed such writers of our nation as liued in his daies.

As first, Nicholas Berton bozne in Suffolke a Carmelit frier in Cippeswich, prouinciall of his order through England; Henrie Barker a Carmelit frier of Doncaster, preached against the pride of prelates, and for such doctrine as he set forth, was imprisoned with his fellow Thomas Holden, and a certeine blache frier also for the like cause; Barker was forced to recant thre speciall articles, as Bale noteth out of Leland; John Harding an esquier bozne in the north parts, wrote a chronicle in English verse, and among other speciall points therein touched, he gathered all the submissions and homages had and made by the Scottis kings, euen from the daies of king Athelstan (whereby it euidentlie may appeare, how the Scottis kingdome euen in manner from the first establishing thereof here in Britaine, hath bene appertaining vnto the kings of England, and holden of them as their chiefe & superiour lords.)

William Rue a doctor of diuinitie and prebendarie of saint Pauls in London; Thomas Wilton a diuine, and deane of the said church of Pauls in London; Julian Bemis, a gentlewoman indued with excellent gifts both of bodie and mind, wrote certeine treatises of hauking and hunting, delighting greatlie hir selfe in those exercises and pastimes;

the wrote also a booke of the lawes of armes, and knowledge appertaining to heralds; John Stamberie bozne in the west parts of this realme, a Carmelit frier, and confessor to king Henrie the first, he was also maister of Eaton colledge, and after was made bishop of Bangor, and removed from thence to the see of Hereford; John Bluelie an Augustine frier, prouinciall of his order; John Forsecue a iudge and chancelor of England, wrote diuerse treatises concerning the law and politike gouernement.

Nicholas a Charterhouse monke bozne in London, of honest parents, and studied in the vniuersitie of Paris, he wrote diuerse epigrams; John Phreas bozne also in London was fellow of Balliol colledge in Orenford, and after went into Italie, where he heard Charinus that excellent philosopher read in Ferrara, he proued an excellent physician and a skillfull lawier, there was not in Italie (whilest he remained there) that passed him in eloquence & knowledge of both the tonges, Greeke and Latine; Walter Hunt a Carmelit frier, a great diuine, and for his excellencie in learning sent from the whole bodie of this realme, vnto the generall counsell holden first at Ferrara, and after at Florence by pope Eugenius the fourth, where he disputed among other with the Greeks, in defense of the order and ceremonies of the Latine church; Thomas Wighenball a monke of the order called Beimonstratensis in the abbey of Durham in Norfolk.

John Cuthorpe went into Italie, where he heard that eloquent learned man Guarinus read in Ferrara, after his comming home into England he was deane of Welles, and keeper of the papale seale; John Hambols an excellent musician, and for his notable cunning therein made doctor of musike; William Carton wrote a chronicle called Fructus temporum, and an appendix vnto Trevisa, beside diuerse other bookes and translations; John Spiluer-ton a Carmelit frier of Wyke, and prouinciall of his order through England, Ireland, and Scotland, at length (because he defended such of his order as preached against endowments of the church with temporall possessions) he was brought into trouble, committed to prison in castell S. Angelo in Rome, where he continued thre yeres, and at length was deliuered thorough certeine of the cardinals that were appointed his iudges; David Spogan a Welch man, treasurer of the church of Landaffe, wrote of the antiquities of Wales, & a description of the countrie.

John Tiptoft, a noble man bozne, a great traveler, excellentlie learned, and wrote diuerse treatises, and finally lost his head in the yere 1471, in time of the ciuill warre betwixt the houses of York and Lancaster; John Shirwood bishop of Durham; Thomas Bent an excellent philosopher; Robert Huggon bozne in Norfolk in a towne called Hardingham, wrote certeine vaine prophesies; John Sparfeld a learned physician; William Greene a Carmelit frier; Thomas Porton bozne in Wyke an alchemist; John Speare a monke of Norwich; Richard Portland bozne in Norfolk a Franciscane frier, and a doctor of diuinitie; Thomas Spilling a monke of Westminster, a doctor of diuinitie and preferred to the bishopricke of Hereford; Seogan a learned gentleman and student for a time in Oxford, of a pleasant wit, and bent to merrie deuisses, in respect whereof he was called into the court, where giuing himselfe to his naturall inclination of mirth & pleasant pastime, he played manie sporting parts, although not in such vnciuill maner as hath bene of him reported.

Thus farre the prosperous reigne of Edward the fourth, sonne and heire to Richard duke of Yorke.

The historie of king Edward the fift, and king Richard the third vnfinished, wvritten by maister Thomas More then one of the vnder shiriffes of London, about the yeare of our Lord 1513, according to a copie of his owne hand, printed among his other workes.

1483

King Edward the fourth of that name, after that he had liued fiftie & thre yerres, seuen moneths, and six daies, and thereof reigned two and twentie yeares, one moneth, & eight daies, died at Westminster the ninth daie of Aprill, the yeare of our redemption, a thousand foure hundred fourescore and thre; leauing much saire issue, that is to wit, Edward the prince, a thirtene yeares of age; Richard duke of Yorke two yeares yonger; Elizabeth, whose fortune and grace was after to be queene, wife vnto king Henrie the seventh, and mother vnto the eight; Cecillie, not so fortunate as saire; Margaret, which representing the vertue of hir, whose name she bare, professed and obserued a religious life in Werford, an house of close nunnies; Anne, that was after honozable married vnto Thomas, then lord Howard, and after earle of Surrie; and Katharine, which long time tossed in either fortune, sometime in wealth, oft in aduersitie, at the last, if this be the last (for yet she liueth) is by the benignitie of hir nephue king Henrie the eight, in verie prosperous estate, and woorthie hir birth and vertue.

The love of the people.

This noble prince decessed at his palace of Westminster, and with great funerall honoz and heauines of his people from thence conueied, was interred at Windsoz. A king of such gouernance & behauior, in time of peace (for in warre each part must needs be others enimie) that there was neuer anie prince of this land, attaining the crowne by battell, so hearti-lie beloued with the substance of the people: no; hee himselfe so speciallie in anie part of his life, as at the time of his death. Which fauour and affection, yet after his decess, by the crueltie, mischief, and trouble of the tempestuous world that folloved, highlie toward him more increased. At such time as he died, the displeasure of those that bare him grudge for king Henries sake the first, whome he deposed, was well allwaged, & in effect quenched, in that manie of them were dead in more than twentie yerres of his reigne, a great part of a long life: and manie of them in the meane season growne into his fauour, of which he was neuer strange.

Entertainment of Edward the fourth.

He was a goodlie personage, and princelie to behold, of heart courageous, politike in counsell, in ad-uersitie nothing abashed, in prosperitie rather ioyfull than proud, in peace iust and mercifull, in warre sharp and fierce, in the field bold and hardie, and natheles no further (than wisdome would) aduenturous, whose warres who so well considered, he shall no lesse commend his wisdom where he voided, than his manhood where he vanquished. He was of visage louelie, of bodie mightie, strong, and cleane made: howbeit, in his latter daies with ouer liberall diet somewhat corpulent and bozeli, and nathelesse not vncamelie. He was of youth greatlie giuen to flesh-lie wantonnesse: from which health of bodie, in great prosperitie and fortune, without a speciall grace hard-lie restraineth, the poet implieng no lesse and saieing:

Mens erit apta capi tunc cum lassissima rerum, Et seges in pingui luxuriabit humo.

This fault not greatlie greued the people: for neither could anie one mans pleasure stretch and extend to the displeasure of verie manie, and was without violence, and ouer that in his latter daies lesseed, and well left. In which time of his latter daies this realme was in quiet and prosperous estate, no feare of outward enimies, no warre in hand, no; none toward, but such as no man looked for. The people toward the prince, not in a constrained feare, but in a willing and louing obedience: among themselves the commons in good peace. The lords, whome hee knew at variance, himselfe in his death had appeased: he had left all gathering of monie (which is the onelie thing that withdroweth the hearts of English men from the prince) no; anie thing intended he to take in hand, by which he should be diuerted therto: for his tribute out of France he had before obteneid; and the yeare foregoing his death, he had obteneid Berwik.

And albeit that all the time of his reigne he was with his people, so benigne, courteous, and so familiar, that no part of his vertues was more esteemed: yet the condition in the end of his daies (in which manie princes by a long continued souereigntie decline into a proud port from debonaire behauior of their beginning) marnellouslie in him grew and increased: so farre forth, that in summer (the last that euer hee saw) his highnes being at Windsoz in hunting, sent for the mayo: & aldermen of London to him for none other errand, but to haue them hunt & be merrie with him, where he made them not so statelie, but so frendlie and familiar cheere, and sent benison from thence so frelie into the citie, that no one thing in manie daies before gat him either more hearts, or more heartie fauour amongst the common people; which oftentimes more esteeme and take for greater kindnesse a little courtesie, than a great benefit.

See before
pag. 705.

So decessed (as I haue said) this noble king, in that time in which his life was most desired. Whose loue of his people, and their entier affection towards him,

him, had bene to his noble chyliden (haueing in themselves also as manie gifts of nature, as manie princelie vertues, as much goodlie towardnesse as their age could receiue) a maruellous fortresse and sure armoz, if diuision and dissention of their frends had not binarmed them, and left them destitute, and the erectable desire of soveraigntie prouoked him to their destruction: which if either kind of kindnesse had holden place, most needs haue bene their chiefe defense. For Richard the duke of Gloucester, by nature their vncle, by office their protector, to their father beholden, to themselves by oth and allegiance bounden, all the bands broken that bind man and man together, without anie respect of God or the world, vnaturallie contriued to betraie them, not onelie their dignitie, but also their liues.

But forsomuch as this dukes demeanour ministereth in effect all the whole matter thereof this booke shall intreat, it is therefore convenient somewhat to shew you per vce further go, what manner of man this was, that could find in his hart such mischief to conceiue. Richard duke of Yorke, a noble man and a mightie, began not by warre, but by law to chalenge the crowne, putting his claime into the parliament, where his cause was either for right or fauor: so farre forth aduanced, that king Henrie his bloud (albeit he had a goodlie prince) vtterlie reieted, the crowne was by authoritie of parliament intailed vnto the duke of Yorke and his issue male in remainder, immediately after the death of king Henrie. But the duke not induring so long to tarrie, but intending vnder pretext of dissention and debate arising in the realme, to preuent his time, and to take vpon him the rule in king Henrie his life, was with manie nobles of the realme at Wakefield slaine, leauing thre sonnes, Edward, George, and Richard.

All thre as they were great states of birth, so were they great and statelie of stomack, greedie and ambitious of authoritie, and impatient of partners. Edward reneging his fathers death, depriued king Henrie, and attained the crowne. George duke of Clarence was a goodlie noble prince, and at all times fortunate, if either his owne ambition had not set him against his brother, or the enuie of his enemies his brother against him. For were it by the queene and lordes of hir bloud, which highlie maligned the kings kinred (as women commonlie not of malice, but of nature hate them whome their husbands loue) or were it a proud appetite of the duke himselfe, intending to be king; at the least worse heinous treason was there laid to his charge: and finally, were hee faultie, were he faultlesse, attainted was he by parliament, and iudged to the death, and thereupon hastily drowned in a butt of malinsie. Whose death king Edward (albeit he commanded it) when he wist it was done, pitifully bewailed, and sorrowfullie repented.

Richard the third sonne, of whome we now intreat, was in wit and courage equall with either of them, in bodie and prowesse farre vnder them both, litle of stature, ill featured of limmes, crooke backed, his left shoulder much higher than his right, hard fauoured of visage, and such as is in states called warlike, in other men otherwise; he was malicious, wrathfull, enuious, and from afore his birth ever stoward. It is for truth reported, that the duchesse his mother had so much adw in hir trauell, that he could not be deliuered of him vnent; and that he came into the world with the feet forward, as men be bozne outward, and (as the same runneth also) not vnnoted, whether men of hatred report about the truth, or else that nature changed hir course in his beginning, which in the course of his life manie things vnnaturallie committed, so that the full confluence of these qualities, with the defects of fauour and amiable proportion, gaue proue to this rule of physiognomie;

Distortum vultum sequitur distorto morum.

None euill capteine was he in the warre, as to which his disposition was more meetly than for peace. Sundrie victories had he, & sometimes ouerthrowes; but neuer on default as for his owne person, either of hardnesse or politike order. Fre was he called of dispense, and somewhat about his power liberrall: with large gifts he gat him vnstedfast friendship, for which he was faine to pill and spoile in other places, and got him stedfast hatred. He was close and secret, a deepe dissembler, lowlie of countenance, arrogant of heart, outwardlie compantable where he inwardlie hated, not letting to kille whome he thought to kill: despitious and cruell, not for euill will alway, but offer for ambition, and either for the lucre or increase of his estate.

Friend and so was much what indifferent, where his aduantage grew, he spared no mans death whose life withstode his purpose. He lue with his owne hands king Henrie the first, being prisoner in the Tower, as men constantlie said, and that without commandement or knowledge of the king, which would vndoubtedlie (if he had intended that king) haue appointed that butcherlie office to some other, than his owne bozne brother. Some wise men also wene, that his dist couertlie conueied, lacked not in helping forth his brother of Clarence to his death: which he resisted openlie, howbeit somewhat (as men deemed) more faintlie than he that were hartlie minded to his wealth.

And they that thus deeme, thinke that he long time in kings Edwards life forethought to be king; in case that the king his brother (whose life he looked that euill diet should shorten) should happen to deceasse (as in deed he did) while his chyliden were yong. And they deeme, that for this intent he was glad of his brothers death the duke of Clarence, whose life most needs haue hindered him so intending, whether the same duke of Clarence had kept him true to his nephew the yong king, or enterprised to be king himselfe. But of all this point is there no certentie, and who so diuinely vpon coniectures, maie as well shot to farre as to short.

Howbeit this haue I by credible information learned, that the selfe night, in which king Edward died, one Gillesbroke, long yer morning, came in great hast to the house of one Pottier dwelling in Redcrosse-strete without Creplegate: and when he was with hastie rapping quickelie letten in, he shewed vnto Pottier, that king Edward was departed. By my truth man quoth Pottier, then will my maister the duke of Gloucester be king. What cause he had so to thinke, hard it is to saie; whether he being toward him, anie thing knew that he such thing purposed, or otherwise had anie incheling thereof: for he was not likelie to speake it of nought.

But now to retorne to the course of this history. Where it that the duke of Gloucester had of old foreminded this conclusion, or was now at erst thereunto moued, and put in hope by the occasion of the tender age of the yong princes, his nephues (as oportunitie & likelihood of speed putteth a man in courage of that he neuer intended) certeine it is that he contriued their destruction, with the usurpation of the regall dignitie vpon himselfe. And forsomuch as he well wist and holpe to mainteine a long continued grudge and heart-burning betwene the queens kinred and the kings bloud, either partie enuenging others authoritie, he now thought that their diuision should be (as it was in deed) a furtherlie beginning to the pursuit of his intent.

May he was resolved, that the same was a sure ground

ground for the foundation of all his building, if he might first (vnder the pretext of reuenging of old displeasure) abate the anger and ignorance of the one partie to the destruction of the other; and then win to his purpose as manie as he could, and those that could not be wonne, might be lost per they looked therefore. For of one thing was he certeine, that if his intent were perceiued, he should soon haue made peace betwene both the parties with his owne blood. King Edward in his life, albeit that this dissention betwene his friends somewhat irked him: yet in his good health he somewhat the lesse regarded it: because he thought whatsoeuer businesse should fall betwene them, himselfe should alwaie be able to rule both the parties.

But in his last sickenesse, when he perceiued his naturall strength so foze infiebled, that he despaired all recouerie, then he, considering the youth of his children, albeit he nothing lesse mistrusted than that that hapned; yet well foreseeing that manie harmes might grow by their debate, while the youth of his children should lacke discretion of themselves, & good counsell of their friends, of which either partie should counsell for their owne commoditie, & rather by pleasant aduise to win themselves fauor, than by profitable aduertisement to doo the children good, he called some of them before him that were at variance, and in especiall the lord marquesse Dorset the quenees sone by his first husband.

So did he also William the lord Hastings a noble man, then lord chamberleine, against whome the quene speciallie grudged, for the great fauour the king bare him: and also for that she thought him so cretelle familiar with the king in wanton companie. His kinned also bare him foze, as well for that the king had made him capteine of Calis, which office the lord Rivers, brother to the quene, claimed of the kings former promise, as for diuerse other great gifts which he receiued, that they looked for. When these lords, with diuerse other of both the parties, were come in presence, the king sitting by himselfe, and vnder set with pillowes, as it is reported, on this wise said vnto them.

The oration of the king on his death-bed.

My lords, my dære kinsmen and allies, in what plight I lie you see, and I feele. By which the lesse while I looke to liue with you, the more depelie am I moued to care in what case I leaue you, for such as I leaue you, such be my children like to find you. Which if they should (as God forbid) find you at variance, might hap to fall themselves at warre, yet their discretion would serue to set you at peace. Ye see their youth, of which I reckon the onelie suertie to rest in your concord. For it sufficeth not that all you loue them, if ech of you hate other: if they were men, your faithfulnessse happilie woulde suffice. But childhood must be maintained by mens authority, and slipper youth vnderpropped with elder counsell, which neither they can haue but ye giue it, nor ye giue it if ye graue not.

For where ech labourer to breake that the other maketh, and for hatred of ech of others person impugnech ech others counsell, there must it needs be long yet anie good conclusion go forward. And also while either partie labourer to be chere, flatterie shall haue more place than plaine and faithfull aduise: of which must needs insue the euill bringing by of the prince, whose mind in tender youth infect, shall redilie fall to mischæse and riot, and draw downe with his noble relme to ruine. But if grace turne him to wisedome: which if God send, then they that by euill meanes before pleased him best, shall after fall furthest out of fauour: so that euer at length euill drifts shall draw to nought, and good plaine waies prosper.

Great variance hath there long bene betwene you, not alwaie for great causes. Sometimes a thing right well intended, our misconstruction turneth vnto woe; or a small displeasure done vs, either our owne affection or euill tongs aggraueth. But this wot I well, ye neuer had so great cause of hatred, as ye haue of loue. That we be all men, that we be christian men, this shall I leaue for preachers to tell you; and yet I wot naue whether anie preachers words ought more to moue you, than his that is by & by going to the place that they all preach of.

But this shall I desire you to remember, that the one part of you is of my blood, the other of mine allies; and ech of you with other either of kinned or affinitie; which spirituall kinned of affinitie, if the sacraments of Christs church beate that weight with vs that would God they did, should no lesse moue vs to charitie, than the respect of fleshlie consanguinitie. Our Lord forbid, that you loue together the woe, for the selfe cause that you ought to loue the better. And yet that happeneth, and no where find we so deadlie debate, as among them, which by nature and law most ought to agree together. Such a pestilent serpent is ambition and desire of haine glorie and soveraigntie, which among states where she once entereth, creepeth forth so farre, till with diuision and variance she turneth all to mischæse: first longing to be next vnto the best, after ward equall with the best, & at last chæse and aboue the best.

Of which immoderat appetite of worship, and thereby of debate and dissention, what losse, what sorow, what trouble hath within these few yeares growne in this realme, I prae God as well forget, as we well remember. Which things if I could as well haue foreseen, as I haue with my more paine than pleasure proued, by Gods blessed ladie (that was euer his oth) I would neuer haue wonne the courtellie of mens knees, with the losse of so manie heads. But sithens things passed can not be gaine called, much ought we the more beware, by what occasion we haue taken so great hurt afoze, that we eftsones fall not in that occasion againe.

Now be those greifs passed, and all is (God be thanked) quiet, and likelie right well to prosper in wealthfull peace vnder your cousing my children, if God send them life and you loue. Of which two things, the lesse losse were they, by whom though God did his pleasure, yet should the realme alwaie find kings, and peradventure as good kings.

But if you among your selues in a childes reigne fall at debate, manie a good man shall perishe, and happilie he too, and ye too, yer this land find peace againe. Wherefore in these last wordes that euer I looke to speake with you, I exhort you and require you all, for the loue that you haue euer borne to me: for the loue that I haue euer borne vnto you: for the loue that our Lord beareth to vs all: from this time forward (all griefs forgotten) ech of you loue other. Which I verelie trust you will, if ye anie thing earthlie regard, either God or your king, affinitie or kindred, this realme, your owne countrie, or your owne liuertie. And therewithall the king no longer induring to sit by, laid him downe on his right side, his face towards them: and none was there present that could refraine from weeping.

ment.

But the lords recomforting him with as good words as they could, and answering for the time as they thought to stand with his pleasure, there in his presence, as by their wordes appeared, ech forgave other, and ioined their hands together, when (as it after appeared by their deeds) their hearts were farre asunder. As some as the king was departed, the noble prince his sonne drew toward London, which at the time of his decesse kept his household at Ludlow in Wales, which countrie being farre off from the law and recourse to iustice, was begun to be farre out of good rule, and warden wild robbers and reauers, wal-king at libertie uncorrected. And for this occasion the prince was in the life of his father sent thither, to the end that the authoritie of his presence should re- fraine euill disposed persons from the boldnesse of their former outrages.

Lord Rivers.

As to the gouernance and ordering of this yong prince at his sending thither, was there appointed sir Anthoine Woodville lord Rivers, and brother vnto the queene, a right honourable man, as valiant of hand as politike in counsell. Adioined were there vnto him other of the same partie, and in effect euerie one as he was next of kin vnto the queene, so was he planted next about the prince. That day by the queene not vniuerselie denised, whereby his blood might of youth be rooted into the princes fauour, the duke of Gloucester turned vnto their destruction; and vpon that ground set the foundation of all his unhappie building. For whome soeuer he perceived ether at variance with them, or bearing himselfe their fauour, he brake vnto them some by mouth, & some by writing.

The duke of Gloucesters
solicitations.

For he sent secret messengers saying, that it nei- ther was reason, nor in anie wise to be suffered, that the yong king their maister and kinsman, should be in the hands and custodie of his mothers kindred, se- questred in maner from their companie and atten- dance, of which euerie one ought him as faithfull ser- vice as they, and manie of them farre more honou- rable part of kin than his mothers side. Whose blood (quoth he) sauing the kings pleasure, was full vi- meetelie to be matched with his: which now to be as who say removed from the king, and the lesse noble to be left about him, is (quoth he) neither honourable to his maiestie nor to vs, and also to his grace no lier- tie, to haue the mightiest of his friends from him; and vnto vs no little ieopardie, to suffer our well proued euill willers to grow in ouer-great authoritie with the prince in youth; namely, which is light of beleefe and some perswaded.

For remember (I trow) king Edward himselfe, al- beit he was a man of age & discretion, yet was he in manie things ruled by the bend, more than stood ei- ther with his honoz, or our profit, or with the comod- itie of any man else, except onlie the immoderate ad- uancement of themselves. Which, whether they for- thirshed after their owne weale, or our too, it were hard (I weene) to gesse. And if some folks friendship had not holden better place with the king, than anie respect of kindred, they might peradventure easilie haue betrayed and brought to confusion some of vs yer this. Why not as easilie as they haue done some other alreadie, as nere of his roiall blood as we? But our Lord hath wrought his will, and thanks be to his grace that perill is past. Whobeyt as great is growling, if we suffer this yong king in our enemies hand, which without his witting might abuse the name of his commandement, to anie of our wond- ring, which thing God defend and good prouision forbid.

Of which good prouision none of vs hath anie thing the lesse need, for the late made attonement, in which the kings pleasure had more place than the parties willes. For none of vs (I beleue) is so vniuersal, ouer- some to trust a new freend made of an old fo; or to thinke that an hourlie kindnes, suddenlie contracted in one houre, continued yet scant a fortnight, should be deeper settled in their stomachs, than a long ac- customed malice manie yeares rooted. With these wordes and writings, and such other, the duke of Glo- cester some set on fire them that were of themselves easie to kindle, & in speciallie twaine, Edward duke of Buckingham, and William lord Hastings then chamberleine, both men of honour & of great power; the one by long succession from his ancestrie, the o- ther by his office and the kings fauour. These two, I content in not bearing ech to other so much loue, as hatred both vnto the queenes part: in this point accorded to- gether with the duke of Gloucester, that they would vi- terlie remoue from the kings companie all his mo- thers friends, vnder the name of their enemies.

Vpon this concluded the duke of Gloucester, vnderstanding that the lords, which at that time were about the king, intended to bring him by to his cor- nation accompanied with such power of their friends, that it should be hard for him to bring his purpose to passe, without the gathering and great assemblie of people and in maner of open warre, whereof the end (he wist) was doubtfull, and in which the king being on their side, his part should haue the face and name of a rebellion: he secretlie therefore by diuers means caused the queene to be perswaded and brought in the mind, that it neither were need, and also should be ieopardous, the king to come by strong.

For whereas now euerie lord loued other, and none other thing studied vpon, but about the corona- tion and honoz of the king: if the lords of his kindred should assemblie in the kings name much people, they should giue the lords, betwixt whom and them had bene sometime debate, to feare and suspect, least they should gather this people, not for the kings safeguard, whome no man impugned, but for their destruction, hauing more regard to their old variance, than their new attonement. For which cause they should assem- ble on the other partie much people againe for their defense, whose power the wist well far stretched: and thus should all the realme fall on a roze. And of all the hurt that thereof should insue, which was likelie not not to be little, and the most harme there like to fall where the least would, all the world would put hir and hir kinde in the tought, and saie that they had vn-willie and vntriste also broken the amitie & peace, that the king hir husband so prudentlie made, betwene his kin and hers in his death bed, and which the other partie faithfullie obserued.

The queene, being in this wise perswaded, such word sent vnto hir sonne, and vnto hir brother being about the king, and ouer that the duke of Gloucester himselfe: and other lords the chiefe of his bend, wrote vnto the king so reuerentlie, and to the queenes frends here so louinglie, that they nothing earthlie mistrusting, brought the king vp in great haile, not in good speed, with a sober companie. Now was the king in his waie to London gone from Northampton, when these dukes of Gloucester and Buckingham came thither, where remained behind the lord Rivers the kings vnkle, intending on the morrow to follow the king, and to be with him at Stonie Stratford (certeine) miles thence earlie per he departed. So was there made that night much frendlie chere betwene these dukes & the lord Rivers a great while. But incontinent, after that they were openlie with great courtesie departed, and the lord Rivers lodged, the dukes secretlie with a few of their most priue frends set them downe in counsell, wherein they spent a great part of the night.

And at their rising in the dawning of the daie, they sent about priuie to their seruants in their houses lodgings about, giuing them commandement to make themselves shortlie readie, for their lords were to haste backward. Upon which messages, manie of their folke were attendant, when manie of the lord Rivers seruants were vnreadie. Now had these dukes taken also into their custodie the keyes of the citie, that none should passe forth without their licence. And ouer this, in the high waie toward Stonie Stratford, where the king lay, they had besworne certeine of their folke, that should send backe againe, and compell to returne, anie man that were gotten out of Northampton, toward Stonie Stratford, till they should giue other licence. For as much as the dukes themselves intended for the shew of their diligence, to be the first that should that daie attend vpon the kings highnesse out of that towne, thus bare they folke in hand.

But when the lord Rivers vnderstood the gates closed, and the waies on euerie side beset, neither his seruants nor himselfe suffered to gone out, perceiving well so great a thing without his knowledge not begun for naught, comparing this manner present with this last nights chere, in so few houres so great a change, maruellouslie misliked. Notwithstanding he could not get awaie, and kepe himselfe close, he would not, least he should seeme to hide himselfe for some secret feare of his owne fault, whereof he saw no such cause in himselfe; he determined vpon the suertie of his owne conscience, to go boldlie to them, and inquire what this matter might meane. Whom as soon as they saw, they began to quarrell with him and saie, that he intended to set distance betwene the king and them, and to bring them to confusion, but it should not lie in his power.

And when he began (as he was a verie well spoken man) in goodlie wise to excuse himselfe, they tarried not the end of his answer, but shortlie took him, and put him in ward, and that done, forthwith went to horsebacke, and took the waie to Stonie Stratford, where they found the king with his companie, ready to leape on horsebacke, and depart forward to leaue that lodging for them, because it was too streight for both companies. And as soon as they came in his presence, they light adoune with all their companie about them. To whome the duke of Buckingham said: So afoze gentlemen, & yemen keepe your romes. And thus in a goodlie arae, they came to the king, and on their knees in verie humble wise saluted his grace, which receiued them in verie iolous and amiable manner, nothing earthlie knowing nor mistrusting as yet.

But euen by and by in his presence they pik'd a quarrell to the lord Richard Greie, the kings other brother by his mother, saleng, that he with the lord marquesse his brother, & the lord Rivers his vnkle, had compassed to rule the king and the realme, and to set variance among the states, and to subdue and destroe the noble blood of the Realme. Toward the accomplishing wherof they said that the lord marquesse had entered into the Tower of London, & thence taken out the kings treasure, and sent men to the sea. All which things these dukes with well were done for good purposes and necessarie, by the whole counsell at London, sauing that somewhat they must saie.

Vnto which words the king answered: What my brother marquesse hath done I cannot saie, but in good faith I dare well answer for mine vnkle Rivers and my brother here, that they be innocent of anie such matter. Yea my liege (quoth the duke of Buckingham) they haue kept their dealing in these matters farre fro the knowledge of your good grace. And forthwith they arrested the lord Richard and sir Thomas Vaughan knight, in the kings presence; and brought the king and all backe vnto Northampton, where they took againe further counsell. And there they sent awaie from the king, whom it pleased them, and set new seruants about him, such as liked better them than him. At which dealing he wept, and was nothing content; but it voked not.

And at dinner, the duke of Gloucester sent a dish from his owne table vnto the lord Rivers, praising him to be of good chere: all should be well inough. And he thanked the duke, and praised the messenger to beare it to his nephew the lord Richard, with the same message for his comfort, who he thought had more need of comfort, as one to whome such aduersitie was strange. But himselfe had bene all his daies in the therewith, & therefore could beare it the better. But for all this comfortable courtesie of the duke of Gloucester, he sent the lord Rivers, and the lord Richard, with sir Thomas Vaughan into the north countrie, into diuerse places to prison, and afterward all to Pomfret, where they were in conclusion beheaded.

In this wise the duke of Gloucester took vpon himselfe the order and gouernance of the young king, whome with much honor and humble reuerence he conueied vnto the citie. But anon, the tidings of this matter came hastilie to the queene a little before the midnight following, and that in the sozest wise, that the king hir son was taken, his brother, hir sonne, & his other frends arrested, and sent no man with thither, to be done with God wot what. With which tidings the queene in great sight & heavinesse, bewailing hir childe reigne, his frends mischance, and his owne infortune, damming the time that euer she dissuaded the gathering of power about the king, gat hir selfe in all the hast possible with hir younger sonne and his daughters out of the palace of Westminster, in which she then laie, into the sanctuarie, lodging hir selfe and his companie there in the abbats place.

Now came there one in likewise not long after midnight from the lord chamberleine, to doctor Rotherham the archbishop of Yorke, then chancellor of England, to his place not farre from Westminster. And for that he shewed his seruants that he had tidings of so great importance, that his master gaue him in charge, not to forbear his rest, they letted not to wake him, nor he to admit this messenger in, to his bed side. Of whom he heard that these dukes were gone backe with the kings grace from Stonie Stratford vnto Northampton. Notwithstanding sir (quoth he) my lord sendeth your lordship word, that there is no feare: for he assureth you that all shall be well. I assure him (quoth the archbishop) be it as well as it will, it will neuer be so well as we haue seene it.

And there vpon, by and by after the messenger departed, he caused in all the hall all his seruants to be called by, and so with his owne household about him, and euery man weaponed, he toke the great seals with him, and came yet before daie vnto the queene. About whom he found much heauinesse, rumble, haile and businesse, cartage and conueiance of hir stuffe in to sanctuarie, chests, coffers, packs, parcels, trussed all on mens backs, no man vnoccupied, some lading, some going, some discharging, some coming for more, some breaking downe the walles to bring in the next waile, and some yet drew to them that holpe to carrie a wrong waile: such made their lucre of others losse, praiising a botie aboue beantie, to whome the poets verse may be well applied, to wit:

The desolate
state of the queene.

The queene hir selfe late alone alote on the rushes all desolate and dismaide, whome the archbishop comforted in best manner he could, shewing hir that he trusted the matter was nothing so soze as she toke it for, and that he was put in good hope and out of feare by the message sent him from the lord chamberleine. Ah two worth him (quoth she) for he is one of them that laboureth to deströie me and my bloud. Spadame (quoth he) be ye of god chere, for I assure you, if they crowne anie other king than your sonne, whome they now haue with them, we shall on the morowe crowne his brother, whome you haue here with you. And here is the great seale, which in likewise as that noble prince your husband deliuered it vnto me; so here I deliuer it vnto you, to the vse and behoufe of your sonne: and therewith he betoke hir the great seale, and departed home againe, yet in the dawning of the daie.

By which time, he might in his chamber window see all the Thames full of boates of the duke of Glocesters seruants, watching that no man should go to sanctuarie, nor none could passe vnsearched. When was there great commotion and murmur, as well in other places about, as speciallie in the citie, the people diuerlie diuining vpon this dealing. And some lords, knights, and gentlemen, either for fauour of the queene, or for feare of themselves, assembled in sundrie companies, and went stockmele in harnesse: and many also, for that they reckoned this demeanour attempted, not so speciallie against the other lords, as against the king himselfe in the disturbance of his coronation. But then by and by the lords assembled together at [a certaine place.]

Toward which meeting, the archbishop of Poike fearing that it would be ascribed (as it was indeed) to his ouermuch lightnesse, that he so suddenlie had yielded by the great seale to the queene, to whome the custodie thereof nothing pertained, without especiall commandement of the king, secretlie sent for the seale againe, and brought it with him after the conuenable manner. And at this meeting the lord Hastings (whose trust toward the king no man doubted, nor needed to doubt) perswaded the lords to beleue, that the duke of Gloucester was sure and faithfull to his prince, and that the lord Riuer, and lord Richard with the other knights, were for matters attempted by them against the duke of Gloucester and Buckingham, put vnder arrest for their surtie, not for the kings leoparchie: and that they were also in safeguard, and there no longer should remaine, than till the matter were, not by the dukes onelie, but also by all the other lordes of the kings counsell indifferently examined, & by others discretions ordered, and either iudged or appealed.

But one thing he aduised them beware, that they iudged not the matter too farre forth, yet they knew the truth, nor hurrying their private grudges into the common hurt, irritating and prouoking men vnto anger, and disturbing the kings coronation, towards which the dukes were coming by, that they might peraduenture bring the matter so farre out of ioint, that it should neuer be brought in frame againe. Which strife if it should hap as it were likely to come to a field, though both parties were in all other things equal, yet should the authoritie be on that side where the king is himselfe. With these perswasions of the lord Hastings, whereof part himselfe beleued, of part he wist the contrarie, these commotions were somewhat appeased. But speciallie by that, that the dukes of Gloucester and Buckingham were so nere and came so shortly on with the king, in none other manner, with none other voice or semblance than to his coronation, causing the same to be blown about, that these lords and knights which were taken, had contriued the destruction of the dukes of Gloucester and Buckingham, and of other the noble blood of the realme, to the end that themselves would alone demean and gouerne the king at their pleasure.

And for the colourable pöse thereof, such of the dukes seruants as rode with the carts of their stuffe that were taken (among which stuffe, no maruell though some were harnesse, which at the breaking by of that household must needs either be brought alwaie or cast alwaie) they shewed vnto the people all the waies as they went; & so here be the barrels of harnesse that these traitors had priuillie conueid in their carriage to deströie the noble lords withall. This deuillish abett that it made the matter to wise men more bulkeles, well perceiving that the intendours of such a purpose would rather haue had their harnesse on their backs, than to haue bound them vp in barrels, yet much part of the common people were therewith verie well satisfied, and said it were almesse to hang them.

When the king approached nere to the citie, Edmund Shau goldsmith, then maior, with William White, and John Spathe the shiriffes, and all the other aldermen in scarlet, with foue hundred boile of the citizens, in violet, receiued him reuerentlie at Harnele; and riding from thence accompanied him in to the citie, which he entered the fourth daie of Maie, the first and last yeare of his reigne. But the duke of Gloucester bare him in open sight so reuerentlie to the prince, with all semblance of lowlinesse, that from the great obloquie in which he was so late before, he was suddenlie fallen in so great trust, that at the counsell next assembled he was made the onelie man, chosen and thought most meet to be protector of the king and his realme, so that (were it desirous or were it folle) the lambe was betaken to the wolfe to keepe.

At which counsell also, the archbishop of Poike chancelor of England, which had deliuered by the great seale to the queene, was thereof greatlie repproued, and the seale taken from him, and deliuered to doctor Russell bishop of Lincolne, a wise man and a good, and of much experience, and one of the best learned men vndoubtedlie that England had in his time. Diuerse lords and knights were appointed by the diuerse comes. The lord chamberleine and some other kept still their offices that they had before. Now all were it so that the protector so soze thirsted for the finishing of that he had begun, that thought euery daie a yeare till it were achieved; yet durst he no further her attempt, as long as he had but halfe his preie in his hand.

And why? Well did he wiet, that if he deposed the one brother, all the realme would fall to the other, if he either remained in sanctuarie, or should happilie be thortlie conueied to his fathers libertie. Wherefore incontinent at the next meeting of the lords at the counsell, he proposed to them, that it was a heinous deed of the quene, & proceeding of great malice to- ward the kings counsellors, that she should keepe in sanctuarie the kings brother from him, whose speci- 10 all pleasure & comfort were to haue his brother with him. And that by hir done to none other intent, but to bring all the lords in obloquie and murmur of the people.

As though they were not to be trusted with the kings brother, that by the assent of the nobles of the land, were appointed as the kings nearest friends, to the tuition of his owne roiall person. The prosperitie thereof standeth (quoth he) not all in keeping from e- 20 nimies, or ill vi and, but partlie also in recreation, and moderate pleasure: which he cannot (in this tender youth) take in the companie of ancient persons, but in the familiar conuersation of those that be neither farre vnder, nor farre aboue his age: and neuerthe- lesse of estate conuenient to accompanie his noble maiestie. Wherefore, with whom rather, than with his owne brother?

And if anie man thinke this consideration light (which I thinke none thinks that loues the king) let 30 him consider, that sometime without small things, greater cannot stand. And verelie, it redoundeth greatlie to the dishonour both of the kings highnesse, and of all vs that beue about his grace, to haue it run in euerie mans mouth, not in this realme onlie, but also in other lands (as euill words walke far) that the kings brother should be faine to keepe sanc- tuarie. For euerie man will weene, that no man will so do for naught. And such euill opinion once fastned in mens harts, hard it is to loose out, and may grow 40 to more graue than anie man can here diuine.

Wherefore me thinketh it were not impossible to send vnto the quene, for the redress of this matter, some honorable trustie man, such as both tempereth the kings weale and the honour of his counsell, and is also in fauour and credence with hir. For all which con- siderations, none seemeth more meetlie, than our reuerend father here present, my lord cardinal, who may in this matter do most good of anie man, if it please him to take the paine; which I doubt not of his goodnesse he will not refuse for the kings sake and ours, and welch of the young duke himselfe, the kings most honorable brother, and (after my soueraigne lord himselfe) my most deere neyphew, considered that thereby shall be ceased the slanderous rumour and ob- loquie now going, and the harts anoided that thereof might influe, and much rest and quiet grow to all the realme.

And if the be percase so obstinate, and so precise lie set vpon his owne will, that neither his wiife and 60 faithful aduertisement can not moue hir, nor anie mans reason content hir; then shall we by mine ad- uise, by the kings authoritie fetch him out of that pri- son, and bring him to his noble presence, in whose con- tinuall companie he shall be so well cherished and so honorable intreated, that all the world shall to our honour and hir reproch perceiue, that it was onelie malice, frowardnesse, or follie, that caused hir to keepe him there. This is my purpose and mind in this matter for this time, except anie of your lordships a- nie thing perceiue to the contrarie; for neuer shall I (by Gods grace) so loed my selfe to mine owne will, but that I shall be readie to change it vpon your bet- ter aduises.

When the protector had said, all the counsell affir- med, that the motion was good and reasonable; and to the king and the duke his brother, honorable; and a thing that should cease great murmur in the realme, if the mother might be by good means induced to de- liuer him. Which thing the archbishop of Pothe, whome they all agreed also to be thereto most conue- nient, took vpon him to moue hir, and therein to do his uttermost deuoir. Whowbeit, if she could be in no wise intreated with hir good will to deliuer him, then thought he, and such other as were of the spiritu- alitie present, that it were not in anie wise to be at- tempted to take him out against hir will.

For it should be a thing that would turne to the great grudge of all men, and high displeasure of God, if the priuilege of that holie place should now be broken, which had so manie yeares be kept, which both kings and popes so good had granted, so manie had confirmed, and which holie ground was more 20 than five hundred yeares ago (by saint Peter in his owne person in spirit accompanied with great mul- titudes of angels by night) so speciallie halowed, & dedicated to God (for the prouise wherof, they haue yet in the abbete saint Peters cope to shew) that from that time hithertoward, was there neuer so vnbekont a king that durst that sacred place violate, or so holie a bishop that durst it presume to consecrate.

And therefore (quoth the archbishop of Pothe) God forbid that anie man should for anie thing earthlie, enterprise to breake the immunitie & libertie of the sacred sanctuarie, that hath bene the safeguard of so manie a god mans life. And I trust (quoth he) with Gods grace, we shall not need it. But for anie maner need, I would not we should do it. I trust that the 30 shall be with reason contented, and all things in god maner obtained. And if it happen that I bring it not so to passe, yet shall I toward it so farre forth do my best, that ye shall all well perceiue, that no lacke of my deuoir, but the mothers deead and womanish 40 feare shall be the let.

Womanish feare, naie womanish frowardnes (quoth the duke of Buckingham.) For I dare take it vpon my soule, she well knoweth she needeth no such thing to feare, either for hir son or for hir selfe. For as for hir, here is no man that will be at war with wo- men. Would God some of the men of hir kin were women too, & then should all be some in rest. Whowbeit there is none of hir kin the lesse loued, for that they be hir kin, but for their owne euill deserting. And na- thelesse, if we loued neither hir nor hir kin, yet were there no cause to thinke that wee should hate the kings noble brother, to whose grace we our selues be of kin. Whose honor, if the as much desired as our dishonor, and as much regard took to his wealth as to hir owne will, she would be as loth to suffer him to be absent from the king, as anie of vs be. For if she haue anie wit (as would God she had as god will as she hath shewd wit) she reckoneth hir selfe no wiser than she thinketh some that be here, of whose faithfull mind she nothing doubteth, but verelie beleueth and knoweth, that they would be as loze of his harme as hir selfe, and yet would haue him from hir if she bide there: and we all (I thinke) contented, that both be with hir, if she come thence, and bide in such place where they may with their honors be. Now then, if she refuse in the deliuerance of him, to follow the counsell of them, whose wisdom she knoweth, whose truth she well trusteth: it is easie to perceiue, that frowardnesse letteth hir, and not feare. But go to, suppose that the feare (as who maie let hir to feare hir owne shadow) the more she feareth to deliuer him, the more ought we feare to leaue him in hir hands, 60 For if the cast such fond doubts, that she feare his hurt: then will she feare that he shall be set thence.

For the will some thinke, that if men were set (which God forbid) upon so great a mischief, the sanctuary would little let them: which god men might (as me thinketh) without sinne somewhat less regard than they do. Now then, if the doubt, least he might be fetched from him, is it not likeli enough that the shall send him some where out of the realme? Wherelic I loke for none other. And I doubt not, but the now as soze mindeth it, as we the let thereof. And if the might happen to bring that to passe (as it were no great maiestie, the letting him alone) all the world would saie, that we were a wise sort of counsellors about a king, that let his brother be cast awaie under our noses.

And therefore, I insure you faithfullie for my mind, I will rather (manger his mind) fetch him awaie, than leave him there, till his forwardnesse and fond feare conueie him awaie. And yet will I breake no sanctuary therfore. For verely, sith the privileges of that place, and other like, haue bene of long continued, I am not he that would be about to breake them. And in god faith, if they were now to begin, I would not be he that should be about to make them. Yet will I not say naie, but that it is a deed of pittie, that such men as the sea, or their euill debtors haue brought in pouertie, should haue some place of libertie, to keepe their bodies out of danger of their cruell creditors.

And also, if the crowne happen (as it hath done) to come in question, while either part taketh other as traitors, I will well there be some places of refuge for both. But as for theues, of which these places be full, and which neuer fall from the craft, after they once fall thereto, it is pittie the sanctuary should serue them. And much more, mankillers, whome God had to take from the altar and kill them, if their murder were wilfull. And where it is otherwise, there need we not the sanctuaries that God appointed in the old law. For if either necessitie, his owne defense, or misfortune dyaue him to that deed, a pardon serueth, which either the law granteth of course, or the king of pittie maie. When loke we now how few sanctuary men there be, whome anie fauourable necessitie compelled to go thither. And then se on the other side, what a sort there be commonlie therein of them, whom wilfull bruthers innesse hath brought to naught.

What a rabble of theues, murderers, and malicious heinous traitors, and that in two places speciallic; the one at the elbow of the citie, the other in the verie bolweis. I dare well auow it, weie the god that they do, with the hurt that cometh of them, and ye shall find it much better to lacke both, than haue both. And this I saie, although they were not abused as they now be, & so long haue be, that I feare me euer they will be, while men be afraid to set their hands to the mendement, as though God & S. Peter were the patrones of vngratious liuing. Now bruthers riot & run in debt, upon boldnesse of these places, pea, and rich men run thither with more mens goods, there they build, there they spend, & bid there creditors go whistle them. Mens wifes run thither with their husbands plate, & saie they dare not abide with their husbands for beating. Theues bring thither their stolen goods, and there liue thereon.

There deuise they new robberies, nightlie they scale out, they rob, and reave, and kill, and come in againe, as though those places gaue them not onelie a safeguard for the harme they haue done, but a licence also to do more. Howbeit, much of this mischief (if wise men would set their hands to it) might be amended, with great thanks to God, and no breach of the privilege. The residue, sith so long ago, I wrote here that pope, and that prince more pitious than politike, hath granted it, & other men since, of a cer-teine religious feare, haue not broken it, let vs take a paine therewith, and let it a Gods name stand in force, as saith forth as reason will, which is not fullie so farre forth, as may serue to let vs of the fetching forth of this noble man to his honor and wealth, out of that place, in which he neither is, nor can be a sanctuary man.

A sanctuary serueth alwaie to defend the bodie of that man that standeth in danger abroad, not of great hurt onlie, but also of lawfull hurt: for against vnlawfull harmes, neuer pope nor king intended to priuilege anie one place, for that priuilege hath euerie place. Knoweth anie man, anie place wherein it is lawfull one man to do another wrong? That no man vnlawfullie take hurt, that libertie, the king, the law, and verie nature forbiddeth in euerie place, and maketh (to that regard) for euerie man euerie place a sanctuary. But where a man is by lawfull means in perill, there needeth he the tuition of some speciall priuilege, which is the onelie ground and cause of all sanctuaries.

From which necessitie, this noble prince is farre, whose loue to his king, nature and kindred prometh; whose innocence to all the world, his tender youth prometh; and so sanctuary, as for him, neither none he needeth, nor also none can haue. Men come not to sanctuary, as they come to baptism, to require it by their godfathers; he must aske it himselfe that must haue it, and reason; sith no man hath cause to haue it, but whose conscience of his owne fault maketh him faine, need to require it. What will then hath ponder babe, which and if he had discretion to require it, if need were, I dare say would now be right angrie with them that keepe him there. And I would thinke without anie scruple of conscience, without anie breach of priuilege, to be somewhat more homelie with them that be there sanctuary men in deed.

For if one go to sanctuary with another mans goods, whie should not the king, leauing his bodie at libertie, satisfie the partie of his goods, even within the sanctuary? For neither king nor pope can giue anie place such a priuilege, that it shall discharge a man of his debts, being able to paie. And with that, diuerse of the clergie that were present (whether they said it for his pleasure, or as they thought) agreed plainelie, that by the law of God, and of the church, the goods of a sanctuary man should be deliuered in payment of his debts, and stolen goods to the owner, and onlie libertie reserved him to get his liuing with the labor of his hands.]

Wherelic (quoth the duke) I thinke you say verie truth. And what if a mans wife will take sanctuary, because she list to run fro his husband, I would woe if she could alledge none other cause, he maie lawfully without anie displeasure to saint Peter, take her out of saint Peters church by the arme. And if no bodie maie be taken out of sanctuary, that saith he will bide there; then if a child will take sanctuary, because he feareth to go to schole, his maister must let him alone. And as simple as that sample is, yet is there lesse reason in out case than in that; for therein, though it be a childish feare, yet is there at the least some feare, and herein is there none at all. And wherelic, I haue often heard of sanctuary men, but I neuer heard earst of sanctuary children.

And therefore, as for the conclusion of my mind, who so maie haue deserved to need it, if they thinke it for their suertie, let them keepe it. But he can be no sanctuary man, that neither hath wisdom to desire it, nor malice to deserue it; whose life or libertie can by no lawfull processe stand in teopardie. And he that taketh one out of sanctuary to do him good, I saie plainlie, that he breakeeth no sanctuary. When the duke had done, the temporall men of the court, and a good part part of the spirituall also, thinking no hurt earthlie meant toward the yong babe; condescended in effect, that if he were not deliuered, he should be fettered. Whobey they thought it all best, in the auoiding of all manner of rumoz, that the lord cardinall should first assaie to get him with his good will.

Whereupon all the counsell came vnto the Starre chamber at Westmynster; and the lord cardinall, learning the protectoz with the counsell in the Starre chamber, departed into the sanctuarie to the quene, with others other lordz with him: were it for the respect of his honor, or that the should by presence of so manie perceiue, that this errand was not one mans mind: or were it, for that the protectoz intended not in this matter to trust anie one man alone; or else, that if the finalle were determined to keepe him, some of that companie had happilie secret instruction, incontinent (mangre his mind) to take him, and to leaue him no respite to conueie him, which he was likelie to mind after this matter broken to him, if his time would in anie wise serue him.

When the quene and these lordz were come together in presence, the lord cardinall shewed vnto him, that it was thought vnto the protectoz, and vnto the whole counsell, that his keeping of the kings brother in that place, was the thing which highe sounded, not onelie to the great rumoz of the people and their obloquie; but also to the importable græfe and displeasure of the kings roiall maiestie, to whose grace it were as singular a comfort, to haue his naturall brother in companie, as it was their both dishonour, and all theirs and his also, to suffer him in sanctuarie, as though the one brother stood in danger and perill of the other; and therefore more conuenient it were they should be together, than parted asunder; that the world may well thinke and saie both of their kindred and also of them, when they shall see and heare how they keepe continuall companie, and liue in mutual amitie (as becometh brethren) which bringeth commodities with it, for number, infinite; and for

Qualigat unanimis felix concordia fratres, O quales fructus utilitatis habet!

The cardinall shewed him likewise, that the counsell therefore had sent him vnto him, to require him the deliuerie of him, that he might be brought vnto the kings presence at his libertie, out of that place, which they reckoned as a prison; and there should he be deemed according to his estate: and he in this doing, should both do great good to the realme, pleasure to the counsell, and profit to his selfe, succour to his friends that were in distresse, and ouer that (which he wist well the speciallie tendered) not onelie great comfort and honor to the king, but also to the yong duke himselfe, whose both great wealth it were to be together, as well for manie greater causes, as also for their both disport & recreation. Which thing the lord esteemed no slight, though it seeme light, well pondering that their youth without recreation and play cannot indure; nor anie stranger, for the conuenience of both their ages and estates, so meetlie in that point for anie of them, as either of them for other.

My lord (quoth the quene) I saie not naie, but that it were verie conuenient, that this gentleman, whome ye require, were in companie of the king his brother: and in god faith, me thinketh it were as great commoditie to them both, as for yet awhile, to bene in the custodie of their mother, the tender age considered of the elder of them both, but speciallie the yonger, which besides his infancie, that also needeth god looking to) hath awhile bene so sore diseased, vered with sicknesse, and is so newlie rather a little amended, than well recovered, that I dare put no person earthlie in trust with his keeping, but my selfe onelie, considering that there is (as physicians saie) and as we also find, double the perill in the reciduation, than was in the first sicknesse, with which disease nature being sore laboured, sore wearied and weakened, wareth the lesse able to beare out and susteine a new surfet. And albeit there might be founden other that would happilie do their best vnto him, yet is there none that either knoweth better how to order him, than I that so long haue kept him: or is more tenderlie like to cherish him, than his owne mother that bare him.

So man denieth, god madame (quoth the cardinall) but that your grace were of all folke most necessarie about your childezen: and so would all the counsell not onelie be content, but glad that ye were (if it might stand with your pleasure) to be in such place as might stand with their honour. But if you do appoint your selfe to tarrie here, then thinke they it more conuenient that the duke of Borge were with the king honourable at his libertie, to the comfort of them both: than here as a sanctuarie man, to their both dishonour and obloquie, sith there is not alwaie so great necessitie to haue the child to be with the mother: but that occasion may sometime be such, that it should be more expedient to keepe him elsewhere. Which in this well appeareth, that at such time as your dearest sonne then prince, and now king, should for his honor, and good order of the countie, keepe household in Wales, farre out of your companie: your grace was well content therewith your selfe.

Not verie well content (quoth the quene) and yet the case is not like, for the tone was then in health, and the tother is now sicke. In which case, I maruell greatly, that my lord protectoz is so desirous to haue him in his keeping, where if the child in his sicknesse miscarried by nature, yet might he run into slander and suspicion of fraud. And where they call it a thing so sore against my childe's honor, and theirs also, that he bide in this place: it is all their honours there to suffer him bide, where no man doubteth he shall be best kept; and that is here, while I am here, which as yet intend not to come forth and leoparde my selfe after other of my friends, which would God were rather here in suertie with me, than I were there in leopardie with them.

Whie madame (quoth another lord) know you anie thing whie they should be in leopardie? I saie verelie sir (quoth the) no; whie they should be in prison neither, as they now be. But it is (I trow) no great maruell though I feare, least those that haue not letted to put them in durelle without colour, will let as little to procure their destruction without cause. The cardinall made a countenance to the other lord, that he should harpe no more vpon that string; and then said he to the quene, that he nothing doubted, but that those lordz of his honorable kin, which as yet remained vnder arrest, should vpon the matter examined, do well inough: and as toward his noble person, neither was nor could be anie manner leopardie.

Whereby should I trust that (quoth the quene) in that I am guiltlesse: As though they were guiltie, in that I am with their enemies better loued than they? When they hate them for my sake, in that I am so neere of kin to the king? And how far they be off, if that would helpe, as God send grace it hurt not, and therefore as for me, I purpose not as yet to depart hence. And as for this gentleman my sonne, I mind that he shall be where I am, till I see further: for I assure you, for that I see some men so greedy, without anie substantiall cause to haue him, this maketh me much the more fearder to deliuer him.

Truelie madame, quoth he, and the fearder that you you be to deliuer him, the fearder bin other men to suffer you to keepe him, least your causelesse feare might cause you further to conueie him; and manie be there that thinke he can haue no priuilege in this place, which neither can haue will to aske it, nor malice to deserue it. And therefore, they reckon no priuilege broken, though they fetch him out; which if we shall refuse to deliuer him, I verelie thinke they will. So much dread hath my lord his uncle, for the tender loue he beareth him, least your grace should hap to send him awaie.

The quene's reple upon the lord cardinal.

A sir (quoth the quene) hath the protector; so tender scale, that he feareth nothing but least he should escape him: Thinketh he that I would send him hence, which neither is in the plight to send out. And in what place could I reckon him sure, if he be not sure in this sanctuary, whereof was there neuer tyrant yet so diuelly that durst presume to breake? And I trust God is as strong now to withstand his aduersaries, as ever he was. But my sonne can deserue no sanctuary, and therefore he can not haue it. For soth he hath found a goodlie glose, by which that place that may defend a theefe, may not saue an innocent. But he is in no leopordie, nor hath no need thereof, would God he had not.

Troweth the protector? I praise God he may procure a protector; troweth he that I perceiue not whereunto his painted procelle draweth? It is not honourable that the duke bide here: it were comfortable for them both, that he were with his brother, because the king lacketh a plaffellow. Be you sure: I praise God send them both better plaffellows than him, that maketh so high a matter upon such a trifling pretext: as though there could none be founden to plaie with the king, but if his brother that hath no lust to plaie for sicknesse, come out of sanctuary out of his safeguard to plaie with him. As though princes (as young as they be) could not plaie but with their peres, or children could not plaie but with their kindred, with whom for the more part they agree much worse than with strangers.

But the child cannot require the priuilege. Who told him so? He shall heare him aske it, and he will. Notobest, this is a gaie matter. Suppose he could not aske it, suppose he would not aske it, suppose he would aske to go out. If I saie he shall not; if I aske the priuilege but for my selfe, I say he that against my will taketh him out, breaketh the sanctuary. Serueth this libertie for my person onelie, or for my goods too? He may not hence take my horte fro me: and may you take my child fro me? He is also my ward: for as my learned counsell sheweth me, sith he hath nothing by descent holden by knights service, the law maketh his mother his gardian. When may no man I suppose take my ward fro me out of sanctuary, with out the breach of the sanctuary.

And if my priuilege could not serue him, nor he aske it for himselfe, yet sith the law committeth to me the custodie of him, I may require it for him, except the law giue a child a gardian onelie for his goods and lands, discharging him of the cure and safe keeping of his bodie, for which onelie both lands and goods serue. And if examples be sufficient to obteine priuilege for my child, I need not farre to seke. For in this place in which we now be (and which is now in question whether my child may take benefit of it) mine other sonne now king was bozne, and kept in his cradle, and preserved to a more prosperous fortune, which I praise God long to continue. And as all you know, this is not the first time that I haue taken sanctuary.

For when my lord my husband was banished, and thrust out of his kingdom, I fled hither, being great with child, and here I bare the prince. And when my lord my husband returned safe againe, and had the victorie, then went I hence to welcome him home, and from hence I brought my babe the prince unto his father, when he first took him in his arms. And I praise God that my sonnes palace may be as great safeguard unto him now reigning, as this place was sometime to the kings enemie. In which place I intend to keepe his brother, sith, &c. (.) Wherefore here intend I to keepe him, sith mans law serueth the gardian to keepe the infant.

The law of nature will the mother to keepe his child, Gods law priuilegeth the sanctuary, and the sanctuary my sonne, sith I feare to put him in the protectors hands that hath his brother already, and were (if both failed) inheritour to the crowne. The cause of my feare hath no man to do to examine. And yet feare I no further than the law feareth, which (as learned men tell me) forbiddeth euery man the custodie of them, by whose death he maie inherit lesse land than a kingdome. I can no more, but whosoever he be that breaketh this holie sanctuary, I praise God shoulde send him need of sanctuary, when he maie not come to it. For taken out of sanctuary would I not my mortall enemie were.

The lord cardinal, perceiuing that the quene feared euer the longer the farther off, and also that she began to kindle and chafe, and spake more biting words against the protector, and such as he neither be leued, and was also loth to heare, he said to hir for a small conclusion, that he would no longer dispute the matter: but if she were content to deliuer the duke to him, and to the other lords present, he durst laie his owne bodie & soule both in pledge, not onelie for his suertie, but also for his estate. And if she would giue them a resolute answer to the contrarie, he would forthwith depart therewithall, and shifft who so would with this businesse afterwards: for he neuer intended more to moue hir in that matter, in which he thought that he & all other also (saue hir selfe) lacked either will or truth: wit, if they were so dull that they could nothing perceiue what the protector intended: truth, if they should procure hir sonne to be deliuered into his hands, in whom they should perceiue toward the child anie euill intended.

The quene with these words stood a good while in a great studie. And forsomuch as hir senned the cardinal more readie to depart than some of the remnant, and the protector himselfe readie at hand; so that she verelie thought she could not keepe him, but that he should incontinentlie be taken thence: and to conueie him else-where, neither had the time to serue hir, nor place determined, nor persons appointed, all things vnreadie, this message came on hir so suddenlie, nothing lesse looking for, than to haue him fet out of sanctuary, which she thought to be now beset in such places about, that he could not be conueied out vntaken, and partlie as she thought it might fortune hir feare to be false, so well she wist it was either needlesse or bootlesse: wherefore if she should needs go from him, she deemed it best to deliuer him.

And ouer that, of the cardinals faith she nothing doubted, nor of some other lords neither, whom she there saw. Which as she feared least they might be deceived: so was she well assured they would not be corrupted. When thought she it should yet make them the more warlike to looke to him, and the more circumspectie to see to his suertie, if she with hir owne hands betooke him to them of trust. And at the last she took the young duke by the hand, and said vnto the lords: My lords (quoth she) and all my lords, I neither am so vnwise to mistrust your wits, nor so suspicious to mistrust your truths: of which thing I purpose

For lo, here is (quoth the) this gentleman, whom I doubt not but I could here kepe safe, if I would, what euer anie man say: & I doubt not also, but there be some abroad so deadlie enemies unto my blood, that if they will where anie of it late in their owne that desire of a kingdome knoweth no kindred. The brother hath bene the brothers bane: and maie the is the others defense while they be asunder, and each of their lues lieth in the others bodie. Keepe one safe and both be sure, and nothing for them both moze pe

All this notwithstanding, here I deliuer him and to the child; Fare well mine owne sweete sonne, God send you good keeping: let me kisse you yet once per you go, for God knoweth when we shall kisse togi ther againe. And therewith she kissed him and blessed him, turned hir backe and wept and went hir waie, leaving the child weeping as fast. Howbeit the duke some afterwarde that she had so parted from hir son (when it was past hir power to procure remedie, & no hope of helpe left against afterclaps) which is the common case of all that kind, as the pzouerbe saith:

Femineus veri dolor est post facta dolere.

When the lord cardinal, and these other lords with him, had receiued this yong duke, they brought him into the Star chamber, where the protector toke him in his armes and kissed him with these wordes: How welcome my lord euen with all my vertie heart. And he said in that of likelihood as he thought. Thereupon forthwith they brought him unto the king his brother into the bishops palace at Paules, and from thence thorough the citie honourable into the Towre, out of the which after that daie they neuer came abroad.

When the protector had both the children in his hands, he opened himselfe moze boldlie, both to cer taine other men, and also chieflie to the duke of Buc kingham. Although I know that manie thought that this duke was pzoize to all the protectors coun sell, euen from the beginning; and some of the protec tors friends said, that the duke was the first mouer of the protector to this matter, sending a pzoize mes senger unto him, straight after king Edwards death.

But others againe, which knew better the subtil litt of the protector, denie that he euer opened his enterpise to the duke, untill he had brought to passe the things before rehearsed. But when he had impi soned the queenes kinfolk, & gotten both hir sonnes into his owne hands, then he opened the rest of his purpose with lesse feare to them whome he thought meet for the matter, and speciallie to the duke, who being sworne to his purpose, he thought his strength moze than halfe increased. The matter was broken unto the duke by subtil folks, and such as were their craftie-masters in the handling of such wicked deu ises: who declared unto him that the yong king was offended with him for his kinfolks sake, and if he were euer able he would reuenge them, who would picke him forward thereunto if they escaped (for they would remember their imprisonment), or else if they were put to death, without doubt the yong k. would be carefull for their deaths, whose imprisonment was griuous unto him.

Also that with repenting the duke should nothing auaile, for there was no waie left to redeeme his of fense by benefits, but he should longer destroye him selfe than saue the king, who with his brother and his kinfolks he saw in such places imprisoned, as the protector might with a becke destroye them all: and that it were no doubt but he would do it in deed, if there were anie new enterpise attempted. And that it was likelie, that as the protector had pzoized pzoize gard for himselfe, so had he spials for the duke, and traines to catch him, if he should be against him; and that peradventure from them, whome he lest su spected. For the state of things and the dispositions of men were then such, that a man could not well tell whome he might trust, or whome he might feare.

These things and such like, being beaten into the dukes mind, brought him to that point, that where he had repented the way that he had entered, yet would he go forth in the same; and sith he had once begun, he would stoutlie go thorough. And therefore to this wicked enterpise, which he beleued could not be doi ed, he bent himselfe, and went thorough; and determi ned, that sith the common mischefe could not be a mended, he would turne it as much as he might to his owne commoditie. When it was agreed, that the protector should haue the dukes aid to make him king, and that the protectors onelie lawfull sonne should marrie the dukes daughter, and that the protector should grant him the quiet possession of the earldome of Hereford, which he claimed as his inheritance, and could neuer obtaine it in king Edwards time.

Besides these requests of the duke, the protector of his owne mind promised him a great quantitie of the kings treasure, and of his household stuffe. And when they were thus at a point betwene themsel ues, they went about to prepare for the coronation of the yong king, as they would haue it seeme. And that they might turne both the eyes and minds of men from perceiuing of their diuers other where, the lords being sent for from all parts of the realme, came thicke to that solemnitie. But the protector and the duke, after that they had sent the lord cardinal, the archbishop of Yorke then lord chancellor, the bi shop of Elie, the lord Stanleie, and the lord Hastings then lord chamberlaine, with manie other noble men (*) to common & deuise about the coronation in one place, as fast were they in an other place, con triving the contrarie, and to make the protector king.

To which counsell albeit there were adhibited ve rie few, and they were secret: yet began there here and there abouts, some maner of muttering among the people, as though all should not long be well, though they neither wist what they feared, nor where fore: were it, that before such great things, mens hearts of a secret instinct of nature misgiue them; as the sea without wind swelleth of himselfe sometime before a tempest: or were it that some one man, hap pilie somewhat perceiuing, filled manie men with suspicion, though he shewed few men what he knew, Howbeit somewhat the dealing it selfe made men to muse on the matter, though the counsell were close.
For by little and little all folke withdrew from the Towre, and drew unto Crosbies in Bishops gates street, where the protector kept his household. The protector had the refox, the king in maner desolate.

While some for their businesse made sute to them he warned, that it might happilie turne them to no good, to be so much attendant about the king without the protectors appointment, which remoued also diuerse of the princes old seruants from him, and set new about him. Thus manie things comming together, partlie by chance, partlie of purpose, caused at length not common people onelie, that woud with the wind, but wise men also, and some lords eke to marke the matter and muse thereon; so farre forth that the lord Stanleie that was after earle of Derby, wiselie mistrusted it, and said unto the lord Hastings, that he much disliked these two severall counceils. For while we (quoth he) talke of one matter in the one place, little wot we wherof they talke in the tother place.

My lord (quoth the lord Hastings) on my life neuer doubt you: for while one man is there, which is neuer thense, neuer can there be thing once moued, that should sound amisse toward me, but it should be in mine eares per it were well out of their mouths. This ment he by Catesbie, which was of his neere secret counsell, and whome he verie familiarlie vsed, and in his most weightie matters put no man in so speciall trust, reckoning himselfe to no man so lief, sith he well wist there was no man so much to him beholden as was this Catesbie, which was a man well learned in the lawes of this land, and by the speciall fauour of the lord chamberlaine, in god authoritie, and much rule bare in all the countie of Leicester, where the lord chamberlains power cheselie laie.

But suerlie great pitie was it, that he had not had either more truth, or lesse wit. For his dissimulation onlie kept all that mischeefe by. In whome if the lord Hastings had not put so speciall trust, the lord Stanleie & he had departed with diuerse other lords, and broken all the danse, for manie ill signes that he saw, which he now construes all to the best. So suerlie thought he, that there could be none harme toward him in that counsell intended, where Catesbie was. And of truth the protector and the duke of Buckingham made verie good semblance unto the lord Hastings, and kept him much in companie. And undoubtedly the protector loued him well, and loth was to haue lost him, sauing for feare lest his life should haue quailed their purpose.

For which cause he moued Catesbie to proue with some words cast out a farre off, whether he could thinke it possible to win the lord Hastings unto their part. But Catesbie, whether he assaied him, or assaied him not, reported unto them, that he found him so fast, and heard him speake so terrible words, that he durst no further breake. And of truth, the lord chamberlaine of verie trust shewed unto Catesbie the distrust that others began to haue in the matter. And therefore he, fearing lest their motion might with the lord Hastings minish his credence, whereunto onelie all the matter leaned, procured the protector hastilie to rid him. And much the rather, for that he trusted by his death to obtaine much of the rule that the lord Hastings bare in his countie: the onelie desire wherof was the allectiue that induced him to be partner, and one speciall contriuer of all this horrible treason.

Wherupon some after, that is to wit, on the first daie [being the thirteenth of June] manie lords assembled in the Tower, and there sat in counsell, deuising the honourable solemnitie of the kings coronation, of which the time appointed then so neere approached, that the pageants and subtilties were in making daie & night at Westminster, and much bittels killed therefore, that afterward was cast awaie. These lords so sitting together communing of this matter, the protector came in amongst them, first about nine of the clocke, saluting them courteously, and expressing himselfe that he had bene from them so long, sauing merilie that he had bene a sleeper that daie.

After a little talking with them, he said unto the bishop of Ely: My lord you haue verie good strawberries at your garden in Holborne, I require you let us haue a masse of them: Gladlie my lord (quoth he) would God I had some better thing as ready to your pleasure as that! And therewithall in all the hast he sent his seruant for a masse of strawberries. The protector set the lords fast in communing, & threupon praeleng them to spare him for a little while, departed thense. And some after one houre, betwene ten & eleuen he returned into the chamber amongst them all, changed with a wonderfull foure angrie countenance, knitting the browes, frowning and fretting, and gnawing on his lips: and so fat him downe in his place.

All the lords were much dismayd and sore marvelled at this maner of sudden change, and what thing should him aile. Then, when he had sitten still a while, thus he began: What were they worthy to haue that compassse and imagine the destruction of me, being so neere of blood unto the king, and protector of his roiall person and his realme? At this question, all the lords sat sore astonied, musing much by whome this question should be meant, of which euerie man wist himselfe cleere. When the lord chamberlaine (as he that for the loue betwene them thought he might be boldest with him) answered and said, that they were worthy to be punished as heinous traitors, whatsoeuer they were. And all the other affirmed the same. What is (quoth he) ponder for errie my brothers wife, and other with hir (meaning the queene.)

At these words manie of the other lords were greatly abashed, that fauoured hir. But the lord Hastings was in his mind better content, that it was moued by hir, than by anie other whome he loued better: albeit his heart somewhat grudged, that he was not afore made of counsell in this matter, as he was of the taking of hir kinned, and of their putting to death, which were by his assent before deuised to be beheaded at Windsor this selfe same daie, in which he was not ware that it was by other deuised, that he himselfe should be beheaded the same daie at London. Then said the protector: Ye shall all see it what wife that forceresse, and that other witch of hir counsell Shores wife, with their affinitie, haue by their forcerie and witchcraft wasted my bodie. And therewith he plucked by his dublet sleue to his elbow upon his left arme, where he shewed a werthy withered arme, and small, as it was neuer other.

Hereupon euerie mans mind soe misgaue them, well perceiuing that this matter was but a quarrell. For they well wist that the queene was too wise to go about anie such follie. And also if she woud, yet woud she of all folke least, make Shores wife of hir counsell, whome of all women the most hated, as that concubine whome the king hir husband had most loued. And also, no man was there present, but well knew that his arme was euer such since his birth. Pastheleste, the lord chamberlaine (which from the death of king Edward kept Shores wife, on whome he somewhat doted in the kings life, sauing (as it is said) he that while forbore hir of reuerence toward the king, or else of a certeine kind of sweetie to his friend) answered and said: Certainelie my lord, if they haue so heinoullie done, they be worthy heinous punishment.

What (quoth the protector) thou seruest me I wene with ifs and with ands, I tell thee they haue so done, and that I will make god on thy bodie traitor: and therewith as in a great anger, he clapped his fist by on the bozds a great rap. At which token one cried, Creation, without the chamber. Therewith a doze clapped, and in come there rushing men in harness, as manie as the chamber might hold. And anon the p[ro]tector said to the lord Hastings: I arrest thee traitor: What me my lord? (quoth he.) Yea thee traitor quoth the p[ro]tector. And an other let sie at the lord Stanleie, which shynke at the stroke, & fell under the table, or else his head had bene clef to the teeth: for as thortlie as he shynke, yet ran the bloud about his ears.

Then were they all quickelie bestowed in diuerse chambers, except the lord chamberleine, whome the p[ro]tector had sped and shruue him apace, for by saint Paule (quoth he) I will not to dinner till I see thy head off. It boted him not to aske whie, but heauilie take a p[ri]est at adventure, & made a thort thyst: for a longer would not be suffered, the p[ro]tector made so much hast to dinner, which he might not go to, untill this were done, for sauing of his oth. So was he brought forth to the greene beside the chapell within the Towre, and his head laid downe vpon a long log of timber, and there stricken off, and afterward his bodie with the head interred at Windso[re] beside the bodie of king Edward, both whose soules our Lord pardon. Thus began he to establish his kingdome in bloud, growing thereby in hatred of the nobles, and also abridging both the line of his life, and the time of his regiment: for God will not haue bloudthirstie tyrants daies prolonged, but will cut them off in their ruffe; according to Dauids words:

Impio, fallaci, audoq[ue] cadis

Filamors rumpet viridi in iumentis.

A marvellous case is it to heare either the warnings of that he should haue bodied, or the tokens of that he could not boid. For the selfe night next before his death, the lord Stanleie sent a trustie messenger vnto him at midnight in all the hast, requirung him to rise and ride awaie with him, for he was disposed utterly no longer to bide, he had so fearfull a dreame; in which him thought that a boare with his tuskes so rased them both by the heads, that the bloud ran about both their shoulders. And forsomuch as the p[ro]tector gaue the boare for his cognisance, this dreame made so fearfull an impressioun in his heart, that he was throughlie determined no longer to tarie, but had his horse readie, if the lord Hastings would go with him, to ride yet so farre the same night, that they should be out of danger yer daie.

Ya god Lord (quoth the lord Hastings to this messenger) leaneth my lord thy maister so much to such trifles, and hath such faith in dreames, which either his owne feare fantaseth, or do rise in the nights rest by reason of his daies thought: Tell him it is plaine withcraft to beleue in such dreames, which if they were tokens of things to come, why thinkest he not that we might be as likelie to make them true by our going, if we were caught & brought backe, as friends falle sliers; for then had the boare a cause likelie to rase vs with his tuskes, as folke that fled for some falsehood. Therefore, either is there perill, or none there is in deed: or if anie be, it is rather in going than biding. And in case we should needs fall in perill one waie or other, yet had I rather that men should see that it were by other mens falsehood, than thinke it were either by our owne fault, or saint heart. And therefore go to thy maister (man) and commend me to him, & praie him be merie & haue no feare: for I insure him I am as sure of the man that he twereth of, as I am of mine owne hand. God send grace sir (quoth the messenger) and went his waie.

Certaine is it also, that in riding towards the Towre, the same morning in which he was beheaded, his horse threwe or threwe stumbled with him, almost to the falling. Which thing albeit eery man wote well daile happeneth to them, to whom no such mischance is toward; yet hath it bene of an old rite and custom obserued, as a token oftentimes notablie foregoing some great misfortune. Now this that follooweth was no warning, but an ennious scoone. The same morning yer he was up, came a knight vnto him, as it were of courtesie, to accompanie him to the councell; but of truth sent by the p[ro]tector to haue him thitherwards, with whome he was of secret confederacie in that purpose; a meane man at that time, and now of great authoritie.

This knight (I say) when it happened the lord chamberleine by the waie to state his horse, & common a while with a p[ri]est whom he met in the Towre street, brake his tale, and said merilte to him: What my lord, I pray you come on, thereto talke you so long with that p[ri]est: you haue no need of a p[ri]est yet: and therewith he laughed vpon him, as though he would say, Ye shall haue some. But so little wist the tother what he ment, and so little mistrusted, that he was neuer merier, nor neuer so full of god hope in his life, which selfe thing is oft sene a signe of change. But I shall rather let anie thing passe me, than the baie suertie of mans mind so nere his death [dattering himselfe with deceitfull conceits of inward motions of life to be prolonged, euen in present cases of deadlie danger, and heauie misfortunes offering great mistrust; as he did that is noted for speaking like a foole:

Non est (crede mihi) sapientis dicere, Futurum:

Nascentes morimur, finisq[ue] ab origine pendet.

Upon the verte Towre tharfe, so neare the place where his head was off sone after, there met he with one Hastings a pursuant of his owne name. And at their meeting in that place, he was put in remembrance of another time, in which it had happened them before to meet in like manner together in the same place. At which other time the lord chamberleine had bene accused vnto king Edward by the lord Rivers the quenes brother, in such wise, as he was for the while (but it lasted not long) farre fallen into the kings indignation, & stood in great feare of himselfe. And forsomuch as he now met this pursuant in the same place, that ieopardie so well passed, it gaue him great pleasure to talke with him thereof, with whom he had before talked thereof in the same place, while he was therein.

And therefore he said: Ya Hastings, art thou remembered when I met thee here once with an heauie heart: Yea my lord (quoth he) that remember I well, and thanked be God, they gat no god, nor you no harme thereby. Thou wouldest say so (quoth he) if thou knewest as much as I know, which seth knoweth else as yet, and mo shall thortlie. That meant he by the lords of the quenes kinred that were taken before, and should that daie be beheaded at Pomfret: which he well wist, but nothing ware that the ar hung ouer his owne head. In said man (quoth he) I was neuer so loye, nor neuer stood in so great dread in my life, as I did when thou and I met here. And lo how the world is turned, now stand mine enemies in the danger (as thou maiest hap to heare more hereafter) and I neuer in my life so merrie, nor neuer in so great suertie.

O god God, the blindness of our mortall nature, when he most feared, he was in god suertie; when he reckoned himselfe surest, he lost his life, and that within two houres after. Thus ended this honorable man, a good knight and a gentle, of great authoritie with his prince, of living somewhat dissolute, plaine and open to his enemie, & secret to his friend, easie to beguile, as he that of god heart and courage forestood no perils, a louing man, and passing well beloved: verie faithfull, and trustie inough, trusting too much. Now sate the same of this lords death swiftlie through the cite, and so forth further about like a wind in euerie mans care. But the protector, immediatlie after dinner, intending to set some colour upon the matter, sent in all the hall for manie substantiall men out of the cite into the Towre.

Now at their comming, himselfe with the duke of Buckingham, stood harnessed in old ill faring byrganders, such as no man should weare, that they would vouchsafe to haue put upon their backs, except that some sudden necessitie had constrained them. And then the protector shewed them, that the lord chamberleine, and other of his conspiracie, had contrived to haue suddenly destroyed him, and the duke, there the same day in the councell. And what they intended further, was as yet not well knowne. Of which their treason he neuer had knowledge before ten of the clocke the same forenone, which sudden feare dyaue them to put on for their defense such harnesse as came next to hand. And so had God holpen them, that the mischief turned upon them that would haue done it. And this he required them to report.

The protector toys proclamation.

Euerie man answered him false, as though no man mistrusted the matter, which of truth no man beleued. Yet for the further appeasing of the peoples minds, he sent immediatlie after diner in all the hall one herald of armes, with a proclamation to be made through the cite in the kings name, containing, that the lord Hastings, with diuerse other of his traitorous purpose, had before conspired the same day to haue slaine the lord protector, and the duke of Buckingham sitting in the councell; and after to haue taken upon them to rule the king & the realme at their pleasure, and thereby to pill and spoile whome they list vncontrolled. And much matter there was in that proclamation, deuised to the slander of the lord chamberleine, as that he was an ill counsellor to the kings father, intising him to manie things highlie rebounding to the minishing of his honour, and to the vntuersall hurt of the realme.

The life and deeds of the lord chamberleine laid open

The meanes whereby, namely, his euill companie, sinister procuring, and vngratious example, as well in manie other things, as in the vicious haung and inordinate abusion of his bodie, both with manie other, and also speciallie with Shores wife, which was one also of his most secret counsell in this most heinous treason, with whom he late nightlie, and namely the night last past next before his death. So that it was the leste maruell, if vngratious liuing brought him to an unhappie ending, which he was now put vnto by the most dreed commandement of the kings highnesse, and of his honorable and faithfull counsell, both for his demerits, being so openlie taken in his fallie conceited treason, and also least the delatency of his execution might haue incouraged other mischievous persons, partners of his conspiracie, to gather and assemble themselves together, in making some great commotion for his deliuerance: whose hope being now by his well deserved death politike lie repressed, all the realme should (by Gods grace) rest in god quiet and peace.

Now was this proclamation made within two houres after that he was beheaded, and it was so curiously indited, & so faire written in parchment, in so well a set hand, and therewith of it selfe so long a processe, that euerie child might well perceiue that it was prepared before. For all the time, betwene his death and the proclaiming, could scant haue sufficed vnto the bare writing alone, all had it bene but in paper, and scribled forth in hast at aduenture. So that vpon the proclaiming thereof, one that was scholemaster of Dowles, of chance standing by, and comparing the shortnesse of the time with the length of the matter, said vnto them that stood about him; There is a gaie goodlie cast foule cast awaite for half. And a merchant answered him, that it was written by protheie.

So to then by and by, as it were for anger, not for couetise, the protector sent into the house of Shores wife (for hir husband dwelled not with hir) and spoiled hir of all that euer she had, about the value of two or thre thousand markes, and sent hir bodie to prison. And then he had a while laid vnto hir (for the maner sake) that she went about to bewitch him, and that she was of counsell with the lord chamberleine to destroy him: in conclusion, when that no colour could fasten vpon these matters, then he laid heinouslie to hir charge, that thing that hir selfe could not denie, and that all the world wist was true, and that nathelesse euerie man laughed at, to heare it then so suddenly so highlie taken, that she was naught of hir bodie.

And for this cause (as a goodlie continent prince, cleane and faultlesse of himselfe, sent out of heauen into this vicious world for the amendment of mens maners) he caused the bishop of London to put hir to open penance, going before the crose in procession vpon a sundae with a taper in hir hand. In which she went in countenance and pale demure so womanlie; that albeit she were out of all araie, saue hir kirtle onelie, yet went she so faire and louelie, namely while the wondering of the people cast a comelie rud in hir cheeks (of which she before had most misse) that hir great shame wan hir much praise among those that were more amorous of hir bodie, than curious of hir soule. And manie good folks also that hated hir liuing, & glad were to see sin corrected: yet pitied they more hir penance, than reioised therein, when they considered that the protector procured it, more of a corrupt intent, than anie vertuous affection.

This woman was borne in London, worshipfullie friended, honestlie brought vp, and verie well married, facing somewhat too longe, hir husband an honest citizen, pious and goodlie, & of god substance. But for so much as they were coupled yer the were well ripe, she not verie feruently loued him, for whi she neuer longed, which was happilie the thing that the more easilie made hir incline vnto the kings appetite, when he required hir. Whobest the respect of his volatilitie, the hope of gaie apparell, ease, and other wanton wealth, was able some to pearce a soft tender heart, [so that she became flexible and pliant to the kings appetite and will; being so blinded with the bright glorie of the present courtlie brauerie which she inioied, that she vterlie forgot how excellent a treasure god name and fame is, and of what incomparable sweetnesse, even by the iudgement of him, whose match for wisdom the world neuer bred vp, saing:

nobili vnguenti quam pretiosus odor.*

But when the king had abused hir, anon hir husband (as he was an honest man, and one that could his good, not presuming to touch a kings concubine) left hir vp to him altogether. When the king died, the lord chamberleine took hir, which in the kings daies, albeit he was soze inamourued vpon hir, yet he forbore hir; either for reuerence, or for a certeine friendlie faithfulltie. Proper she was and faire; no thing in hir bodie that you would haue changed, but if ye would haue wished hir somewhat higher. Thus saie they that knew hir in her youth. Albeit some that now see hir (for yet she liueth) deem hir neuer to haue bene well visaged: whose iudgement seemeth me somewhat like, as though men should gesse the beautie of one long before departed, by hir scalpe taken out of the charuell hole.

For now is she old, leane, withered, and dried vp, nothing left but rindled skin, and hard bone. And yet being vingeuen such, who so well aduise his visage, might gesse and deuise, which parts how filled would make it a faire face. Yet delighted not men so much in his beautie, as in his pleasant behauiour. For a proper wit had he, and could both read well and write, merrie in companie, readie and quicke of answer, neither mute, nor full of bable, sometime talunting with out displeasure, and not without disport. The king would saie that he had thre concubins, which in thre diuerse properties diuersite excelled. One the merriest, another the wildest, the third the holiest harlot in his realme, as one whome no man could get out of the church lightlie to any place, but it were to his bed.

The other two were somewhat greater personages, and nathelesse of their humilitie content to be namelesse, and to forbeare the praise of those properties: but the merriest was this Shozer wite, in whom the king therefore toke speciall pleasure. For manie he had, but his he loued; whose fauour to say the truth (for sin it were to belie the diuell) he neuer abused to anye mans hurt, but to manie a mans comfort and reliefe. Where the king toke displeasure, she would mitigate and appease his mind: where men were out of fauour, she would bring them in his grace. For manie that had highlie offended the obtained pardon. Of great forfeitures she gat men remission.

Finallie, in manie weightie sutes she stood manie a man in great stead, either for none or verie small rewards, and those rather gale than rich; either that she was content with the deed if selfe well done; or for that she delighted to be sued vnto, and to shew what she was able to do with the king; or for that wanton women and wealthie be not alwaies coue-tions. I doubt not some shall thinke this woman too slight a thing to be written of, and set among the re-membances of great matters: which they shall spe-ciallie thinke, that happilie shall esteeme his onelie by that they now see him.

But me seemeth the chance so much the more worthie to be remembred, in how much she is now in the more beggerlie condition, vnfreended and woone out of acquaintance, after good substance, after as great fauour with the prince, after as great sute and seeking to with all those, that those daies had businesse to spend, as manie other men were in their times, which be now famous onelie by the infamie of their ill daies. His doings were not much lesse, albeit they be much lesse remembred, because they were not so euill. For men die if they haue an euill turne, to write it in marble: and who so dooth vs a good turne, we write it in dust, which is not worth proued by him: for at this daie the begger of manie at this daie liuing, that at this daie had begged if she had not bene.

Now was it so deuised by the protector and his councell, that the selfe daie, in which the lord cham-berleine was beheaded in the Tower of London, and about the selfe same houre, was there (not without his assent) beheaded at Pomfret, the foreremembered lords & knights that were taken from the king at Northampton and Stonie Stratford. Which thing was done in the presence, and by the order of sir Richard Katcliffe knight, whose seruice the protector speciallie used in that councell, and in the execution of such lawlesse enterprises, as a man that had bene long secret with him, having experience of the world, and a shrewd wit, short & rude in speech, rough and boisterous of behauiour, bold in mischief, as far from pitie as from all feare of God.

This knight bringing them out of the prison to the scaffold, and shewing to the people about that they were traitors (not suffering them to declare & speake their innocencie, least their words might haue inclined men to pitie them, and to hate the protector and his part) caused them hastilie, without iudgement, processe, or maner of order to be beheaded, and without other earthlie gilt, but onelie that they were good men, too true to the king, and too nigh to the queene.

Now when the lord chamberleine & these other lords and knights were thus beheaded, and rid out of the waie: then thought the protector, that when men mu-red what the matter meant, while the lords of the realme were about him out of their owne strengthes, while no man wist what to thinke, nor whom to trust, per euer they should haue space to dispute and digest the matter and make parties; it were best hastilie to pursue his purpose, and put himselfe in possession of the crowne, per men could haue time to deuise anye waie to resist.

But now was all the studie by what meanes this matter, being of it selfe so heinous, might be first broken to the people, in such wise that it might be well taken. To this councell they toke diuerse, such as they thought meetlie to be trusted, likelie to be induced to that part, and able to stand them in stead either by power or policie. Among whome they made of councell Edmund Shau knight then maior of London, which vpon trust of his owne aduancement, whereof he was of a proud heart highlie desirous, should frame the cite to their appetite. Of spirituall men they toke such as had wit, and were in authori-tie among the people for opinion of their learning, and had no scrupulous conscience. Among these had they John Shau cleark brother to the maior, and srier Penker, prouinciall of the Augustine friers both doctours of diuinitie, both great preachers, both of more learning than vertue, of more fame than learning. For they were before greatlie esteemed among the people: but after that neuer.

Of these two the one had a sermon in praise of the protector before the coronation, the other after, both so full of tedious flatterie, that no mans eares could abide them. Penker in his sermon so lost his voice, that he was faine to leaue off, and come downe in the midst. Doctor Shau by his sermon lost his honestie, & some after his life, for verie shame of the world, into which he durst neuer after come abroad. But the srier forced for no shame, and so it harmed him the lesse. Howbeit some doubt, and manie thinke, that Penker was not of counsell in the matter before the coronation, but after the common maner fell to flatterie after: namelye with his sermon was not incontinentlie vpon it, but at saint Marie hospitall at the Easter after.

But certeine it is, that doctor Shau was of counsell in the beginning, so farre forth that they determined that he should first breake the matter in a sermon at Paules crosse, in which he should (by the au-thoritie of his preaching) incline the people to the protectors ghostlie purpose. But now was all the labor and studie in the deuise of some conuenient pretext, for which the people should be content to depose the prince, and accept the protector for king. In which di-uerse things they deuised. But the chiefe thing & the weightiest of all that inuention rested in this, that they should alledge bastardie, either in king Edward himselfe, or in his children, or both. So that he should seme disabled to inherit the crowne, by the duke of Boke, and the prince by him.

To late bastardie in king Edward, sounded open-lie to the rebuke of the protector's owne mother, which was mother to them both; for in that point could be no other color, but to pretend that his owne mother was an aduresser, which notwithstanding, to further this purpose he letted not. But neuerthelesse he would that point should be lesse and more fauoura-ble handled: not euen fullie plaine and directlie, but that the matter should be touched aslope craftilie, as though men spared in that point to speake all the truth, for feare of his displeasure. But the other point concerning the ballardie that they deuised to surmise in king Edwards children, that would he should be openlie declared and enforced to the uttermost. The colour and pretext thereof cannot be well perceiued, but if we first repeat you some things long before done about king Edwards marriage.

So before
pag. 667, 668.

Dame Elizabeth Greie.

After that king Edward the fourth had deposed king Henrie the first, and was in peaceable possession of the realme, determining himselfe to marie (as it was met both for him selfe & the realme) he sent ouer in ambassage the erle of Warwike, with other noble men in his companie to Spaine, to treat & conclude a marriage betwene h. Edward & the kings daughter of Spaine. In which thing the erle of Warwike found the parties so toward & willing, that he speedily (according to his instructions without any difficultie) brought the matter to very good conclusion. Now happened it, that in the meane season there came to make a sute by petition to the king dame Elizabeth Greie, which was after his quene, at that time a widow, borne of noble blood, by hir mother, duchess of Bedford, per she married the lord Woodville, hir father.

Howbeit, this dame Elizabeth hir selfe, being in seruice with quene Margaret, wife vnto king Henrie the first, was married vnto one [John] Greie an esquier, whome king Henrie made knight vpon the field that he had on [Batnet heath by saint Albons] against king Edward. But little while insoied he that knight hood: for he was at the same field slaine. After which done, and the erle of Warwike, being in his ambassage about the afore remembred marriage, this poore ladie made humble sute vnto the king, that she might be restored vnto such small lands as hir late husband had giuen hir in iointure. Whome when the king beheld, and heard hir speake, as she was both faire and of a goodlie fauor, moderate of stature, well made, and verie wise: he not onelie pitied hir, but also was enamoured of hir. And taking hir afterward secretlie aside, began to enter in talking more familiarlie. Whose appetite when she perceiued, she vertuously denied him.

If wife and

But that did she so wisely, and with so good manner, and words so well set, that she rather kindled his desire than quenched it. And finally, after manie a meeting, much wooing, and many great promises, she well espies the kings affection toward hir so greatly increased, that she durst somewhat the more boldly saie hir mind, as to him whose hart she perceiued more seruientlie set, than to fall off for a word. And in conclusion, she shewed him plaine, that as she wist hir selfe too simple to be his wife, so thought she hir selfe too good to be his concubine. The king much maruelling at hir constancie (as he that had not been wont elsewhere to be so stiffelie said naie) so much esteemed hir continencie and chastitie, that he set hir vertue in the stead of possession and riches: and thus taking counsell of his desire, determined in all possible hast to marie hir.

The kings
mother.

Now after he was thus appointed, and had bestowed them twaine inured hir: then asked he counsell of his other friends, and that in such manner, as they might then perceiue it bored not greatly to say naie. Notwithstanding the duchess of Poike his mother was so fore moued therewith, that she dissuaded the marriage as much as she possible might; alledging that it was his honour, profit, and suertie also, to marie in a noble progenie out of his realme, where vpon depended great strength to his estate, by the affinity and great possibilitie of increase of his possession. And that he could not well otherwise do, seeing that the erle of Warwike had so farre moued already: which were not likelie to take it well, if all his voyage were in such wise frustrate, and his appointment deluded. And she said also, that it was not princelie to marie his owne subject, no great occasion leading thereto, no possessions, or other commodities depending thereupon; but onlie as it were a rich man that would marie his maid, onelie for a little wanton dosage vpon hir person.

In which marriage manie mo commend the maidens fortune, than the maisters wisdom. And yet therein (she said) was more honestie than honour in this marriage. For so much as there is betwene no merchant and his owne maid so great difference, as betwene the king and this widow. In whose person, albeit there was nothing to be mistak; yet was there (she said) nothing so excellent, but that it might be found in diuerse other that were more meilie (quoth she) for your estate, and maidens also; whereas the onelie widowhead of Elizabeth Greie, though she were in all other things conuenient for you, should yet suffice (as me seemeth) to restraime you from hir marriage, sith it is an vniuersall thing, and a verie blamish and high disparagement to the sacred maiestie of a prince, that ought as nigh to approach priesthood in cleanness as he doth in dignitie, to be defiled with bigamie in his first marriage.

The king, when his mother had said, made hir answer, part in earnest, part in plaie merilic, as he that wist himselfe out of hir rule. And albeit he would gladlie that she should take it well, yet was at a point in his owne mind, toke she it well or otherwise. Howbeit somewhat to satiffie hir, he said, that albeit marriage (being a spirituall thing) ought rather to be made for the respect of God, where his grace inclineth the parties to loue together, as he trusted it was in his, than for the regard of anie temporall aduantage: yet neuerthelesse, him seemed that this marriage, euen wooldie considered, was not vnpassible. For he reckoned the amitie of no earthlie nation so necessarie for him, as the friendship of his owne, which he thought likelie to beate him so much the more hartie fauour, in that he disdeined not to marie with one of his owne land.

And yet if outward alliance were thought to requisite, he would find the means to enter therein, much better by other of his kin, where all the parties could be contented, than to marie himselfe whome he should happlie neuer loue; and for the possibilitie of more possessions, lese the fruit and pleasure of this that he had already. For small pleasure taketh a man of all that euer he hath beside, if he be vnto against his appetite. And I doubt not (quoth he) but there be (as ye say) other, that be in euerie point comparable with hir. And therefore I let not them that like them to wed them. So more is it reason, that it mislike anie man, that I marie where it liketh me. And I am sure that my coufine of Warwike neither loueth me so little, to grudge at that I loue; nor is so vnreasonable, to looke that I should in chosse of a wife, rather be ruled by his eie, than by mine owne: as though I were a ward that were bound to marie by the appointment of a gardian.

I would not be a king with that condition, to forebrace mine owne libertie in chosse of mine owne marriage. As for possibilitie of more inheritance by new affinity in strange lands, is oft the occasion of more trouble than profit. And we haue already title by that means vnto so much, as sufficeth to get and keepe well in one mans daies. That she is a widow, and hath already children; by Gods blessed ladie, I am a bachelor, and haue some too, and so ech of vs hath a profe that neither of vs is like to be barren. And therefore (madame) I prae you be content. I trust in God she shall bring forth a young prince that shall please you. And as for the bigamie, let the bishop hardlie laie it in my wate when I come to take orders. For I vnderstand it is forbidden a prest, but I neuer wist it yet, that it was forbidden a prince.

[This spake he as alluding to the libertie of princes, whose last standeth oftentimes for law, and their opti-mon for reason, according to the saying of the poet ;

tunc omnia tenebris, Cum poteris rex esse.]

The duchess with these words nothing appeased, and saying the king so set thereon, that she could not pull him backe, so highlie she disdaind it, that vnder pretext of hir dutie to Godward, she denieth to disturbe this marriage, and rather to helpe that he should marie one dame Elizabeth Lucie, whome the king had also not long before gotten with child. Wherefore the kinges mother openlie objected against his marriage, as it were in discharge of hir conscience, that the king was sure to dame Elizabeth Lucie and hir husband before God. By reason of which words, such obstacle was made in the matter, that either the bishoppes durst not, or the king would not proceed to the solemnization of this wedding, till these same were clearlie purged, and the truth well and openlie testified. Whereupon dame Elizabeth Lucie was then sent for.

And albeit that she was by the kings mother and manie other put in good comfort, to affirme that she was ensured unto the king: yet when she was solemnlie sworn to saie the truth, she confessed that they were neuer ensured. Wherupon she said his grace spake so loving words vnto hir, that the verelie hope he would haue married hir. And that if it had not bene for such kind words, she would neuer haue shewed such kindnesse to him, to let him so kindlie get hir with child. This examination solemnlie taken, when it was clerelie perceined, that there was none impediment: the king with great feast and honourable solemnitie married dame Elizabeth Lucie, and hir crowned quene that was his enemies wife, and manie times had praised full hartlie for his loffe, in which God loued hir better than to grant hir hir bounce.

But when the earle of Marwarke vnderstood of this marriage, he took it so highlie that his ambas-sage was deluded, that for verie anger and disdain he (at his returning) assembled a great puissance against the king, and came so fast vpon him yer he could be able to resist, that he was faine to void the realme, and flee into Holland for succor, where he remained for the space of two yeares, leauing his new wife at Westmister in sanctuary, where she was delivered of Edward the prince, of whome we before haue spoken. In which meane time the earle of Mar-warke took out of prison, and set by againe king Henrie the first, who was before by king Edward deposed, and that much what by the power of the earle of Marwarke, which was a wise man, and a couragi-ous warrour, and of such strength, what for his lands, his alliance, and fauor with all people, that he made kings and put downe kings almost at his pleasure, and not impossible to haue attained it himselfe, if he had not reckoned it a greater thing to make a king than to be a king.

But nothing lasteth alwaie: for in conclusion, king Edward returned, and with much lesse number than he had at Barnet on the Easterdaie field, slue the earle of Marwarke, with manie other great estates of that partie, & so stable attained the crowne againe, that he peaceablie entoid it vntill his deing daie: and in such plight left it, that it could not be lost but by the discord of his verie friends, & falshood of his feined friends. I haue rehearsed this businesse about this marriage somewhat the more at length, because it might thereby the better appeare, vpon how slippie a ground the protector builded his colour, by which he pretended king Edwards children to be bastards. But that inuention, simple as it was, it liked them to whome it sufficed to haue somewhat to saie, while they were sure to be compelled to no larger profe than themselves list to make.

Now then (as I began to shew you) it was by the protector and his counsell concluded, that this doctor Shato should in a sermon at Pauls crosse signifie to the people, that neither king Edward himselfe, nor the duke of Clarence, were lawfullie begotten, nor were not the verie children of the duke of York, but gotten unlawfullie by other persons, in adulterie, of the duchess their mother. And that also dame Elizabeth Lucie was verelie the wife of king Edward, and so the prince and all his children bastards, that were begotten vpon the quene. According to this deuise doctor Shato the fundaie after, at Pauls crosse in a great audience (as alwaie assembled great number to his preaching) he took for his theame; Spuria vitilamina non agent radices altas, that is to saie; Bastard slippes shall neuer take deepe root.

Thereupon when he had shewed the great grace that God giueth, and secretlie insundeth in right generation after the lawes of matrimonie, then declared he, that commonlie those children lacked that grace, and for the punishment of their parents were (for the more part) vnhappie, which were gotten in base, and speciallie in adulterie. Of which, though some, by the ignorance of the world and the truth hid from knowledge, inherited for the season other mens lands, yet God alwaie so prouideth, that it continueth not in their blood long: but the truth comming to light, the rightfull inheritors be restored, and the bastard slipp pulled by per it can be rooted dape. And so he did laie for the profe and confirmation of this sentence certaine insamples taken out of the old testament, and other ancient histories.

When began he to descend into the praise of the lord Richard late duke of Yorke, calling him father to the lord protector, and declared the title of his heires vnto the crowne, to whome it was (after the death of king Henrie the first) intailed by authoritie of parte-ment. Then shewed he that his verie right heire of his bodie lawfullie begotten was onelie the lord protector. For he declared then, that king Edward was neuer lawfullie married vnto the quene, but was before God husband vnto dame Elizabeth Lucie, and so his children bastards. And besides that, neither king Edward himselfe, nor the duke of Clarence, among those that were secret in the household, were reckoned verie suerlie for the children of the noble duke, as those that by their fauours more resembled other knowne men than him. From whose vertuous conditions he said also that the late king Edward was far off.

But the lord protector he said, the verie noble prince, the speciall paterne of knightlie provelse, as well in all princelie behauor, as in the lineaments and fauour of his visage, represented the verie face of the noble duke his father. This is, quoth he, the fathers owne figure, this is his owne countenance, the verie print of his visage, the sure vndoubted image, the plaine expresse likenesse of that noble duke.
Now was it before denieth, that in the speaking of these words, the protector should haue commin in among the people to the sermon ward, to the end that those words meeting with his presence, might haue ben taken among the hearers, as though the Holie ghost had put them in the preachers mouth, & should haue moued the people euen there to crie; King Richard, king Richard: that it might haue bene after said, that he was speciallie chosen by God, and in maner by miracle. But this deuise quailed, either by the protectors negligence, or the preacher's ouermuch diligence.

It Richard commanded by the preacher.

For while the protector found by the waie tarieng least he should preuent those words, and the doctor fearing that he should come per his sermon could come to these words, hastned his matter the reso, he was come to them and past them, and entred into other matters per the protector came. Whome when he beheld comming, he suddenlie left the matter with which he was in hand, and without anie deduction therevnto, out of all order and out of all frame, began to repeat those words againe: This is the verie noble prince, the speciall patrone of knightlie prowesse, which as well in all princelie behauioz, as in the lineaments & fauor of his visage, representeth the verie face of the noble duke of Yorke his father: this is the fathers owne figure, this is his owne countenance, the verie print of his visage, the sure vndoubted image, the plaine expresse likenesse of the noble duke, whose remembrance can neuer die while he liueth.

Note & course of Gods
iudgement.

While these words were in speaking, the protector accompanied with the duke of Buckingham, went through the people into the place where the doctors commonlie stand in the vpper storie, where he stood to hearken the sermon. But the people were so saure from cring; R. Richard, that they stood as they had bene turned into stones, for wonder of this shamefull sermon. After which once ended, the preacher gat him home, and neuer after durst looke out for shame, but kept him out of sight like an owle. And when he once asked one that had bene his old friend what the people talked of him, all were it that his owne conscience well shewed him that they talked no good; yet when the tother answered him, that there was in euerie mans mouth spoken of him much shame, it so strake him to the heart, that within few daies after he withered and consumed awaie [for verie thought and inward pine, procured by irreuerable cares, whose nature is noted by obseruation of their effects: 40

Ouid. lib. 3. met.

Attendant vigilis corpus miserabile curat.

Then on the tuesday following this sermon, there came to the Guildhall in London the duke of Buckingham, accompanied with diuerse lords and knights mo than haplie knew the message that they brought. And there in the east end of the hall, where the maioz keepeth the Hustings, the maioz and all the aldermen being assembled about him, all the commons of the citie gathered before them. After silence commanded vpon great paine in the protectors name: the duke stood vp, and (as he was neither vblearned, and of nature maruelouslie well spoken) he said vnto the people with a cleare and lowd voice in this maner of wise.

The duke of Buckingham's oration to the assemblie of the maior, aldermen, and commoners.

Friends, for the zeale and heartie fauour that we beare you, we be comen to breake vnto you of a matter right great and weightie, and no lesse weightie than pleasing to God, and profitable to all the realme: noz to no part of the realme more profitable, than to you the citizens of this noble citie. For whie, that thing that we wote well ye haue long time lacked, and sore longed for, that ye would haue giuen great good for, that ye would haue gone farre to fetch; that thing we be come hither to bring you without your labour, paine, cost, aduen- 50

ture or leopardie. What thing is that? Certes the suertie of your owne bodies, the quiet of your wiues and your daughters, the safegard of your goods: of all which things in times past ye stood euermore in doubt. For who was there of you all, that would reckon himselfe lord of his own goods among so manie greins & traps as was set therfore; among so much pil-ling and polling, among so manie taxes and tallages, of which there was neuer end, & oftentimes no need: Or if anie were, it rather grew of riot, and vnableasonable wast, than anie necessarie or honouable charge.

So that there was daillie pulled fro good men and honest, great substance of goods, to be lashed out among vnthrifts; so far forth, that fifteen sufficed not, noz anie vniuersall names of knowen taxes: but vnder an easie name of beneuolence and good will, the commissioners so much of euerie man toke as no man could with his good will haue giuen. As though that name of beneuolence had signified, that euerie man should paie, not what himselfe of his owne good will list to grant, but what the king of his good will list to take. Which neuer asked little, but euerie thing was halued aboue the measure, ameracements turned into fines, fines into ransoms, small trespasses into mispison, mispison into treason. Whereof (I thinke) no man looketh that we should remember you of examples by name, as though Burdet were forgotten, that was for a word spoken in hast cruelle beheaded, by the misconstruing of the laws of this realme, for the princes pleasure.

With no lesse honour to Markham then chiefe iustice, that left [the benefit & dignitie] of his office, rather than he would assent to the dishonestie of those, that either for feare or flatterie gaue that iudgement. What Coke, your owne worshipfull neighbour, alderman and maior of this noble citie, who is of you so either negligent that he knoweth not, or so forgetfull that he remembreth not, or so hard hearted that he pittiebeth not that worshipfull mans losse: What speake we of losse? His better spoile and vnderferued destruction, onelie for that it hapned those to fauour him whome the prince fauoured not. We need not (I suppose) to rehearse of these anie mo by name, sith there be (I doubt not) manie here present, that either in themselves or in their nigh friends haue knowen, as well their goods as their persons greatlie endangered, either by feigned quarels, or small matters aggroued with heinous names. And also there was no crime so great, of which there could lacke a pretext.

For sith the king, preuenting the time of this inheritance, attained the crowne by battell: it sufficed in a rich man for a pretext of treason, to haue borne of kindred or alliance, neer familiaritie, or legier acquaintance with anie of those that were at anie time time the kings enemies, which was at one time and other more than halfe the reigne.

Thus were neither your goods in suertie, and yet they brought your bodie in ieoparchie, beside the common aduenture of open warre, which albeit that it is euer the will and occasion of much mischæfe, yet is it neuer so mischæuous, as where any people fall at distance among themselves; nor in none earthlie nation so deadlie and so pestilent, as when it hapneth among vs, and among vs neuer so long continued dissention, nor so manie batels in that season, nor so cruell and so deadlie fought, as was in that kings daies that dead is, God forgiue it his soule.

In whose time, and by whose occasion, what about the getting of the garland, hæping it, læsing and winning againe, it hath cost more English blood, than hath twise the winning of France. In which inward war among our selues, hath bene so great effusion of the ancient noble blood of this realme, that scarce the halfe remaineth, to the great infæbling of this noble land, beside manie a good tobone ransacked and spoiled by them, that haue bene going to the field or comming from thence.
And peace long after not much surer than war. So that no time was therein, which rich men for their monie, and great men for their lands, or some other for some feare, or some displeasure were not out of perill, for whom trusted he that mistrusted his owne brother: Whome spared he that killed his owne brother: Or who could perfectlie loue him, if his owne brother could not?

What maner of folke he most fauoured we shall for his honour spare to speake of.
Howbeit this wore you well all, that who so was best, bare alwaie least rule; & more sute was in his daies to Shores wife, a byle and an abhominable strumpet, than to all the lords in England: except vnto those that made hir their protector. Which simple woman was well named & honest, till the king for his wanton lust and sinfull affection bereft hir from hir husband, a right honest substantiall yong man among you. And in that point, which in god faith I am sozie to speake of, sauing that it is in baine to kepe in counsell that thing that all men know, the kings grædie appetite was insatiable, and euerie where ouer all the realme intollerable.

For no woman was there anie where, yong or old, rich or poore, whome he set his eye vpon, in whome he anie thing liked, either person or fauour, speech, pale, or countenance, but without anie feare of God, or respect of his honour, murmur or grudge of the world, he would importunelie pursue his appetite, and haue hir, to the great destruction of manie a good woman, and great dolor to their husbands, and their other friends, which being honest people of them selues, so much regard the cleanness of their house, the chastitie of their wiues, and their children, that they were leauer to læse all that they had beside, than to haue such a villanie done them. And all were it that with this and other importa-ble dealing, the realme was in euerie part annoied: yet speciallie ye here the citizens of this noble citie, as well for that a-mongest you is most plentie of all such things as minister matter to such iniuries as for that you were nearest at hand, with that nere hereabouts was commonlie his most abiding.

And yet he ye the people, to whome he had as singular cause well and kindlie to in-treat, as anie part of his realme; not one-lie for that the prince (by this noble citie, as his speciall chamber, & the speciall well renowned citie of this realme) much honourable fame receiueth among all other nations: but also for that ye (not without your great cost, & sundrie perils & ieoparchie in all his warres) bare euen your speciall fauor to his part. Which your kind minds bozne to the house of Poike, with hath nothing worthilie acquitted, there is of that house that now by Gods grace better shall: which thing to shew you is the whole summe and effect of this our present errand. It shall not (I wot well) need that I rehearse you againe, that ye haue alreadie heard of him that can better tell it, and of whome I am sure ye will better beleue it. And reason is that it so be.

I am not so proud, to loke therfore that ye should reckon my words of as great au-thoritie as the preachers of the word of God, namlie a man so cunning and so wise, that no man better woteth what he should saie, and thereto so good and vertuous, that he would not saie the thing which he wist he should not saie, in the pulpit namelie, into the which no honest man commeth to lie. Which honozable preacher, ye well remember, substantiallie declared vnto you at Paules crosse, on sundaie last pasted, the right & title that the most excellent prince Richard duke of Glocester, now protector of this realme, hath vnto the crowne and kingdome of the same. For as the worship-full man groundlie made open vnto you, the children of king Edward the fourth were neuer lawfullie begotten, forsomuch as the king (leauing his verie wife dame Elizabeth Lucie) was neuer lawfullie maried vnto the quene their mother, whose blood, sauing that he set his voluptuous pleasure before his honor, was full bnmætlie to be matched with his; and the mingling of whose blouds together, hath bene the effusion of a great part of the noble bloud of this realme.

Wherby it may well seme the mariage not well made, of which there is so much mischæfe growne. For lacke of which law-full coupling, & also of other things which the said worshipfull doctoz rather signified than fullie explained, & which things shall not be spoken for me, as the thing wherein eth in auoiding displeasure of my noble lord protector, bearing (as nature requirerth) a fullall reuerence to the duchesse his mother.

For these causes (I say) before remembred, that is to wit, for lacke of other issue law-fullie of the late noble prince Richard duke of Yorke, to whose roiall blood the crowne of England and of France is by the high authoritie of parlement intailed, the right and title of the same is by the iust course of inheritance (according to the comon lawes of the land) deuolued & comen vnto the most excellent prince the lord protector, as to the verie lawfullie begotten sonne of the fore remembred noble duke of Yorke.

Which thing well considered, and the great knightlie prowesse pondered, with manifold vertues, which in his noble person singularlie abound; the nobles and commons also of this realme, and speciallie of the north part, not willing anie bastard blood to haue the rule of the land, nor the abusions before in the same bled anie longer to continue, haue condescended and ful-lie determined, to make humble petition to the most puissant prince the lord protector, that it maie like his grace (at our humble request) to take vpon him the guiding and gouernance of this realme, to the wealth and increafe of the same, according to his verie right and iust title. Which thing I wote it well, he will be loth to take vpon him, as he whose wisdom well perceiueth the laboz and studie both of mind and bodie, that come therewith, to whomsoever so will occupie the come, as I dare say he will, if he take it. Which come I warne you well is no childes office. And that the great wise man well perceiued, when he said: Veregno cuius rex puer est: Wo is that realme that hath a child to their king.

The dignitie and office of a king full of care & studie.

Wherefore so much the more cause haue we to thanke God, that this noble personage, which is so rightlie intituled therun-to, is of so sad age, & thereto so great wise-dome ioined with so great experience, which albeit he will be loth (as I haue said) to take it vpon him, yet shall he to our petition in that behalfe more gracioullie incline, if ye the worshipfull citizens of this the chiefe citie of this realme, ioine with vs the nobles in our said request. Which for your owne weale (we doubt not) but ye will: and nathelesse I heartlie pray you so to do, whereby you shall do great profit to all this realme beside, in choosing them so good a king, and vnto your selues speciall commoditie, to whom his maiestie shall e-uer after beare so much the more tender fauor, in how much he shall perceiue you the more prone and beneuolentlie minded toward his election. Wherin deere friends what mind you haue, we require you plainlie to shew vs.

When the duke had said, and looked that the people, whome he hoped that the maioz had framed before, should after this proposition made, haue cried; King Richard, king Richard; all was hush and mute, and not one word answered therunto. Wherewith the duke was maruellouslie abashed, and taking the maioz nerrer to him, with other that were about him prieue to that matter, said vnto them looke. What meaneth this, that the people be so still? Sir (quoth the maioz) percase they perceiue you not well. That shall we mend (quoth he) if that will helpe. And by this somewhat louder he reherced to them the same matter againe in other order, and other words, so well and ornatlie, and nathelesse so euidentlie and plaine, with voice, gesture, and countenance so comelie, and so conuenient, that euerie man much marvelled that heard him, and thought that they neuer had in their liues heard so euill a tale so well told (inso much that he seemed as cunning an orator, as he, of whome the poet spake to his high praise & comendation, saleng:

Quilibet eloquio causa fit apta suo.

But were it for wonder or feare, or that each looked that other should speake first: not one word was there answered of all the people that stood before, but all was as still as the midnight, not so much as roynning amongst them, by which they might seme to commune what was best to do. When the maioz saw this, he with other partners of that counsell drew about the duke, and said that the people had not bene accustomed there to be spoken vnto, but by the recorder, which is the mouth of the citie, and hapilie to him they will answer. Whith that the recorder, called Fitz William, a sad man, & an honest, which was so new come into that office, that he neuer had spoken to the people before, and loth was with that matter to begin, notwithstanding therunto commanded by the maioz, made rehearfall to the commons of that the duke had thus rehearsed to them himselfe.

But the recorder so tempered his tale, that he shewed euerie thing as the dukes words, and no part his owne. But all this nothing no change made in the people, which alwaie after one stood as they had bene men amazed. Wherevpon the duke coloured vnto the maioz and said; This is a maruellous obstinate oblence: and therewith he turned vnto the people againe with these words; Deere friends, we come to moue you to that thing, which peradventure we not so greatlie needed, but that the lords of this realme, and the commons of other parties might haue sufficed, sauing that we such loue beare you, and so much set by you, that we would not gladlie do without you, that thing in which to be partners is your weale and honor, which (as it seemeth) either you see not, or weie not. Wherefore we require you giue vs an swer one way or other, whether you be minded, as all the nobles of the realme be, to haue this noble prince, now protector, to be your king or not.

At these words the people began to whisper among themselves secretly, that the voice was neither loud nor distinct, but as it were the sound of a swarime of bees, till at the last in the nether end of the hall, an ambushment of the dukes seruants and halberds, and other belonging to the protector, with some priuties and lads that thrust into the hall amongst the people, began suddenly at mens backs to crie out, as loud as their throates would giue; King Richard, king Richard: and threw vp their caps in token of ioy. And they that stood before, cast backe their heads maruellling therof, but nothing they said. Now when the duke and the maioz saw this manner, they wiselie turned it to their purpose, and said it was a godlie crie, & a ioisfull, to heare euerie man with one voice, no man saleng nate.

Wherefore friends (quoth the duke) sith we per-ceiue it is all your whole minds to haue this noble man for your king (whereof we shall make his grace so effectuell report, that we doubt not but it shall redound vnto your great weale and commoditie) we require ye, that ye to morrow go with vs, and we with you vnto his noble grace, to make our humble request vnto him in maner befoze remembred. And therewith the lordes came downe, and the companie dissolved and departed, the moze part all sad: some with glad semblance that were not verie metrie, and some of those that came thither with the duke not able to dissemble their sorrow, were faine at his backe to turne their face to the wall, while the dolor of their hearts burst out of their eyes.

The moztos coming to Bernards castell vnto the protector.

Then on the morrow after, the maior with all the aldermen, and chiefe commoners of the citie, in their best maner apparelled, assembling themselves togither, resorted vnto Walsnarde castell, where the protector late. To which place repaired also (according to their appointment) the duke of Buckingham, and diuerse noble men with him, beside manie knights and other gentlemen. And thereupon the duke sent word vnto the lord protector, of the being there of a great and honourable companie, to moue a great matter vnto his grace. Whereupon the protector made difficultie to come out vnto them, but if he first knew some part of their errand, as though he doubted and partly mistrusted the coming of such a number vnto him so suddenlie, without anie warning or knowledge, whether they came for good or harme.

Then the duke, when he had shewed this to the maior and other, that they might thereby see how little the protector looked for this matter, they sent vnto him by the messenger such louing message againe, and therewith so humble besought him, to vouchsafe that they might resort to his presence to propose their intent, of which they would vnto none other person anie part disclose; that at the last he came forth of his chamber, and yet not downe vnto them, but stood above in a gallerie ouer them, where they might see him, and speake to him, as though he would not yet come too nere them till he wist what they ment. And therupon the duke of Buckingham first made humble petition vnto him on the behalfe of them all, that his grace would pardon them, and licence them to propose vnto his grace the intent of their coming, without his displeasure, without which pardon obtained, they durst not be bold to moue him of that matter.

In which albeit they ment as much honor to his grace, as wealth to all the realme beside, yet were they not sure how his grace would take it, whome they would in no wise offend. When the protector (as he was verie gentle of himselfe, and also longed sore to wit what they ment) gaue him leaue to propose what him liked, verelie trusting (for the good mind that he bare them all) none of them anie thing would intend vnto himward, wherewith he ought to be grieved. When the duke had this leaue and pardon to speake, then wared he bold to shew him their intent and purpose, with all the causes mouing them thereto (as ye befoze haue heard) and finally to beseech his grace, that it would like him, of his accustomed goodnesse and zeale vnto the realme, now with his eye of pitie to behold the long continued distresse and decaye of the same, and to set his gracions hands to redresse and amendment thereof.

All which he might well do, by taking vpon him the crowne and gouernance of this realme, according to his right and title lawfullie descended vnto him, and to the land of God, profit of the land, & vnto his noble grace so much the moze honour, and lesse paine, in that, that neuer prince reigned vpon anie people, that were so glad to liue vnder his obediense, as the people of this realme vnder his. When the protector had heard the proposition, he looked verie strangelie thereat, and answered: that all were it that he part-lie knew the things by them alledged to be true; yet such entire loue he bare vnto king Edward and his children, that so much moze regarded his honour in other realmes about, than the crowne of anie one of which he was neuer desirous, that he could not find in his hart in this point to incline to their desire. For in all other nations, where the truth were not well knowne, it should peraduenture be thought, that it were his owne ambitious mind and deuise, to depose the prince, and take himselfe the crowne.

With which infamie he would not haue his honour stained for anie crowne, in which he had euer perceiued much moze labour and paine, than pleasure to him that so would vse it, as he that would not, were not worthy to haue it. Notwithstanding, he not onlie pardoned them the motion that they made him, but also thanked them for the loue and hartie fauour they bare him, praiseng them for his sake to giue and beare the same to the prince, vnder whom he was, and would be content to liue, and with his labour and counsell (as farre as should like the king to vse him) he would do his uttermost deuoir to set the realme in good state, which was already in this little while of his protectorship (the praise giuen to God) well begun, in that the malice of such as were before occasion of the contrarie, and of new intended to be, were now partlie by god policie, & partlie moze by Gods speciall prouidence, than mans prouision, repressed.

Upon this answer giuen, the duke by the protectors licence, a little rownded aswell with other noble men about him, as with the maior and recorder of London. And after that (vpon like pardon desired & obtained) he shewed aloud vnto the protector, that for a small conclusion, that the realme was appointed R. Edwards line should not anie longer reigne vpon them, both for that they had so farre gone, that it was now no suertie to retreat, as for that they thought it for the weake vniuersall to take that waie, although they had not yet begun it. Wherefore, if it would like his grace to take the crowne vpon him, they would humble beseech him thereto. If he would giue them a resolute answer to the contrarie, which they would be loth to heare, then must they needs seeke and should not faile to find some other noble man that would. These words much moued the protector, which else (as euerie man may well) would neuer of likelihood haue inclined thereto.

But when he saw there was none other waie, but that either he must take it, or else he and his both go from it, he said vnto the lordes and commons: With we perceiue well that all the realme is so set, thereof we be verie sorie, that they will not suffer in any wise king Edwards line to gouerne them, whom no man earthly can gouerne against their willes; & we well also perceiue, that no man is there, to whome the crowne can by iust title apperteine, as to our selues, as verie right here lawfully begotten of the bodie of our most deere father Richard late duke of Yorke, to which title is now ioined your election, the nobles and commons of this realme, which we of all titles possible take for the most effectual: we be content and a gré sauourable to incline to your petition and request, and (according to the same) here we take vpon vs the rofall estate, preheminentie and kingdome of the two noble realmes, England and France: the one from this date forward by vs and our heires to rule, gouerne, and defend; the other by Gods grace, and your good helpe, to get againe and subdue, and establish for ener in due obedience vnto this realme of England, the aduancement wherof we neuer aske of God longer to liue than we intend to procure.

With this there was a great shout, crying: King Richard, king Richard. And then the lordes went by to the the king (for so was he from that time called) and the people departed, talking diuersie of the matter, euerie man as his fantasie gaue him. But much they talked and marvelled of the maner of this dealing, that the matter was on both parts made so strange, as though neither had euer communed with other thereof before, when that themselves wist there was no man so dull that heard them, but he perceiued well enough that all the matter was made betwene them. Wholpelt some excused that againe, and said all must be done in good order though: and men must sometime for the maners sake, not be aknownen what they know though it be hard to outreach the circumstance, tosse, & bigilant minded man; as the poet saith:

non facile est tibi

Decipere vlysem.]

For at the consecration of a bishop, euerie man woteth well by the pateng for his bails, that he purpo-seth to be one, & though he pale for nothing else. And yet must he be twise asked whether he will be bishop or no, and he must twise saie naie, and the thirde time take it, as compelled thereunto by his owne will. And in a stage plaie, all the people know right well, that one plaing the Solban, is percase a solter; yet if one should can so little god, to shew out of season what acquaintance he hath with him, and call him by his owne name while he standeth in his maiestie, one of his tormentors might hap to breake his head (and worthis) for marring of the plaie. And so they said, that these matters be kings games, as it were stage plates, and for the moze part plated upon scaffolds, in which poze men be but the lookers on. And they that tosse he will meddle no further. For they that sometime step bp, and plaie with them, when they can not plaie their parts, they disorder the plaie, and do themselves no good.

Thus farre Edward the fift, who was neuer king crowned, but shamefullie by his vncke slaine, as in the proceffe following appeereth.

Richard the third, third sonne to Richard duke of Yorke, and vncke to Edward the fift.

() This that marke () was not written by maister More in this hystorie written by him in Englisch, but is translated out of this historie which he wrote in Latine.

The next daie the protector, with a great traine went to Westminster hall, & there when he had placed himselfe in the court of the kings bench, declared to the audience, that he would take upon him the crowne in that place there, where the king himselfe sitteth and ministrereth the law, because he considered that it was the chiefest dutie of a king to minister the lawes. When with as pleasant an oration as he could, he went about to win vnto him the nobles, the merchants, the artificers, and in conclusion all kind of men, but especiallie the lawiers of this realme. And finally, to the intent that no man should hate him for feare, and that his deceitfull clemencie might get him the good will of the people, when he had declared the discommodities of discord, & the comodities of concord & vnite, he made an open proclamation, that he did put out of his mind all enimities, and that he there did openlie pardon all offenses committed against him.

And to the intent that he might shew a pzoofe thereof, he commanded that one fog, whom he had long deadlie hated, should be brought then before him, who being brought out of the sanctuarie (for thither had he fled for feare of him) in the sight of the people, he took him by the hand. Which thing the common people reioysed at, and praised, but wise men took it for a banitie. In his returne homeward, whom so euer he met, he saluted. For a mind that knoweth it selfe guiltie, is in a manner defected to a seruile flatterie (which refuseth no dutifullnesse, tend the same to neuer to vie a degree of indignitie; which one noteth, saing:

Concussur; flet, si lachrymas affexit amici;

Frigeris? friger; si dixeris, affusio sudat.]

When he had begun his reigne in the moneth of June, after this mockish election, then was he crowned king in the verie same moneth. And that sollemnitie was furnished, for the most part, with the selfe same pouison that was appointed for the coronation of his nephew. (*) But here to shew the maner of his coronation, as the same is inserted in this pamphlet of sir Thomas More, by maister Edward Hall and Richard Grafton (although not found in the same pamphlet) thus we find it by them reported.

(*) First, to be sure of all enemies (as he thought) he sent for fve thousand men of the north against his coronation, which came by euill apparelled, and worse harnessed, in russe harnesse, neither defensible, nor scotized to the sale, which mustered in ffinsthorpe field to the great disdain of the lookers on. By which be- grinning it appeared to the world that he had his state in suspition, otherwisse he would not haue procured such a power to be attendant at his commandment, and that at such time as (all weapons laid aside) peace and tranquillitie should haue bene sought after for the comforts of the peoples minds, & the safetie of his owne person; but being verie mistrustfull & fraught with careful thoughts, he was in a mize betwene hope and feare, according to this verie true saing:

On the morowe, being the first daie of Iulie, the 10 king with quene Anne his wife, came downe out of the White hall into the great hall at Westminster, and went directlie into the kings Bench. And from thence, the king and the quene going vpon raise cloth barefooted, went vnto saint Edwards shrine, and all his nobilitie going with him, euerie loe in his degre. And first went the trumpets, and then the heralds of armes in their rich coats, & next followed the crosse with a solemne procession, the priests having fine surplices and graie amisses vpon them.
 20 The abbats and bishops mitred and in rich copes, & euerie of them carried their crossiers in their hands.
 The bishop of Rochester bare the crosse before the cardinall. Then followed the earle of Huntington bearing a paire of gilt spurres, signifying knightshood.
 Then followed the earle of Bedford bearing saint Edwards staffe for a relike.

After them came the earle of Northumberland bare-headed, with the pointlesse sword naked in his hand, which signified mercie. The lord Stanley bare the mace of the constablenesship. The earle of Kent bare the second sword on the right hand of the king naked, with a point, which signified iustice vnto the tempozalltie. The lord Louell bare the third sword on the left hand with a point, which signified iustice to the cleargie. The duke of Suffolke followed with the scepter in his hand, which signified peace. The earle of Lincolne bare the ball and crosse, which signified a monarchie. The erle of Surrie bare the fourth sword before the king in a rich scaberd, and that is called the sword of estate. Then went thre together, in the midst went Garter king: t armes in his rich cote: and on his left hand went the maio: of London, bearing a mace: and on his right hand went the gentleman bysher of the plynie chamber. Then followed the duke of Northfolke, bearing the kings crowne betweene his hands,

Then followed king Richard in his robes of purple beluēt, and ouer his head a canopie, borne by foure barons of the cinque ports. And on euerie side of the king there went one bishop, that is to saie, the bishop of Bath, and the bishop of Durham. Then followed the duke of Buckingham bearing the kings traine, with a white staffe in his hand, signifieng the office of the high steward of England. Then there followed a great number of earles and barons before the queene. And then came the earle of Huntington, who bare the queenes scepter, and the viscount Lisle bearing the rod with the dowe. And the earle of Wilshire bare the queenes crowne. Then followed queene Anne daughter to Richard earle of Warwicke in robes like to the king, betwene two bishops, and a canopie ouer his head borne by the barons of the ports. On his head a rich coronet set with stones and pearle.

After hit followed the countesse of Richmond heire to the duke of Summerfet, which bare by the queenes traine. After followed the duchesse of Suff-folke and Pozzfolke, with countesses, baronesses, ladies, and manie faire gentlewomen. In this order they passed through the palace, and entered the abbete at the west end; and so came to their seats of estate.
And after diuerse songs solemnelie song, they both ascended to the high altar, and were shifed from their robes, and had diuerse places open from the middle byward, in which places they were annoyned. Then both the king and the queene changed them into cloth of gold, and ascended to their seats, where the cardinal of Canturburie, & other bishops them crowned according to the custome of the realme, giuing him the scepter in the left hand, & the ball with the crose in the right hand; and the queene had the scepter in hir right hand, and the rod with the dove in hir left hand.

On euerie side of the king stood a duke, and before him stood the earle of Surrie with the sword in his hands. And on euerie side of the queene standing a bishop, & a ladie kneeling. The cardinal song masse, and after par, the king and the queene descended, and before the high altar they were both houseled, with one host dined betwene them. After masse finished, they both offered at saint Edward his shrine, and there the king left the crowne of saint Edward, and put on his owne crowne. And so in order as they came, they departed to Westminster hall; and so to their chambers for a season: during which time the duke of Norfolk came into the hall, his horse trapped to the ground in cloth of gold, as high marshall, and voided the hall. About foure of the clocke, the king and queene entered the hall, and the king sate in the middle, and the queene on the left hand of the table, and on euerie side of hir stood a countesse, holding a cloth of plectance, when the list to drinke.

And on the right hand of the king sat the bishop of Canturburie. The ladies sat all on one side, in the middle of the hall. And at the table against them sat the chancellor, and all the lords. At the table next the cupbard, sat the maior of London; and at the table behind the lords, sat the barons of the ports: and at the other tables sat noble and worshipfull personages. When all persons were set, the duke of Norfolk, earle marshall, the earle of Surrie, constable for that daie, the lord Stanlie lord steward, sir William Hopton treasurer, & sir Thomas Perse controller, came in and serued the king solemnly, with one dish of gold, and an other of silver, and the queene all in gilt vessel, and the bishop all in silver.

At the second course came into the hall sir Robert Dinmoke the kings champion, making proclamation, that whosoever would saie, that king Richard was not lawfull king, he would fight with him at the utterance, and threw downe his gantlet, and then all the hall cried, King Richard. And so he did in three parts of the hall, and then one brought him a cup of wine covered, and when he had drunke, he cast out the drinke, and departed with the cup. After that, the heralds cried a largesse thise in the hall, and so went by to their stage. At the end of dinner, the maior of London serued the king & queene with swete wine, and had of each of them a cup of gold, with a cover of gold. And by that time that all was done, it was darke night. And so the king returned to his chamber, and euerie man to his lodging.

A gale pretence of iustice and equitie.

When this feast was thus finished, the king sent home all the lords into their countries that would depart, except the lord Stanlie, whom he retained, till he heard what his sonne the lord Strange went about. And to such as went home, he gave stright charge and commandement, to see these countries well ordered, and that no wrong nor extortion should be done to his subiects. And thus he taught other to erecte iustice and equitie, the contrarie wherof he hadlly exercised. He also with great rewards giuen to the northermen, which he sent for to his coronation, sent them home to their countrie with great thanks: wherof diuerse of them (as they be all of nature verie greedie of authoritie, & speciallie when they thinke to haue anie comfort or fauour) toke on them to highlie, and wrought such miseries, that the king was faine to ride thither in his first yeare, and to put some in execution, and staie the countrie, or else no small mischeefe had ensued.

Not fell there mischeefe thicke. And as the thing euill gotten is neuer well kept, thorough all the time of his reigne neuer ceased there cruell death and slaughter, till his owne destruction ended it. But as he finished his time with the best death and the most righteous, that is to wit, his owne; so began he with the most pittious and wicked; I meane the lamentable murder of his innocent nephews, the young king and his tender brother: whose death and final fortune hath notwithstanding comen so farre in question, that some remaine yet in doubt, whether they were in his daies destroyed or no. Not for that onlie that Perkin Warbeck by manie folks malice, and mo folks folie, so long space abusing the world, was as well with princes as the poorer people reputed and taken for the younger of these two; but for that also that all things were in late daies so courtly demeaned, one thing pretended, and an other meant.

Insomuch that there was nothing so plaine and openlie proued, but that yet for the common custome of close and couert dealing, men had it euer inwardly suspect; as manie well counterfitted iewels make the true mistrusted. Whobbeit, concerning the opinion, with the occasions mouing either partie, we shall haue place more at large to intreat, if we hereafter happen to write the time of the late noble prince of famous memorie king Henrie the seauenth, or percase that historie of Perkin in anie compendious processe by it selfe. But in the meane time, for this present matter, I shall rehearse you the dolorous end of those babes, not after euerie waie that I haue heard, but after that waie that I haue so heard by such men and by such meanes, as me thinketh it were hard but it should be true.

King Richard after his coronation, taking his waie to Gloucester to visit (in his new honour) the towne of which he bare the name of his old, deuised (as he rode) to fulfill the thing which he before had intended. And sozomuch as his mind gaue him, that his nephews liuing, men would not reckon that he could haue right to the realme: he thought therefore without delaie to rid them, as though the killing of his kinsmen could amend his cause, and make him a kindle king. Whereupon he sent one John Grene, (whom he speciallie trusted) vnto sir Robert Wakenberie, constable of the Tower, with a letter and credence also, that the same sir Robert should in anie wise put the two children to death.

This John Grene did his errand vnto Wakenberie, kneeling before our ladie in the Tower. Who plainelie answered, that he would neuer put them to death to die therefore. With which answer John Grene returning, recounted the same to king Richard at Warwicke yet in his waie. Where with he toke such displeasure & thought, that the same night he said vnto a secret page of his: Ah! whom shall a man trust? Those that I haue brought by my selfe, those that I had went would most fuerlie serue me, euen those saile me, and at my commandement will do nothing for me. Sir (quoth his page) there lieth one on your pallet without, that I dare well saie, to do your grace pleasure, the thing were right hard that he would refuse. Meaning this by sir James Tirrell, which was a man of right goodlie personage, and for natures gifts worthe to haue serued a much better prince, if he had well serued God, and by grace obtained as much truth and good will as he had strength and wit.

The man had an high heart, & soze longed byward, not rising yet so fast as he had hoped, being hindered & kept vnder by the meanes of sir Richard Ratcliffe, and sir William Catesbie, which longing for no more partners of the princes favour; and namely, not for him, whose pride they wist would beare no peers, kept him by secret drifts out of all secret trust, which thing this page well had marked and knowne. Wherefore this occasion offered, of verie speciall friendship he took his time to put him forward, and by such wise do him good, that all the enemies he had (except the devil) could neuer have done him so much hurt. For upon this pages words king Richard arose (for this communication had he sitting at the draught, a convenient carpet for such a counsell) and came out into the pallet chamber, on which he found in bed sir James and sir Thomas Cirells, of person like, and brethren of blood, but nothing of kin in conditions.

Then said the king merilie to them; What sirs, be ye in bed so lone? And calling by sir James, brake to him secretlie his mind in this mischeuous matter. In which he found him nothing strange. Wherefore on the morow he sent him to Wakenberie with a letter, by which he was commanded to deliuer sir James all the keyes of the Tower for one night, to the end he might there accomplish the kings pleasure, in such things as he had given him commandement. After which letter deliuered, the keyes receiued, sir James appointed the night next ensuing to despoile them, dressing before and preparing the means. The prince (as some as the protectors left that name, and take himselfe as king) had it the woe to him, that he should not reigne, but his uncle should haue the crowne. At which word the prince foze abashed, began to sigh, and said: Alas, I would my uncle would let me haue my life yet, though I lese my kingdom.

Then he that told him the tale, bled him with good words, and put him in the best comfort he could. But forthwith was the prince and his brother both shut up, & all other remoued from them, onelie one (called Blacke Will, or William Slaughter) excepted, let to serue them and see them sure. After which time the prince neuer tied his points, nor ought rought of himselfe, but with that young babe his brother, lingers with thought and heavinesse, untill this traitorous death deliuered them of that wretchednesse. For sir James Cirell deuised, that they should be murdered in their beds. To the execution whereof, he appointed Miles Forrest, one of the four that kept them, a fellow fleshed in murder before time. To him he loined one John Dighton his owne horse keeper, a big, broad, square, and strong knaue.

Then all the other being remoued from them, this Miles Forrest, and John Dighton, about midnight (the selie children lieng in their beds) came into the chamber, & suddenlie lapping them by among the clothes, so to betrapped them and intangled them, heaping downe by force the feather-bed and pillowes hard onto their mouths, that within a while, smothered and stifled, their bzeath failing, they gaue vp to God their innocent soules into the ioies of heauen, leaving to the tormentors their bodies dead in the bed. Which after that the wretches percelued, first by the strugling with the paines of death, and after long lieng still, to be thoroughlie dead, they laid their bodies naked out upon the bed, and fetched sir James to see them; which upon the sight of them caused those murderers to burie them at the faire foot, maillie dape in the ground, under a great heape of stones.

Then rode sir James in great hast to king Richard, and shewed him all the manner of the murder; who gaue him great thanks, and (as some saie) there made him knight. But he allowed not (as I haue heard) the burieng in so vile a corner, saieing, that he would haue them buried in a better place, because they were a kings sounes. To the honourable coucourage of a king. Whereupon they saie, that a priest of sir Robert Wakenberies took by the bodies a gaine, and secretlie interred them in such place, as by the occasion of his death, which onelie knew it, could neuer since come to light. Verie truth is it, and well knowne, that at such time as sir James Cirell was in the Tower, for treason committed against the most famous prince king Henrie the seauenth, both Dighton and he were examined, and confessed the murder in manner aboue written: but whether the bodies were remoued, they could nothing tell.

The murder confessed.

And thus (as I haue learned of them that much knew, and little cause had to lie) were these two noble princes, these innocent tender children, borne of most roiall blood, brought up in great wealth, libelie long to lue, reigne, and rule in the realme, by traitorous tyrannie taken, deprived of their estate, shortly shut up in prison, and priuillie slaine and murdered, their bodies cast God wot where, by the cruel ambition of their unnatural uncle & his despitesus tormentors. Which things on euerie part well pondered, God neuer gaue this world a more notable example, neither in that vnfortunate standeth this world lie weale; or that mischance worketh the proud enterprize of an high heart; or finallie, what wretched end inueth such despitesus crueltie.

For first, to begin with the ministers, Miles Forrest, at St. Martins peccemcale rotted auaile. Dighton in dead yet walketh on alieue in gods possibilitie to be hanged per he die. But sir James Cirell died at the Tower hill beheaded for treason. King Richard himselfe, as ye shall hereafter heare, slaine in the field, hacked and helmed of his enemies hands, hanged on horse-backe dead, his haire in despite torne and tugged like a curie dog; and the mischance that he took, within lesse than thre yeares of the mischance that he did: and yet all (in the meane time) spent in much paine & trouble outward, much feare, anguish and sorow within. For I haue heard by credible report of such as were secret with his chamberlerie, that after this abhominable deed done, he neuer had a quiet mind. [When the which there can be no greater torment. For a guiltie conscience inwardlie accusing and bearing witness against an offender, is such a plague and punishment, as hell it selfe (with all the fiends therein) can not afford one of greater horror & affliction; the poet implieng no lesse in this trifidion;

He neuer thought himselfe sure. Where he went abroad, his eies whirled about, his bodie priuillie fenled, his hand euer upon his dagger, his countenance and maner like one alwaies ready to strike againe, he took ill rest a nights, laie long waking and musing, foze wearied with care and watch, rather stumbled than slept, troubled with fearefull dremes, suddenlie sometime start by, lept out of his bed, and ran about the chamber; so was his restless heart continually tossed and tumbled with the tedious impression and stonie remembrance of his abhominable deed. Now had he outward no long time in rest. For hereupon, lone after began the conspiracie, or rather god confederation, betwene the duke of Buckingham and manie other gentlemen against him. The occasion whereupon the king and the duke fell out, is of diuerse folke in diuerse wise pretended.

The outward and inward troubles of conscience.

This duke (as I haue for certeine bene informed) as lone as the duke of Gloucester, upon the death of king Edward, came to Poike, & there had solemn funeral service for king Edward, sent thither in the most secret wise he could, one Perfall his trustie servant, who came to John Ward a chamberer of like secret trust with the duke of Gloucester, desiring that in the most close and covert maner, he might be admitted to the presence and speech of his maister. And the duke of Glocester advertised of his desire, caused him in the dead of the night (after all other folke asleeped) to be brought vnto him in his secret chamber, where Desfall (after his maisters recommendations) shewed him that he had secret sent him to shew him, that in this new world he would take such part as he would, & wait vpon him with a thousand good fellows, if need were.

The messenger sent backe with thanks, & some secret instruction of the protectors mind, yet met him againe with further message from the duke his maister within few daies after at Nottingham: whither the protector from Poike with manie gentlemen of the north countrie, to the number of six hundred horses, was come on his waie to London-ward, & after secret meeting and communication had, espies departed. Whereupon at Northhampton, the duke met with the protector himselfe with three hundred horses, and from thence still continued with him partner of all his deuises; till that after his coronation, they departed (as it seemed) verie great friends at Glocester. From thence as soone as the duke came home, he so lightlie turned from him, and so highlie conspired against him, that a man would maruell whereof the change grew. And suerlie, the occasion of their variance is of diuerse men diuerselie reported.

Causes of the duke of Buckingham and King Richards falling out.

Some haue I heard say, that the duke a little before his coronation, among other things, required of the protector the duke of Herefords lands, to the which he pretended himselfe iust inheritor. And for so much as the title, which he claimed by inheritance, was somewhat interlaced with the title to the crowne by the line of king Henrie before depeined, the protector conceiued such indignation, that he reiected the dukes request with manie spitefull and minatorie words. Which so wounded his heart with hatred and mistrust, that he neuer after could indure to looke aright on king Richard, but euer feared his owne life; so far forth, that when the protector rode through London toward his coronation, he feined himselfe sicke, because he would not ride with him. And the other also taking it in euill part, sent him word to rise, and come ride, or he would make him be caried. Whereupon he rode on with euill will, and that notwithstanding on the morrow, rose from the feast, feining himselfe sicke, and king Richard said it was done in hatred and despite of him.

The duke of Buckingham and king Richard mistrust each other.

And they said, that euer after continuallie, each of them liued in such hatred and distrust of other, that the duke verelie looked to haue bene murdered at Glocester: from which nathelesse, he in faire maner departed. But suerlie some right secret at that daie denie this: and manie right wise men thinke it verelike (the deepe dissembling nature of both those men considered, and what need in that Greene world the protector had of the duke, and in what perill the duke stood, if he fell once in suspicion of the tyrant) that either the protector would giue the duke occasion of displeasure, or the duke the protector occasion of mistrust. And verelie, men thinke, that if king Richard had anie such opinion conceiued, he would neuer haue suffered him to escape his hands. Verie truth it is, the duke was an high minded man, and euill could beare the glorie of another; so that I haue heard of some that say they saw it, that the duke, at such time as the crowne was first set vpon the protectors head, his eie could not abide the sight thereof, but turned his head another way.

But men say, that he was of truth not well at ease, and that both to king Richard well knowne, and not euill taken; nor anie demand of the dukes uncourteousie reiected; but he both with great gifts, and high behests, in most loving and trullie maner departed at Glocester. But soone after his coming home to Brecknocke, hauing there in his custodie by the commandement of king Richard doctor Poxton bishop of Ely, who (as ye before heard) was taken in the counsell at the Tower, waied with him familiar, whose wisdomne abused his pride to his owne deliuerance, and the dukes destruction. The bishop was a man of great naturall wit, verie well learned, and honozable in behauior, lacking no wise waies to win fauour. He had bene fast vpon the part of king Henrie, while that part was in wealtie; and nathelesse left it not, nor forsooke it in wo, but fled the realme with the queene & the prince, while king Edward had the king in prison, neuer came home, but to the field.

After which loss, and that part bitterlie subdued, the other (for his fast faith and wisdomne) not onlie was content to receiue him, but also wooed him to come, and had him from thenceforth both in secret trust, and verie speciall fauour, which he nothing deceiued. For he being (as ye haue heard) after king Edwards death, first taken by the tyrant for his truth to the king, found the meane to set this duke in his top, joined gentlemen together in the aid of king Henrie, deuising first the marriage betwene him & king Edwards daughter: by which his faith he declared the good seruice to both his masters at once, with infinit benefit to the realme by the coniunction of those two blonds in one, whose severall titles had long disquieted the land, he fled the realme, went to Rome, neuer minding more to meddle with the world; till the noble prince king Henrie the seventh gat him home againe, made him archbishop of Canturburie, and chancellor of England, whereunto the pope joined the honour of cardinal. Thus liuing manie daies in as much honoz as one man might well wish, ended them so goodlie, that his death with Gods mercie well changed his life.

This man therefore (as I was about to tell you) by the long & often alternate profe, as well of prosperitie as aduerse fortune, had gotten by great experience (the verie mother and mistress of wisdomne) a deepe insight in politike worldlie diffis. Whereby perceiuing now this duke glad to commune with him, fed him with faire words, and manie pleasant praises. And perceiuing by the proceffe of their communications, the dukes pride now and then belking out a little breath of enuie toward the glorie of the king, and thereby feeling him easie to fall out if the matter were well handled: he craftilie sought the waies to picke him forward, taking alwaies the occasion of his coming, and so keeping himselfe so close within his bounds, that he rather seemed to follow him, than to lead him. For when the duke first began to praise and boast the king, and shew how much profit the realme should take by his reigne: my lord Poxton answered thus.

Suerlie, my lord, follie were it for me to lie, for if I would sweare the contrarie, your lordship would not (I weene) beleue; but that if the world would haue gone as I would haue wished, king Henries sonne had had the crowne, and not king Edward. But after that God had ordered him to lese it, and king Edward to reigne, I was neuer so mad that I would with a dead man strue against the quicke. So was I to king Edward a faithfull chapleine, & glad would haue bene that his child had succeeded him. Whosoeuer, if the secret iudgment of God haue otherwise provided, I purpose not to spurne against a picke, nor labour to set vp that God pulleth downe. And as for the late protector and now king, And even there he left, saying that he had already medled too much much with the world, and would from that daie med dle with his booke and his beads, and no further.

Then longed the duke to heare what he would have said, because he ended with the king, and there so suddenlie stopped, and exhorted him so familiarlie betwene them twaine to be bold to saie whatsoeuer he thought; whereof he faithfullie promised there should neuer come hurt, and peradventure more good than he would haue; and that himselfe intended to use his faithfull secret aduise & counsell, which he said was the onelie cause for which he procured of the king to haue him in his custodie, where he might re con himselfe at home, and else had he bene put in the hands of them with whom he should not haue found the like fauour. The bishop right humble thanked him, and said: In god faith my lord, I loue not to talke much of princes, as a thing not all out of perill, though the word be without fault: for so much as it shall not be taken as the partie ment it, but as it pleaseth the prince to construe it.
And euer I thinke on Aesops tale, that when the lion had proclaimed that (on paine of death) there should no horned beast abide in that wood: one that had in his forech a bunch of flesh, fled alwaie a great pace. The fox that saw him run so fast, asked him whi ther he made all that hast: And he answered, In faith I neither wote, nor reke, so I were once hence, because of this proclamation made of horned beasts.
What sole (quoth the fox) thou maiest abide well i nough; the lion ment not by thee, for it is no horne that is in thine head. So marie (quoth he) that wote I well enough. But what and he call it an horne, where am I then? The duke laughed merilie at the tale, and said: My lord, I warrant you, neither the li on nor the boze shall pike anie matter at anie thing here spoken: for it shall neuer come nere their eare.
In god faith sir (said the bishop) if it did, the thing that I was about to say, taken as well as (as for God) I ment it, could deserue but thanke: and yet taken as I wene it would, might happen to turne me to a little good, and you to lesser. Then longed the duke yet much more to wit what it was. Where upon the bishop said: In god faith (my lord) as for the late protectoz, sith he is now king in possession, I purpose not to dispute his title; but for the weale of this realme, whereof his grace hath now the gouer nance, and whereof I am my selfe one poze member, I was about to wit, that to those god habilitie whereof he hath already right manie, little needing my praise, it might yet haue pleased God, for the bet ter store, to haue giuen him some of such other excel lent vertues, meet for the rule of a realme, as our Lord hath planted in the person of your grace: and there left againe.
The duke somewhat maruelling at his sudden pauses, as though they were but parentheses, with a high countenance said: My lord, I euidentlie per ceiue, and no lesse note your often breathing, and sud den stopping in your communication; so that to my intelligence, your words neither come to anie direct or perfect sentence in conclusion, whereby either I might perceiue and haue knowledge, what your in ward intent is now toward the king, or what affecti on you beare toward me. For the comparison of god qualities ascribed to vs both (for the which I my selfe acknowledge and recognise to haue none, nor loke for no praise of anie creature for the same) ma keth me not a little to muse, thinking that you haue some other priue imagination, by loue or by grudge, ingrauen and imprinted in your heart, which for feare you dare not, or for childish shamefastnesse you be a bashed to disclose and reueale; and speciallie to mee being your friend, which on my honor do assure you, to be as secret in this case, as the deafe and dumbe person is to the finger, or the tree to the hunter.

The bishop being somewhat bolder, considering the dukes promise, but most of all animated and in couraged because he knew the dukes desires to be exalted and magnified; and also he perceiued the in ward hatred and priue rancor which he bare toward king Richard: was now boldened to open his sto mach euen to the verie bottome, intending thereby to compass how to destitoe, and utterlie confound king Richard, and to depriue him of his dignitie ro all; or else to set the duke so on fire with the desire of ambition, that he himselfe might be safe and escape out of all danger and perill. Which thing he brought shortlie to conclusion, both to the kings destruction, and the dukes confusion; and to his owne safegard, and finalie to his high promotion.
And so (as I said before) upon trust and confidence of the dukes promise, the bishop said: My singular god lord, since the time of my captiuitie, which being in your graces custodie, I may rather call it a libe rall libertie, more than a strict imprisonment, in auoiding idlenesse, mother and nourisher of all vi ces, in reading bookes and ancient pamphlets I haue found this sentence written, that no man is borne free, and in libertie of himselfe onelie: for one part of dutie he oweth or should owe to his parents for his procreation, by a verie naturall instinct and fillall courtesie: another part to his friends and kinsfolke; for proximity of blood and naturall amitie doth eue rie dutie challenge and demand: but the natie coun trie, in the which he passed first the sweet aires of this pleasant and flattering world after his natiuitie, de mandeth as a debt by a naturall bond, neither to be forgotten, nor yet to be put in oblivion.
Which saieing causeth me to consider in what case this realme my natie countrie now standeth, and in what estate and assurance (before this time) it hath continued: what gouernour we now haue, and what ruler we might haue. For I plainelie perceiue the realme being in this case, must needs decaye, and be brought to bitter confusion, and final extermination.
But one hope I haue incorporat in my breast, that is, when I consider, and in my mind do diligentlie re member, and dallie behold your noble personage, your iustice, and indifferencie, your seruent zeale, and ardent loue toward your naturall countrie, and in like manner, the loue of your countrie toward you, the great learning, pregnant wit, and goodlie elo quence, which so much doth abound in the person of your grace, I must needs thinke this realme fortu nate, yea twice more than fortunate, which hath such a prince in store, meet and apt to be a gouernour, in whose person (being indued with so manie princelie qualities) consisteth and resteth the verie vndoubted similitude and image of true honour.
But on the other side, when I call to memorie the god qualities of the late protectoz, and now called king, so violated and subuerted by tyrannie, so chan ged and altered by usurped authoritie, so clouded and shadowed by blind and insatiable ambition; yea, and so suddenlie (in manner by a metamorphosis) trans formed from politike ciuilitie, to detestable tyrannic: I must needs saie, & iustlie affirme, that he is neither meet to be a king of so noble a realme, nor so famous a realme meet to be gouerned by such a tyrant (whose kingdome (if it were of more amplenesse than it is) could not long continue; neither would the Lord suf fer him in his bloudthirstines to abuse the holie and diuine estate of a prince by the cruell title of tyran nie. For such he will ouerthrow, yea he will bring most horrible slaughter vpon them, as it is prophesied: Impius ad summum quamuis ascendat honorem, Aspicit quas clades tempora sua vident.

The duke of Buckingham highlie com mended.

Dispraise of the lord pro tectoz or king in this.

Was not his first enterprize to obtaine the crowne begun and incepted by the murder of diuerse noble, valiant true, and vertuous personages? And holie beginning to come to a mischeuous ending! And he not secundarie proceed (contrarie to all lawes of honestie) shamefullie against his owne naturall mother, being a woman of much honour and more vertue, declaring hir openlie to be a woman giuen to carnall affection, and dissolute liuing: Whyle thing if it had bene true, as it was not indeed, euerie good & naturall child would haue rather murthered at it, than haue blasted it abroad, and especiallie the being aliuie. Declaring furthermore his two brethren, and his two nephews to be bastards, and to be borne in adulterie: yet was he not with all this content.

After that he had obtainted the garland, for the which he so long thirsted, he caused the two poore innocents his nephews, committed to him for especiall trust, to be murdered and shamefullie to be killed. The blood of which felie and litle babes, daile crieth to God from the earth for vengeance. Alas, my hart sobbeth, to remember this bloodie butcher, and cruell monster. What suertie shall be in this realme to anie person, either for life or goods vnder such a cruell prince, which regardeth not the destruction of his owne blood, and then lesse the losse of other? And most especiallie (as oftentimes it chanceth) where a couetous or a cruell prince taketh suspicion, the smallest swearing that is possible (if the thing be misconstrued) may be the cause of the destruction of manie guiltlesse persons: and in especiall of noble and wealthie personages, hauing great possessions and riches: such a lord is Lucifer when he is entered into the hart of a proud prince, giuen to couetousnesse and crueltie.

But now my lord to conclude what I meane to ward your noble person, I saie and affirme, if you loue God, your linage, or your native countrie, you must your selfe take vpon you the crowne and imperiall diademe of this noble empire, both for the maintenance of the honour of the same (which so long hath flourished in fame and renowne) as also for the deliuerance of your naturall countmen, from the bondage and yaldome (worse than the captiuitie of Aegypt) of so cruell a tyrant and arrogant oppressor. For thus I dare saie, if anie forein prince or potentate, yea the Turke himselfe would take vpon him the regiment here, and the crowne, the commons would rather admit and obete him, than to liue vnder such a bloodsucker and child-killer. But how much more iofull and glad would they be to liue vnder your grace, whome they all know to be a ruler meet and conuenient for them, and they to be louing and obedient subiects, meet to liue vnder such a gouernour? Despise not, nor for sake not so manifest an occasion to louinglie offered.

And if you your selfe, knowling the paine and trouble that appertaineth to the office of a king, or for any other consideration, will refuse to take vpon you the crowne and scepter of this realme: then I aduise you, by the faith that you owe to God, by your hono- 60 and by your oth made to saint George, patron of the noble order of the garter (whereof you be a companion) and by the loue and affection that you beare to your native countrie, and the people of the same; to deuiſe some waie, how this realme (now being in miserie) may by your high discretion and princelie policie, be brought and reduced to some suertie and conuenient regiment, vnder some good gouernour by you to be appointed: for you are the verie patrone, the onelie helpe, refuge and comfort for the poore amazed and desolate commons of this realme.

For if you could either deuiſe to set by againe the linage of Lancaster, or aduance the eldest daughter of king Edward to some high and puissant prince, not onelie the new crowned king shall (small time inioy the glorie of his dignitie; but also all ciuill war should cease, all domesticall discord should cease, and peace, profit and quietnesse should be set forth and increased. When the bishop had thus ended his saying, the duke sigbed, and spake not of a great while, which soe abashed the bishop, and made him change colour. Which thing when the duke perceiued, he said, I am not afraid my lord, all psones shall be kept, to morrow we will common more: let vs go to supper. So that night they communed no more, not a little to the disquieting of the bishop, which now was euen as before to know the dukes mind and intent, as the duke longed the daie before to know his opinion and meaning.

So the next daie, the duke sent for the bishop, and rehearsed to him in maner (for he was both witty and eloquent) all the communication had betwene them before, and so paused a while, and after a little season, putting off his bonet, he said: O Lord God creator of all things, how much is this realme of England, and the people of the same, bounden vnto thy goodnesse! For where we now be in veration and trouble with great stormes oppressed, sailing and tossing in a desperate ship, without godd maiſter or gouernour: yet by thy helpe good Lord I trust per long time passe, that we shall prouide for such a ruler, as shall be both to thy pleasure, and also to the security and safegard of this noble realme.

And then he put on his bonet, saying to the bishop: My lord of Gloucestre, whose true hart and sincere affection toward me at all times I haue euidentlie perceiued and knowen, and now most of all in our last priue communication and secret deuising, I must needs in hart thinke, and with mouth confesse and saie, that you be a sure friend, a trustie counsellor, a vigilant foreser, a verie louer of your countrie, and a naturall countrienman: for which kindnes for my part, I most louinglie render to you my hartie thanks now with words, hereafter trusting to recompense and remunerate you with deaps, if life and power shall serue.

And then, at our last communication, you haue disclosed and opened the verie secrets and priuities of your stomach, touching the duke of Gloucester now usurper of the crowne; and also haue a little touched the aduancement of the two noble families of York and Lancaster: I shall likewise not onelie declare and manifest vnto you all my open acts, attempts, and doings, but also my priue intents, and secret cogitations. To the intent that as you haue vnbuckled the bouget of your priue meanings, and secret purposes to me: so shall all my cloude workings, close deuises, and secret imaginations be (as cleere as the sunne) reuealed, opened, and made lightsome to you.

And to begin, I declare, that when king Edward was deceased, to whome I thought my selfe little or nothing beholden (although we two had married two sisters) because he neither promoted, nor preferred me, as I thought I was worthy, and had deserved, neither fauoured nor regarded me, according to my degree and birth for suertie I had by him little authority, and lesse rule, and in effect nothing at all: which caused me lesse to fauour his children, because I found small humanitie, or none in their parent) I then began to studie, and with ripe deliberation to ponder and consider, how and in what manner this realme should be ruled and gouerned. And first I remembered an old prouerbe worthie of memorie, that often rueth the realme where children rule, and women gouerne.

This old adage so sanke and settled in my head, that I thought it a great errour, and extreme mischiefe

Suspicion in a prince how mischeuous it is.

chiefe to the whole realme, either to suffer the yong king to rule, or the queene his mother to be a gouernesse ouer him, considering that his brethren, and his first children (although they were not extract of high and noble linage) toke more vpon them, and more exalted themselves, by reason of the queene, than did the kings brethren, or any duke in his realme: which in conclusion turned to their confusion. Then I being perswaded with my selfe in this point, thought it necessarie both for the publike and profitable wealth of this realme, and also for mine owne commoditie and emolument, to take part with the duke of Gloucester; whom I asseyre you I thought to be as cleane without dissimulation, as tractable without iniurie, as mercifull without crueltie; as now I know him perfectly to be a dissembler without veritie, a tyrant without pitie, yea & worse than the tyrant Phalaris, destitute of all truth and clemencie.

And so by my meanes, at the first counsell holden at London, when he was most suspected of that thing that after happened (as you my lord know well enough) he was made protector and defender both of the king and of the realme, which authoritie once gotten, & the two children partly by policie brought vnder his gouernance, he being moued with that gnawing and couetous serpent desire to reigne, neuer ceased p'illie to exhort and require, yea and sometimes with minatorie fearmes to perswade me and other lords, as well spirituall as temporall, that he might take vpon him the crowne, till the prince came to the age of foure and twentie yeares, and were able to gouerne the realme, as a ripe and sufficient king.

Which thing when he saw me somewhat sicke at, both for the strangenesse of the example (because no such president had bene seene) and also because we remembered that men once ascended to the highest type of honour and authoritie, will not gladiely descend againe; he then brought in instruments, autentike doctors, proctors, and notaries of the law, with depositions of diuerse witnesses, testifying king Edwards children to be bastards. Which depositions then I thought to be as true, as now I know them to be feined; and testified by persons with rewards butrillie suborned. When the said depositions were before vs read and diligentlie heard, he stood by bare-headed, saying: Well my lords, even as I and you (sage and discreet counsellors) would that my nephue should haue no wrong; so I praie you doe me nothing but right. For these witnesses & sayings of famous doctors being true, I am onelie the vndubitate heire to lord Richard Plantagenet duke of Yorke, adiudged to be the verie heire to the crowne of this realme by authoritie of parlement.

Which things so by learned men to vs for a veritie declared, caused me and other to take him for our lawfull and vndoubted prince and soueraigne lord. For well we knew that the duke of Clarence sonne, by reason of the atteindor of his father, was disabled to inherit; and also the duke himselfe was named to be a bastard, as I my selfe haue heard spoken, and that vpon great presumptions more times than once: to againe, by my aid and fauour, he of a protecor was made a king, and of a subiect made a gouernor. At which time he promised me on his fidelitie (laing his hand in mine at Bainards castell) that the two yong princes should liue, and that he would so provide for them, and so mainteine them in honorable estate, that I and all the realme ought and should be content. But his words wanted weight, which is a soule discredit to a prince, to a pere, yea to a priuat and meane common man, as testifieth this sentence:

Dedecus est rebus cum bona verba current.

For when he was once crowned king, and in full possession of the whole realme, he cast aside his old conditions as the adder doth his skin, verifieng the old proverbe; Honours change manners, as the parish priest remembreth that he was neuer parish cleahe. For when I my selfe sued vnto him for my part of the earle of Herefords lands which his brother king Edward wrongfullie detained and withheld from me; and also required to haue the office of the high constableness of England, as diuerse of my noble ancestors before this time haue had, and in long descent continued: in this my first sute shewing his good mind toward me; he did not onelie first delate me, and afterward denate me, but gaue me such unkind words, with such taunts & retawnts, yea in manner cheeke and checkmate, to the vttermost proofe of my patience: as though I had neuer furthered him, but hindered him; as though I had put him downe, and not set him by.

Yet all these ingratitude and vnderseued vnderkindnes I bare closelie, & suffered patientlie, and couertlie remembred, outwardlie dissembling that I inwardlie thought: and so with a painted countenance, I passed the last summer in his last companie, not without manie faire promises, but without any good deeds. But when I was credibile informed of the death of the two yong innocents, his owne natural nephues, contrarie to his faith and promise, to the which (God be my iudge) I neuer agreed, nor condescended; O Lord, how my veines panted, how my bodie trembled, and how my heart inwardlie grudged! inso much that I so abhorred the sight, and much more the companie of him, that I could no longer abide in his court, except I should be openlie reuenged: the end whereof was doubtfull. And so I feined a cause to depart, and with a merrie countenance and a despightfull heart I toke my leaue humble of him (he thinking nothing lesse than that I was displeased) and so returned to Beeknoche to you.

But in that iournie (as I returned) whether it were by the inspiration of the Holie-ghost, or by melancholious disposition, I had diuerse and sundrie imaginations how to depeyne this unnatural uncle, and bloudie butcher, from his roial seat, and princelie dignitie. First I fantasied, that if I list to take vpon me the crowne, and imperiall scepter of the realme, now was the time propice and conuenient. For now was the waie made plaine, and the gate opened, and occasion giuen: which now neglected, should peradventure neuer take such effect and conclusion. For I saw he was disdained of the lords temporall, abhorred and accursed of the lords spirituall, detested of all gentlemen, and despised of all the communaltie: so that I saw my chance as perfectlie as I saw mine owne image in a glasse, that there was no person (if I had bene greedie to attempt the enterprize) could nor should haue woone the ring, or got the gale before me. And on this point I rested in imagination secretlie with my selfe two daies at Tewkesburie.

From thence so iournieng, I mused and thought that it was not best nor conuenient to take vpon me as a conqueror. For then I knew that all men, and especiallie the nobilitie, would with all their power withstand me, both for rescuing of possessions and tenures, as also for subuerting of the whole estate, laws and customes of the realme: such a power hath a conqueror, as you know well enough my lord. But at the last, in all this doubtfull case there sprang a new branch out of my head, which surclie I thought should haue brought forth faire flowers; but the sunne was so hot, that they turned to drie weeds. For I suddenlie remembered that the lord Edmund duke of Summerset my grandfather, was with king Henrie the first in the two and three degrees, from John duke of Lancaster lawfullie begotten : so that I thought fure, my mother being eldest daughter to duke Edmund, that I was next heire to king Henrie the first of the house of Lancaster.

This title pleased well such as I made priuie of my counsell, but much more it encouraged my foolish desire, and eleuated my ambitions intent; insomuch that I chereilie iudged, and in mine owne mind was determinatlie resoluē, that I was inuoluntate heire of the house of Lancaster, and thereupon concluded to make my first foundation, and erect my new building. But whether God so ordered, & by fortune it so chanced, while I was in a maze either to conclude suddenlie on this title, & to let it open amongst the common people, or to keepe it secret a while, see the chance: as I rode betwene Worcester and Bridgenoth, I encountered with the ladie Margaret countesse of Richmond, now wife vnto the lord Stanlie, which is the verie daughter and sole heire to lord John duke of Summerset; his grandfather's elder brother, which was as cleane out of my mind, as though I had neuer sene hir: so that she and hir sonne the earle of Richmond be both bulwourke and portcuille betwene me and the gate, to enter into the maiestie roiall and getting of the crowne.

the murtherer of him and getting of his crowne.
How when we had communed a little concerning his soules, as I shall shew you after, and were departed, the to our ladie of Worcesterre, and I to Shewsbburie: I then new changed, and in maner amazed, began to dispute with my selfe, little considering that thus my earnest title was turned to a fittell not so good as Et Amen. Oftentimes I imagined whether were best to take vpon me, by election of the nobilitie and communalitie, which me thought easie to be done, the vsurper king thus being in hatred and abhored of this whole realme; or to take it by power, which standeth in fortunes chance, and difficult to be atchiued and brought to passe. Thus tumbling and toiling in the waues of ambiguitie, betwene the stone and the sacrifice, I considered first the office, dutie, and paine of a king, which sweetlie thinke I that no mortall man can iustlie and trulie obserue, except he be called, elected, and speciallie appointed by God as It.
David, and diuerse other haue bene.

But further, I remembred that if I once toke on me the scepter, and the gouernance of the realme; that of two extreame enimies I was dalleie sure, but of one trustie friend (which now a daies be gone a pilgrimage) I was neither assured nor credible ascertained; such is the worlde's mutation. For I manifesslie perceived, that the daughters of king Edward, and their allies and freends, which be no small number, being both for his sake much beloued, and also for the great iniurie & manifest tyrannie done to them by the new blurper, much lamented and pitied, would neuer cease to barke if they cannot bite at the one side of me. Semblablie, my cosine the earle of Richmond, his aids and kinsfolks, which be not of little power, will suerlie attempt like a fierce greibound, either to bite or to pearle me on the other side. So that my life and rule shoud euer hang by a haire, neuer in quiet, but euer in doubt of death, or deposition.

And if the said two linages of Yorke and Lancaster, which so long haue strided for the imperfall diadem, should ioine in one against me, then were I suerlie mated, and the game gotten. Wherefore I haue clærely determined, and with my selfe concluded, vtterlie to relinquish all such fantastick imaginations, concerning the obtaining of the crowne. But all such plagues, calamities and troubles, which I feared and suspected might haue chanced on me if I had taken the rule and regiment of this realme, I shall with a reredemaine to make them rebound to

to our common enemy that calleth himselfe king, that the best Copper that he hath at Venice shall not well doe without a fault.

For (as I told you before) the countesse of Richmond in my returne from the new named king, meeting me in the high way, praised me first for kin-red sake, secondly for wit, the last that I bare to my grandfather duke Humfris, which was to my shew to be rather to move the king to be good to hir sonne Henrie duke of Richmond, and to licence him with his favour to returne againe into England.
 And if it was of his pleasure so to do, she promised that the earle hir sonne should marrie one of king Edwards daughters, at the appointment of the king, without any thing to be taken or demanded for the said espousals, but onlie the kings favour: which request I some ouerpassed, and gaue hir faire words, and so departed.

20 But after in my lodging, when I called to memorie with a deliberate studie, and did circumspectly ponder them, I thus aduised, that the Holie-ghost caused him to imagine a thing, the end whereof he could not consider both for the securitie of the realme, as also for the preferment of his child, and the destruction and final confusion of the common enimie king Richard. Which thing, the neither then thought (I am sure) as by his words could make coniecture, nor; I my selfe call not his desire to be so profittable to the realme, as I now doe perceive. But such a Lord is 30 God, that with a little sparkle he kindleth a great fire, and (to the admiration of the world) of impossibilities he maketh possibilities, of small beginnings mightie increasings, of doops great floods,

And so finally to declare to you the verie conclusion, to the which I am both bent and set, my mind is, and my power and puerile shall helpe, that the earle of Richmond, verie heire of the house of Lancaster (in the quarrell of the which linage, both my father and grandfather lost their liues in battell) shall take to wife ladye Elizabeth eldest daughter to king Edward by the which marriage both the houses of York and Lancaster may be ioined and united in one, to the cleare establishment of the title to the crowne of this noble reirne. To which conclusion if the mothers of both parts, and especially the earle himselfe, and the lady will agree: I doubt not but the bragging boze, which with his tusketh rather enerie mans skin, shall not onelie be brought to confusion (as he hath deserued) but that this empire shall ener be certaine of an vnbattait heire, & then shall all ciuill and intestine warre cease, which so long hath continued to the paring of wantie mens crownes, and this realme shall be reduced againe to quietnesse, renoume and glorie.

60 This inuention of the duke manie men thought after, that it was moze imagined for the inward hatred that he bare to king Richard, than for anie fauor that he bare to the earle of Richmonde. But of such doubtfull matter it is not best to iudge, for erring too farre from the mind and intent of the author. But what soeuer he intended, this deuise once opened to king Richard was the verie occasion, that he was rounded together by the whole head, without attaine doo or iudgement. When the duke had said, the bishop which fauoured euer the house of Lancaster, was wonderous foolish, and much reioiced to heare this deuise. For now came the wind about euen as he would haue it, with all his imagination sented to this effect, to haue king Richard subdued, and to haue the lines of king Edward, and king Henrie the first againe raised and advanced.

But lozd how he reioised, to thinke how that by this marriage the linages of Yorke and Lancaster should be conioined in one, to the verie steadfastnesse of the publike wealth of this realme. And least the dukes courage should swage, or his mind should againe alter, as it did often befoze (as you may easilie percelue by his owne tale) he thought to set vp all the failes that he had, to the intent that the ship of his pretended purpose might come thoztly to some sure port, and said to the duke: App loyd, sith by Gods prouision and your incomparable wisdomme and po-licie, this noble confusion is first moued, now is it conuenient, yea and necessarie, to consider what perillages, and what friends we shall first make prieue of this high deuile and politike conclusion: [which is not rashlie & without aduilement to be ad-uentured, for therein is danger, as the wise man saith: Semper habet damnium mentis temerarius ardor.]

By my truth, quoth the duke, we will begin with the ladie Richmond, the earles mother, which knoweth where he is, either in captiuitie, or at large in Bri-taine. For I heard saie, that the duke of Britaine restored him to libertie, immediatly after the death of king Edward, by whose means he was restrained: Sith you will begin that waie (said the bishop) I haue an old friend with the countesse, a man sober, secret, and well witted, called Reginald Bzaie; whose pudent policie I haue knowne to haue compassed things of great importance, for whome I shall secretly send, if it be your pleasure; and I doubt not but he will gladly come and that with a good will.
So with a little diligence the bishop wrote a letter to Reginald Bzaie, requiring him to come to Bzeck-nocke with speed, for great and urgent causes touching his mistresse: and no other thing was declared in the letter. So the messenger rode into Lancashire where Bzaie was with the countesse, and lord Thomas Stanlie his husband, and deliuered the letter: which when he had read, he took it as a signe or pre-sage of some good fortune to come.

When he (with the messenger) came to the castell of Bzecknocke, where the duke and the bishop declared what thing was deuised, both for to set the realme in a quiet steadfastnesse, as also for the high preferment of the earle of Richmond, sonne to his ladie and mistresse: willing hir first to compass holo to obtaine the good will of quene Elizabeth, and also of hir eldest daughter bearing the same name: and after secretly to send to hir sonne into Britaine, to declare what high honoz was prepared for him, if he would sweare to marrie the ladie Elizabeth asone as he was king, and in totall possession of the realme.
Reginald Bzaie with a glad heart, forgetting nothing giuen to him in charge, in great hast and with good speed returned to the countesse his ladie and mistresse.

When Bzaie was departed, and this great doubt fall besett once set abroad, the bishop thirsting for nothing more than for libertie: when he saw the duke pleasant and well minded toward him; he told the duke, that if he were in his Ile of Elie, he could make manie friends to further their enterprise: and if he were there and had but foure daies warning, he little regarded the malice of king Richard, his coun-trie was so strong. The duke knew well all this to be true, but yet loth he was that the bishop should depart: for he knew well, that as long as the bishop was with him, he was sure of politike aduise, sage counsell, and circumspect proceeding. And so he gaue the bishop faire words, saing, that he should thoztly depart, and that well accompanied for fear of en-mies.

The Bishop being as truttie as the duke was tollie, did not tarrie till the dukes companie were assembled, but secretly disguised, in a night departed (to the dukes great displeasure) and came to his see of Elie; where he found manie and friends; and so passed into Flanders, where he did the earle of Richmond good seruice, and neuer returned againe, till the earle of Richmond (after being king) sent for him, and thoztly promoted him to the see of Cantuarburie.

Thus the bishop wound himselfe from the duke when he had most need of his aid, for if he had tarried still, the duke had not made so manie blabs of his counsell, nor put so much confidence in the Welshmen, nor yet so temerariouly set forth without knowledge of his friends as he did, which things were his sudden ouerthrowe (as they that knew it did report) [and might perhaps haue bene auoided by the bishops wisdomme for the dukes sake, as his owne sith Qui sapit, ille potest alios sapuisse docere.]

When Reginald Bzaie had declared his message and priate instruction to the countesse of Richmond his mistresse, no maruell though she were iolous and glad, both of the good newes, and also for the obtaining of such a high friend in hir sonnes cause as the duke was. Wherefore she willing not to steepe this matter, but to further it to the bittermost of hir power and abilitie, deuised a means how to breake this matter to quene Elizabeth then being in sanctuarie at Westminster. And thereupon she, hauing hir hir familie at that time (for the preservation of hir health) a certaine Welshman called Lewes, learned in physicke, which for his grauitie and experience, was well knowne, and much esteemed amongst great estates of the realme, brake hir mind to him.

For with this Lewes she used sometime liberallie and familiarly to talke, and now hauing oportu-tie and occasion to expresse hir hart vnto him in this weightie matter, declared that the time was come that hir sonne should be ioined in marriage with ladie Elizabeth, daughter and heire to king Edward; and that king Richard being taken and reputed of all men for the common enimie of the realme, should out of all honoz & estate be dejected, & of his crowne and kingdome be cleerly spoiled and expelled: and required him to go to quene Elizabeth (with whome in his facultie he was of counsell) not as a messenger, but as one that came frendly to visit and consolate hir, and (as time & place should require) to make hir priue of this deuile; not as a thing concluded, but as a purpose by him imagined.

This physician did not long linger to accomplish hir desire, but with good diligence repaired to the quene, being still in the sanctuarie at Westminster.
And when he saw time propice and conuenient for his purpose, he said vnto hir: Madame, although my imagination be verie simple, and my deuise more folish; yet for the entier affection that I beare toward you and your children, I am so bold to utter vnto you a secret and priate conceit that I haue cast and com-passed in my fantastick braine. When I well re-membred and no lesse considered the great losse and damage that you haue sustained, by the death of your noble and louing husband; and the great dolour and sorrow that you haue suffered and tolerated, by the cruell murder of your innocent children: I can no lesse do both of bounden duetie and christian charitie, than dailie to studie, and hourely imagine, not one-lie how to bring your hart to comfort and gladnesse, but also deuise how to reuenge the righteous quarrell of you and your children on that bloudie bloudsucker, and cruell tyrant king Richard.

And first consider, what battell, what manslaughter, what mischefe hath risen in this realme by the dissention betwene the two noble houses of York & Lancaster. Which two families (as I haue contriued) if they may be ioined in one, I thinke, yea and doubt not, but your line shall be againe restored to the pristine estate and degree; to your great iaise and comfort, and to the utter confusion of your niofall enimie the usurper king. You know verie well madame, that of the house of Lancaster, the earle of Richmond is next of blood, who is living, and a lustie yong batcheler, and to the house of Yorke your daughters now are heires. If you could agree and inuent the meane how to couple your eldest daughter with the yong earle of Richmond in matrimonie, no doubt but the usurper of the realme should be shortly deposed, and your heire againe to his right restored.

When the quene had heard this friendlie motion (which was as farre from his thought; as the man that the rude people saie is in the moone) how his spirit reulde, and how his heart leapt in his bodie for ioye and glorie. And first giving laud to almightie God, as the chiefe author of his comfort, secombarillie to maister Lewes, as the deuiler of the se god newes & tidings, the instantlie besought him, that as he had bene the first inuenter of so great an enterprise, so now he would not relinquish nor desist to follow the same: requirring him further (because he was appertaining to the countesse of Richmond mother to the erle Henrie) that he would with all diligent celeritie resort to him, then lodging in his husbands place, within the citie of London: and to declare on the quenes behalfe to the countesse, that all the friends and fauours of king Edward his husband, should assist and take part with the earle of Richmond his sonne, so that he would take a corporall oth after the kingdome obtained, to espouse and take to wife the ladie Elizabeth his daughter, or else ladie Cicilie, if the eldest daughter were not then living.

readinesse to set forward this conclusion.

Maister Lewes with all dexterity so sped his businesse, that he made and concluded a finall end and determination of this enterprise betwene the two mothers. And because he was a physician, and out of all suspicion and misdemeaning, he was the common curer and dailie messenger betwene them, aiding and setting forth the inuented conspiracie against king Richard. So the ladie Margaret countesse of Richmond, brought into a good hope of the preferment of his sonne, made Reginald Braie his most faithfull seruant, chiefe solicitor and priuie procurator of this conspiracie, giuing him in charge secretly to inuigle and attract such persons of nobilitie to ioyne with him and take his part, as he knew to be ingenuous, faithfull, diligent, and of activitie. This Reginald Braie within few daies brought vnto his laie (first of all taking of euery person a solemne oth to be true and secret) sir Giles Daubene, sir John Cheinie knight, Richard Gilford, and Thomas Kame esquiers, and diuers other. The countesse of Richmond was not so diligent for his part, but quene Elizabeth was as vigilant on the other side, and made friends, and appointed counsellors to set forward and aduance his businesse.

The countesse of Richmond bittereth the matter to Sir Sothe his chap-laine, swearing him to be secret.

In the meane season, the countesse of Richmond took into his seruice Christopher Urswike, an honest and wise priest, and (after an oth of him for to be secret taken and sworne) he bitered to him all his mind and counsell, aduising him the more confidence and truth, that he all his life had fauoured and taken part with king Henrie the first, and as a speciall ietwell put to his seruice by sir Lewes his physician. So the mother, studious for the prosperitie of his son, appointed this Christopher Urswike to saile into Britaine to the earle of Richmond, and to declare and reueale to him all pacts and agrements betwene him & the quene agreed and concluded. But suddenlie she remembryng that the duke of Buckingham was one of the first inuensors, and a secret founder of this enterprise, determined to send some personage of more estimation than his chapleine.

Whereupon the elected for a messenger Hugh Contweie esquier, & sent him into Britaine with a great sum of monie to his sonne, giuing him in charge, to declare to the earle the great loue and especiall fauour that the most part of the nobilitie of the realme bare toward him, the louing hearts & benecolent minde which the whole commonaltie of their owne free will frankelie offered, and liberalitie exhibited to him, willing and aduising him not to neglect so good an occasion apparantlie offered; but with all speed and diligence, to addre and settle his mind & full intention how to returne home againe into England, where he was both wished and looked for: giuing him further monition and counsell, to take land and arrivall in the principallitie of Wales, where he should not doubt to find both aid, comfort and friends.

Richard Gilford, least Hugh Contweie might fortune to be taken, or stopped at Plimmouth, where he intended to take his nauigation, sent out of Kent Thomas Kame with the same instructions; and both made such diligence, and had such wind and weather, the one by land from Calis, and the other by water from Plimmouth, that within lesse than an houre both arrived in the duke of Britains court, and spake with the earle of Richmond, which (from the death of king Edward) went at pleasure and libertie, and to him counted and manifested the cause and effect of their message and ambassage. When the earle had receiued this message (which was the more pleasant, because it was unlooked for) he rendered to Iesu his fauour, his most humble & heartie thanks, being in firme credence and beleefe, that such things as he with busie mind and laborious intent had wished & desired, could neuer haue taken anie effect, without the helpe and preferment of almightie God. And now being put in comfort of his long longing, he did communicate & breake to the duke of Britaine all his secrets; and priuie messages, which were to him declared; aduertising him that he was entered into a sure and stedfast hope, to obtaine and get the crowne and kingdome of the realme of England, desiring him both of his good will and friendlie helpe toward the atchaining of his offered enterprise, promising him when he came to his intended purpose, to render to him againe equall kindnes, and condigne recompense. Although the duke of Britaine before that daie, by Thomas Hutton ambassadour from king Richard, had both by monie and prayers bene solicited and moued to put againe into safe custodie the earle of Richmond, he neuertheless promised faithfullie to aid him; and his promise he trulie performed.

Whereupon the earle with all diligence sent into England againe Hugh Contweie, and Thomas Kame, which should declare his comming hostile into England: to the intent that all things, which by counsell might be for his purpose provided, should be speedilie and diligentlie done; and that all things doubtful, should of his friends be prudentlie foreseene, in auoiding all engines or snares which king Richard had or might set in disturbance of his purpose: and he in the meane season would make his abode still in Britaine, till all things necessarie for his iournie were prepared, and brought in a readinesse. In the meane season, the chiefeins of the confuration in England began together manie enterprises: some in conuentient fortresses put strong garrisons, some kept armed men priuie, to the intent that when they should haue knowledge of the earles landing, they would begin to stir by the war: other did secretlie moue and solicit the people to rise & make an insurrection: other (amongst whom John Morton bishop of Ely then being in Flanders was chiefe) by priuie letters and cloked messengers did stirre and and moue to this new confuration, all such which they certeinly knew to haue a costed hatred, or to beare cankered malice toward king Richard and his proceedings.

Although this great enterpryse were neuer so priuily handled, and so secretlie amongst so circumspect persons treated, compassed and conueied, yet knowledge therof came to the eares of king Richard, who with the sudden chance was not a little moued and astonished. First, because he had no host readie prepar- ed; secondlie, if he should raise an armie so sudden- lie, he knew not where to meet his enemies, or whither to go, or where to tarrie. Wherefore he determi- ned to dissemble the matter, as though he knew no- thing, till he had assembled his host; and in the meane season either by the rumour of the common people, or by the diligence of his espials to search out all the counsels, determinations, intents, and compasses of his close abusers; or else by policie to inter- cept and take some person of the same confuration, considering that there is no more secret nor hid es- piall, than that which lurketh in dissimulation of knowledge and intelligence, or is hidden in name and shadow of counterfeit humanitie and feined kindnesse. But yet wisdom hath a deuise to auoid a shift off all such deceiters, as the poet well saith:

Dissimulatores vitia prudentia vafros.

And because he knew the duke of Buckingham to be the chiefe head and aid of the confuration, he thought it most necessarie to plucke him from that part, either by faire promises or open warre. Where- upon he addrest his louing letters to the duke, full of gentle words, & most friendly speech; giuing fur- ther in charge to the messenger that carried the letter to promise the duke (in his behalfe) golden billes, and slauer riuers, and with all gentle and pleasant means to persuaade and exhort the duke to come to the court. But the duke as wylie as the king, mistrusting the faire flattering words, and the gaie promises to him so suddenly without any cause offered, knowing the craftie crafts of king Richards bow, which in diuerse affaires before time he had seene practised, required the king to pardon him, excusing himselfe that he was so diseased in his stomach, that scant he could ei- ther take refection or rest.

King Richard not being content with this excuse, would in no wise admit the same; but incontinent directed to the duke other letters, of a more rougher and hautier sort, not without taunting and biting teames, and checking words, commanding him (all excuses set apart) to repaire without anie delay to his roiall presence. The duke made to the messeng- er a determinate answer, that he would not come to his most tall enemy, whome he neither loued, nor fa- uoured: and immediatlie prepared open warre a- gainst him, and persuaaded all his complices and par- takers, that euery man in his quarter, with all dili- gence should raise by people & make a commotion. And by this means almost in one moment Thomas marques Doyet came out of sanctuary, where since the beginning of k. Richards daies he had continued, whose life by the onelie helpe of sir Thomas Louell was preserved from all danger & perill in this trou- blous world, gathered together a great band of men in Yorkshire.

Sir Edward Courtenie, and Peter his brother bishop of Excester, raised an other armie in Denon- shire and Coznewall. In Kent Richard Gilsford and other gentlemen collected a great companie of souldiers, and openlie began warre. But king Ri- chard, who in the meane time had gotten together a great strength and puissance, thinking it not most for his part beneficiall, to disperse and diuide his great armie into small branches, and particularlie to persecute anie one of the confuration by himselfe, de- termined (all other things being set aside) with his whole puissance to set on the thiefe head, which was the duke of Buckingham. And so remouing from London, he took his iournie toward Salisbury, to the intent that in his iournie he might set on the dukes armie, if he might know him in anie place in- camped, or in order of battell arraied.

The king was scarce two daies iournie from Sa- lisburie, when the duke of Buckingham accompani- ed with a great power of wild Welshmen, whom he (being a man of great courage and sharpe speech) in maner against their willes had rather thereto infor- ced and compelled by lordlie and streng command- ment, than by liberall wages and gentle demour, which thing was the verie occasion why they left him desolate, & cowardlie forsooke him. The duke with all his power marched through the Forrest of Deane, in- tending to haue passed the riuer Seuerne at Gloce- ster, & there to haue ioined his armie with the Court- neis, and other westerne men of his confederacie and affinitie. Which if he had done, no doubt but king Richard had bene in great leopordie, either of priua- tion of his realme, or losse of his life, or both.

But see the chance. Before he could attaine to Se- uerne side, by force of continuall raine and moisture, the riuer rose so high that it ouerflowed all the coun- trie adioining, insomuch that men were drowned in their beds, and houses with the extreame violence were ouerturned, children were caried about the fields swimming in cradels, beasts were drowned on hills. Which rage of water lasted continuallie ten daies, insomuch that in the countrie adioining they call it to this daie, The great water; or the duke of Buckingham's great water. By this flood the passages were so closed, that neither the duke could come ouer Seuern to his adherents, nor they to him. During the which time, the Welshmen lingring idle- lie, and without monie, vittels, or wages, suddenly scattered and departed: and for all the dukes faire promises, threatnings, and inforcements, would in no wise either go further nor abide.

The duke (being thus left almost post alone) was of necessitie compelled to flie, and in flight was with this sudden fortune maruellouslie dismayed: and be- ing unpurueied what counsell he should take, and what waie he should follow, like a man in despaire, not knowing what to do, of verie trust & confidence conueied himselfe into the house of Humfreie Banas- ter his seruant beside Shrewesburie, whome he had tenderlie brought up, and whome he about all men loued, fauoured, and trusted; now not doubting but that in his extreame necessitie he should find him faithfull, secret, and trustie, intending there couertlie to lurke, till either he might raise againe a new ar- mie, or else thorowlie to saile into Brittain to the earle of Richmond. [But alas (good duke) the meanes (by occasion of Gods prouidence, shaking men out of their thiffs of supposed safetie) failed him, and he fell infortunatlie into the hands of the coming boze, that tare him in peeces with his tuskes.]

Now when it was knowne to his adherents, which were rebie to giue battell, that his host was scattered, and had left him almost alone, and was fled, & could not be found; they were suddenly amazed & stricken with a sudden feare, that euery man like persons des- perate shifted for himselfe & fled. Some went to sanc- tuary, and to solitarie places; some fled by sea, where- of the most part within a few daies after actiued safetie in the duchie of Brittain. Among which num- ber were these persons: Peter Courtenie bishop of Excester, and sir Edmund Courtenie his brother, by king Henrie the seventh after created earle of Denonshire; Thomas marquesse Doyet, John lord Welles, Welles, sir John Bourchier, sir Edward Mordaunt, a valiant man in armes, brother to queene Elizabeth, sir Robert Willoughbie, sir Giles Daubeneie, sir Thomas Arundell, sir John Cheinie, and his two brethren, sir William Barkelie, sir William Brandon, & Thomas his brother, sir Richard Edgecombe: all these for the most part being knights, John Hallowell, and Edward Poynings, a politike capteine.

At this verie season, John Hoxton bishop of Cite, and Christopher Urswike priest, and an other compaignie of noble men sojourned in Flanders; and by letters and messengers procured manie enemies against king Richard, which using a vigilant eye, and a quick remembrance, being newlie come to Salisburie, hauing perfect notice and knowledge how the duke was fled, and how his complices intended to passe out of the realme; first he sent men of warre to all the next ports and passages, to keepe streitlie the sea coast, so that no person should passe outward, nor take land within the realme without their assent and knowledge; secondarilie he made proclamation, that that person could shew and reueale where the duke of Buckingham was, should be highlie rewarded; if he were a bondman, he should be enfranchised and set at libertie; if he were of free blood, he should haue a generall pardon, and be rewarded with a thousand pounds.

Furthermore, because he understood by Thomas Hutton, which (as you haue heard) was newlie returned out of Britaine, that Francis duke of Britaine not onelie refused to keepe the earle of Richmond as a prisoner, at his contemplation, and for his sake; but also that he was readie to aid and succour the said earle, with men, monie, and all things necessarie for his transporting into England: he therefore rigged and sent out ships of warre, well furnished and decked with men and artillerie, to scowpe and keepe that part of the sea that lieth ouer against Britaine, to the intent that if the earle of Richmond would aduenture to saile toward England, either he should be taken captiue, or be beaten and driuen from the coast of England. And moreover, to the intent that euerie coast, waie, passage, and corner, should be diligentlie watched & kept, he set at euerie doubtful and suspected place men of warre, to seeke, search, and inquire, if anie creature could tell tidings of the duke of Buckingham; or of anie of his confederation, adherents, fauours, or partakers.

While this busie search was diligentlie applied and put in execution, Humfreie Banasser (were it more for feare of life and losse of goods, or allured & prouoked by the auaricious desire of the thousand pounds) he betrayed his guest and maister to John Hutton then shiriffe of Shropshire; which suddenlie with a strong powder of men in harnesse apprehended the duke in a little groue adioining to the mansion of Humfreie Banasser, and in great hast and euill speed conueied him apparelled in a pilled blacks cloake to the towne of Shrewesburie, where king Richard then kept his household. Whether this Banasser betrayed the duke more for feare than couetous, manie men doe doubt: but sure it is, that shortly after he had betrayed the duke his maister; his sonne and hesteward mad, & so died in a bores stie; his eldest daughter of excellent beantie, was suddenlie stricken with a foule lepposie; his second sonne maruellouslie deformed of his lims, and made lame; his younger sonne in a small poodle was strangled and poisoned; and he being of extreme age, arreigned, and found guiltie of a murder, and by his cleargie faued. And as for his thousand pounds, R. Richard gaue him not one farthing, sauing that he which would be untrue to so good a maister, would be false to all other: howbeit some saie that he had a small office, or a farme to stop his mouth withall. The duke being by certeine of the kings counsell diligentlie vpon interrogatories examined, that things he knew preiudiciall vnto the kings person, opened and declared frankly and frankly all the contriuation, without dissembling or glossing; trusting, because he had trulie and plainelie reuealed and confessed all things that were of him required, that he should haue licence to speake to the king: which (whether it were to sue for pardon and grace, or whether he being brought to his presence, would haue stiked him with a dagger as men then iudged) he soze desired and required. But when he had confessed the whole fact & conspiracie, vpon all foules daie, without arreignment or iudgement, he was at Salisburie in the open market place, on a new scaffold beheaded and put to death.

This death (as a reward) the duke of Buckingham receiued at the hands of king Richard, whom he before in his affaires, purposes and enterprises had holpen, sustained, and set forward, about all Gods forboode. By this all men may easilie perceiue, that he not onelie loseth both his labour, trauell, and industrie (and further stanneth and spoyleth his line with a perpetuall ignominie and reproch) which in euill and mischiefes assisteth and aideth an euill disposed person, considering for the most part, that he for his frendlie fauour should receiue some great displeasure or importunate chance. Beside that, God of his iustice in conclusion appointed to him a conbigne paine and affliction for his meritis and deserts. [Available therefore, and for his best aduantage had it bene, to haue followed the wise counsell of him, that willed him, and such as he, to keepe them from the man that hath power to slay; so shalt thou doubt (saith he) the feare of death. And if thou come vnto him make no fault, least he take auaite thy life: remember that thou goest in the middell of snares; & that thou walkest vpon the towers of the citie. Which aduise a learned man, in good place, and necessarie seruice aboode the prince, neatie compiled in these few verses:

*Prætere principibus modice, nimis esse propinquum Si cupis, in vita multa pericula rui.
Sic uti fortuna facit seruire potenti, Disce ne turbes, atque repente cadis, Sollicite vigilas, laquei sunt vindique fusi, Turribus in summis es situs, ergo caue.]*

While these things were thus handled and ordered in England, Henrie earle of Richmond prepared an armie of fine thousand manlie Britons, and fortie well furnished ships. When all things were prepared in a readinesse, and the daie of departing and setting forward was appointed, which was the twelue daie of the moneth of October, the whole armie went on shipboard, and halsted by their sailes, and with a prosperous wind toke the sea. But toward night the wind changed, and the weather turned, and so huge and terrible a tempest so suddenlie arose, that with the verie power and strength of the storme, the ships were disparted, seuered & separated asunder: some by force were driuen into Normandie, some were compelled to returne againe into Britaine. The ship wherein the earle of Richmond was, associated onelie with one other barke, was all night tossed and turmoiled.

In the morning after, when the rage of the furious tempest was allwaged, and the ire of blustering wind was some deale appeased; about the houre of none the same daie, the earle approached to the south part of the realme of England, euen at the mouth of the haue of Poole, in the countie of Dorset, where he might plainelie perceiue all the sea banks & shores garnished and furnished with men of warre and soldiers, appointed and deputed there to defend his arrival and landing (as before is mentioned.) Therefore he gaue streit charge, and soze commandement, that that no person should once presume to take land, and go to shore, untill such time as the whole manie were assembled and come together. And while he tarried and lingered, he sent out a shipboate toward the land side, to know whether they, which stood there in such a number, and so well furnished in apparell defensiuve, were his foes and enemies, or else his friends and comforters.

they that were sent to inquite, were instantlie desired of the men of warre keeping the coast (which thereof were before instructed & admonished) to descend and take land, affirming that they were appointed by the duke of Buckingham there to await and tarry for the arrivall and landing of the earle of Richmonde, and to conduct him safelie into the campe, where the duke not far of late incamped with a mighty armie, and an host of great strength and power, to the intent that the duke and the earle, joining in pursuances and forces together, might prosecute and chase King Richard being destitute of men, and in manner desperate, and so by that means, and their owne labours, to obtaine the end of their enterprise which they had before begun.

The earle of Richmond suspecting their flattering request to be but a fraud (as it was in deed) after he perceived none of his ships to appeare in sight, he twiced by his anchors, halled by his sailles, & hauing a prosperous and streinable wind, and a fresh gale sent euen by God to deliuer him from that perill and teopardie, arrived safe and in all securitie in the duchie of Normandie, where he (to refresh and solace his foliowers and people) toke his recreation by the space of thre daies, and clarellie determined with part of his companie to passe all by land againe into Brittain. And in the meane season he sent ambassadoers to the french king; called Charles the eight, which noblie succeeded his father king. Letwes the eleventh, not long before departed to passe, requesting of him a safe conduct and licence to passe thorough his countrie of Normandie into Brittain.

That this young king, having compassion of the misfortune of the earle of Richmond, not onely gentlie granted and assigned to him a passport; but also liberallie disbursed to him a great somme of monie for his conduct and expences necessarrie in his long tourne and passage. But the earle trusting in the French kings humanitie, adventured to send his ships home into Brittain, and to set foorth himselfe by land on his tournee, making no great hast till his messengers were returned. Which being told that benefit so comforted, and with hope of prosperous successe to encourage, marched towards Brittain with all diligence, intending there to consult further with his lovers; friends of his affaires and enterpises. When he was returned againe into Brittain, he was certified by credible information, that the duke of Buckingham had lost his head; and that the marquess of Dorset, and a great number of noble men of England, had a little before inquired and searched for him there, and were now returned to Cannes.

When he had heard these news thus reported, he first grieved and lamented his first attempt and setting forthward of his friends, and in especial of the nobility, not to have more fortunatelly succceeded. Seeing, however, that his friends were not so much condolant, he rejoiced on the other part, that God had sent him so manly valiant and prudent captains to be his companions in his martiall enterprises, trafficking suerlie and nothing doubting in his opinion, but that all his businesse should be well compassed, and brought to a good conclusion. Therefore he determining with all diligence to set forthward his new begun businesse, departed to Rihelms, and sent certaine of his private seruitors to conduct and bring the marquisse and other noble men to his preseince. When they knew that he was safelie returned into Britaine, Lord how they reioised ! for before that time they misled him, and knew not in what part of the world to make inquirie : or search for him.

For they doubted and no lesse feared least he had taken land in England, & fallen into the hands of king Richard, in whose person they knew well was neither mercie nor compassion.

Wherefore in all speedie maner they galoped to ward him, and him reuerentlie saluted. Which meting after great ioy and solace, and no small thanks-giuen and rendered on both parts, they aduisedlie debated and communed of their great businesse and weightie enterprize. In the which season the feast of the Paschittie of our saviour Christ happened, on which daie all the English lords went with their solemnitie to the chiefe church of the citie, and there e-gaue saith and promise to other. The earle himselte first toke a corporall oth on his honor, promising that incontinent after he shuld be possessed of the crowne and dignitie of the realme of England, he would be conioined in matrimonie with the lady Elizabeth daughter to king Edward the fourth. Then all the companie swore to him fealtie, and did to him homage (as though he had bene that time the crowned king, and annointed prince) promising faithfullie, and firmelie affirming, that they would not onelic lose their worldlie substance, but also be deprived of their liues and worldlie felicitie, rather than to suffer king Richard that tyrant longer to rule and reigne ouer them.

Which ſolemne oſſs made and taken , the earle of Richmond declared and communicated all theſe do-mings to Francis duke of Britaine , deſiring ſ moſt heartliele requirung him to aid him with a greater armie to conduct him into his couentie , which ſo forelonged and looked for his returne , and to the which be-was by the more part of the nobilitie and communaltie called and deſired. Which (with Gods aid, and 40 the dukes comfort) he doubted not in ſhort time to obtaine; requirung him further to preſt to him a conuenient ſumme of monie ; affirming that all ſuch ſummess of monie which he had received of his eſpe-ciall friends , were ſpent and conſumed in preparation of his laſt iourneie made toward England; which ſummess of monie, after his enterpriſe once atchieved, he in the woꝝd of a prince faithfullie promiſed to repaie and reſtoꝝe againe . The duke promiſed him aid and helpe. Upon confidence whereof he rigged his 50 ſhips , and ſet ſoꝝth a nauie well decked with ordinance , and warlikeſhelie furniſhed with all things neceſſarie, to the intent to ſaile foꝝward Spoytie, and to loſe no time.

In the meane season king Richard apprehended in diuerse parts of the realme certaine gentlemen of the earle of Richmonds faction, & confederation, which either intended to faile into Britaine towards him, or else at his landing to assist and aid him. Amongst whome sir George Bowene, sir Roger Clifford, and foure other were put to execution at London, and sir Thomas Senteleger which had married the duchesse of Excester the kings owne sister, and Thomas Rame, and diuerse other were executed at Excester. Beside these persons, diuerse of his household seruants, whome either he suspected or doubted, were by great crueltie put to shamefull death. [Wherthe obseruation of which mens names, the place, and the action here mentioned, with the computation of time, I find fit occasion to interlace a note (newlie tyrannicallie persecute and execute: as followeth.] tie, but in verie secret maner, whome the maior & his brethren in the best maner they could did receiue, and then presented to him in a purse two hundred nobles; which he thankfullie accepted. And during his abode here he went about the citie, & viewed the seat of the same, & at length he came to the castell: and when he understood that it was called Rugemont, suddenlie he fell into a dume, and (as one affonied) said; Well, I see my daies be not long. He spake this of a propheticke told him, that when he came once to Richmond, he should not long liue after: which fell out in the end to be true, not in respect of this castle, but in respect of Henrie earle of Richmond, who the next yeare following met him at Bosworth field where he was slaine. But at his being here, he did find the gentlemen of this countrie not to be best affected towards him, and after his departure, did also heare that the marquesse of Dorset, the bishop of Excester, and sundrie other gentlemen were in a confederacie against him for the assisting of the erle of Richmond.

Wherefore he sent downe John lord Scrope with a commission to keepe a session; who sat at Rington, & then & there were indicted of high treason, Thomas marquesse Dorset, Peter bishop of Exce-ster, Thomas Sentleger, and Thomas Fulford knights as principals, and Robert Willoughbie and Thomas Arundell knights, John Arundell deane of Excester, David Hopton archdeacon of Excester, Oliver abbat of Buckland, Bartholomew Sentle-ger, William Gylson, Thomas Grenefeld, Richard Cogecombe, Robert Burnbie, Walter Court-neie, Thomas Wolune, Edward Courtneie, Hugh Lutterell, John Crocker, John Halletwell, and five hundred others were indicted as accessaries. All which fled and hid themselves, some into Bri-taine, and some else where; saving sir Thomas Sent-leger, and one sir John Kame; who were brought to Excester, and there at the Carefor were beheaded.]

After this, king Richard called a parlement, in the which he attainted the earle of Richmond and all other persons which were fled out of the realme for feare, or anie other cause, as enemies to him, and to their naturall countrie; & all their lands, goods, & possessions, were confiscate and seized to the kings vse.
And yet not content with this pzeie, which no doubt was of no small valour and moment, he laid on the peoples necks a great tax and tallage, and fuerlie ne-cessitie to that act in maner him compelled. For what with purging and declaring his innocencie concerning the murder of his nephues toward the world, and what with cost to obtaine the lone and fauour of the communitie (which outwardlie glosed, and open-lie displeased with him) he gaue prodigallie so manie and so great rewards, that now both he lacked, and scarce with honestie holw to borrow.

In this troublous season, nothing was more mar-uelled at, than that the lord Stanleie had not bene taken, and reputed as an enemie to the king; considering the working of the ladie Margaret his wife, mother to the earle of Richmond. But forsomuch as the enterpryse of a woman was of him reputed of no regard or estimation; and that the lord Thomas his husband had purged himselfe sufficientlie to be innocent of all doings and attempts by him perpetrated and committed: it was given him in charge to keepe him in some secret place at home, without hauing anie seruant or companie: so that from thence forth he should neuer send letter or messenger vnto his sonne, nor anie of his friends or confederats, by the which the king might be molested or troubled, or anie hurt or pzeiudice might be attempted against his realme and communitie. Which commandement was a while put in execution and accomplished, according to his deadfull commandement.

Yet the wild woman of vengeance waueing in his head, could not be content with the death of di-uerse gentlemen suspected of treason; but also he must extend his bloody furie against a pzeie gentleman called Collingborne, for making a small rime of three of his unfortunate counsellors, which were the lord Louell, sir Richard Ratcliffe his mische-uous minion, and sir William Catesbie his secret seducer, which matter of time was thus framed:

The Cat, the Rat, and Louell our dog.

Ryecall England vnder an hog.

Meaning by the hog, the breadfull wild boare, which was the kings cognifance. But because the first line ended in dog, the metrickian could not obseruing the regiments of meter, and the second verse in boare, but called the boare an hog. This poetickall schollemaster, corrected of breets and longs, caused Collingborne to be abbreviated shorter by the head, and to be diuided into foure quarters.

Here is to be noted, that beside the rime which is reported by some to be the onelie cause for which this gentleman suffered, I find in a register booke of indicaments concerning felonies and treasons by sundrie persons committed, that the said Colling-borne (by the name of William Collingborne) late of Libbard in the countie of Wilshire esquier, and other his associats were indicted in London: for that they about the tenth date of Iulie, in this second yeare of king Richards reigne, in the parish of saint Botolphes in Portoken ward had solicited and requested one Thomas Hute, offering to him for his paines eight pounds, to go ouer into Britaine vnto Henrie earle of Richmond, Thomas marquesse Dorset, John Cheineie esquier, and others, which in the last parlement holden at Westminster had bene attainted of sundrie high treasons by them pyanished with in the kings dominion.

Wherefore this, to declare vnto them that they should do verie well, to returne into England with all such power as they might get before the feast of S. Luke the euangelist next ensuing; for so they might recouer all the whole reuenues of the realme due at the feast of saint Michaell next before the said feast of saint Luke. And that if the said earle of Richmond and his partakers, following the counsell of the said Colling-borne, would arrive at the haven of Pote in Dor-setshire, he the said Collingborne and other his asso-ciats would cause the people to rise in armes, and to leuie warre against king Richard, taking part with the said earle and his friends; so that all things should be at their commandements. Whereupon, to moue the said earle to send the said John Cheineie vnto the French king, to auertise him that his ambassadors sent into England should be dallied with, onelie to driue off the time till the winter season were past, and that then in the beginning of summer king Richard meant to make warre into France, inuading that realme with all puissance: and so by this meanes to persuade the French king to aid the earle of Richmond and his partakers, in their quarrell against king Richard.

Further, that the said William Collingborne, being confederate with the said earle and other his adherents, as well within the realme as without, the eighteenth day of Iulie, in the said second yeare, with in the parish of saint Gregories in Faringdon ward within, had deuised certeine bills and writings in rime, to the end that the same being published, might stir the people to a commotion against the king. And those bills and writings in rime so deuised and written, the same Collingborne the daie and yeare last mentioned, had fastened and set vpon diuerse doores of the cathedraall church of saint Paule, for the mospacie furthering of his intended purpose. Thus fare the indictment. But whether he was guiltie in part or in all, I haue not to saie.

King Richard being thus disquieted in mind, and doubtful for the surtie of his owne estate, called to remembrance that confederations, honest bands and pacts of amitie, concluded and had betwixt princes and gouernours, are the efficient cause that realmes and common wealths are strengthened with double power, that is, with aid of friends abroad, and their owne forces at home. Whereupon he deuised how to conclude a league and amitie with his neighbour the king of Scots: who not long before had made diuerse incursions and roads into the realme of England. And although he had not much gotten; yet verelie he lost not much. And now euen as king Richard could haue wished, he of himselfe made safe for peace or truce to be had betwixt him and king Richard; who willinglie giuing eare to that sute, commissioners were appointed to meete about the treatie thereof, as in the historie of Scotland it maie appeare.

At length they agreed vpon a truce for three yeeres, and withall for a further increase of firme friendship and sure amitie (betwixt him and the king of Scots) king Richard entered into a treatie also of alliance for the concluding of a marriage betwixt the duke of Northfolke (eldest sonne to the king of Scots) and the ladie Anne de la Pole daughter to John duke of Suffolke and the duchesse Anne, sister to king Richard: which sister he so much fauoured, that studying by all waies and meanes possible how to aduance hir linage, he did not onelie thus seeke to preferre hir daughter in marriage; but also after the death of his sonne, he proclaimed John earle of Lincoln hir sonne and his nephew, heire apparent to the crowne of England, disheriting king Edwards daughters, whose brethren (as ye haue heard) he most wickedlie had caused to be murdered and made awaie.

The king of Scots standing in need of friends, although not so greatlie as king Richard, did willinglie consent to that motion of marriage, first broched by king Richard, inasmuch that it toke effect, and by commissioners was passed and concluded, in maner as in the historie of Scotland it likewise appeareth. But albeit that by this league and amitie thus conuenanted and concluded, it might be thought, that all conspiracies, conirations, and confederacies against king Richard had bene extinct, especiallie considering the duke of Buckingham and his allies were dispatched out of the waie, some by death, and some by flight and banishment into farre countries: yet king Richard, more doubting than trusting to his owne people and friends, was continually bered and troubled in mind for feare of the earle of Richmonds returne: which daillie dread and horrible agonie caused him to liue in dolefull miserie, euer vniquiet, and in maner in continuall calamitie.

Wherefore he intending to be relieved, and to haue an end of all his doubtfull dangers, determined straightlie to extirpate and plucke vp by the roots all the matter and ground of his feare and doubts. Inasmuch that (after long and deliberate consultation had) nothing was for his purpose and intent thought either more necessarie or expedient than once againe with price, praier, and rewards, to attempt the duke of Britaine, in whose territorie the earle of Richmond then abode, to deliuer the said earle into his hands: by which onelie meanes he should be discharged of all feare and perill, and brought to rest and quietnesse both of bodie and mind. Wherefore incontinent he sent certeine ambassadoys to the duke of Britaine, which toke vpon them (beside the great and ample rewards that they brought with them into Britaine) that king Richard should yearelie paie and answere the duke of all the reuenues, rents, and profits of the seignories, lands, and possessions, as well belonging and appertaining to the erle of Richmond, as to anie other noble or gentleman, which then were in the earles companie; if he after that time would keepe them in continuall prison, and restraine them from libertie.

The ambassadoys (furnished with these and other instructions) arrived in Britaine, and came to the dukes house; where with him they could haue no manner of communication concerning their weightie affaires; by reason that he being faint and weakened by a long and daillie infirmite, began a litle to waxe tole and weake in his wit and remembrance. For which cause Peter Landoise his chiefe treasurer, a man both of pregnant wit and great authoritie, ruled and aduised all things at his pleasure and commandement, for which cause (as men set in authoritie be not best beloued) he excited & prouoked against him the malice and euill will of the nobilitie of Britaine, which afterwarde (for diuerse great offenses by him during his authoritie perpetrate & committed) by these meanes was brought to death & confusion.

The English ambassadoys moued their message and request to Peter Landoise, and to him declared their masters commandement, instantlie requiring and humble desiring him (in whose power it late to do all things in Britaine) that he would frendlie assent to the request of king Richard: offering to him the same rewards and lands, that they should haue offered to the duke. This Peter (which was no lesse despised than hated almost of all the people of Britaine) thought that if he did assent & satisfie king Richards petition and desire, he should be of power and abilitie sufficient to withstand and reuell the malicious attempts and disdeinfull inuentions of his enuious aduersaries. Wherefore he faithfullie promised to accomplish king Richards request & desire: so that he kept promise with him, that he might be able to withstand the cankered malice of his secret enemies.

This act that he promised to do, was not for anie grudge or malice that he bare vnto the erle of Richmond: for (as you haue heard before) he deliuered him from the perill of death at saint Palas, when he was in great doubt of life, and leopardie. But as cause artlesse we euer offend, and that cursed hunger of gold, and execrable thirst of lucre, and inward feare of losse of authoritie, diueth the blind minds of couetous men, & ambitious persons to euils and mischiefes innumerable, not remembering losse of god name, obloquie of the people, nor in conclusion the punishment of God for their meritis and deserts. [Which vengeance of God for such fallshood was moze to be feared, than the gaie offers of the king to be desired; for the one was sure to fall, the other was likelie to faile. Wherefore it is wisdome to make choise of a friend, by the rule of the wiseman to be obserued in wine, which is drunke with pleasure when it is old. Neither doth it stand with a mans safetie to trust a friend too farre: for occasions maie fall out wherby he shall become an enimie, as the poet saith:

Hostis erit forsan qui tuum hospes erat.

But fortune was so fauourable to the publike wealth of the realme of England, that this deaillie and dolozous compact toke none effect or place. For while postes ran, and letters were sent to and fro for the finishing of this great enterprise betwene king Richard and Peter Landoise, John spozton bishop of Elic (sojourning then in Flanders) was of all this craftie conuiance certified by his secret and sure friends. Wherefore he sent Christopher Urswike (which at that verie season was come out of Britaine into into fflanders) to declare to the earle of Richmond how all the deceit and craftie working was conueyed and compassed, giuing him charge to counsell and aduise the earle in all hault possible with all his companie to retire out of Britaine into France.

The earle of Denbroke coduktor of the earle of Richmonds com-panie.

When these newes were brought to the earle, he then kept house in Tannes, and incontinent dispatched againe Christopher Urswike vnto Charles the French king, requiring him that he and his might safelie passe into France. Which desire being obtained, the messenger shortly returned to his lord and prince. The earle, well perceiuing that it was expedient and necessarie, with all speed and diligence to looke to this weightie matter, calling verie few to counsell, he made inquirie and search of all secret & by-ways, & sent before all his noble men, as though for a certaine familiaritie and kindnesse they should visit and comfort the duke, which then (for recreation and change of aire) late on the borders and confines of France. And secretlie he gaue charge to the earle of Denbroke, which was the leader and conductor of his companie, that when they approached the marches and limits of Britaine, they should diuert and take the next waie into France.

The noble men somewhat suspicious of things newlie imagined, without any tarieng, scowring the waies as fast as their horses could runne, came out of the duchie of Britaine into the duchie of Anjou in the dominion of France, where they taried the erles comming, which two daies after departed out of Tannes, onelie accompanied with five seruitors, as though he had gone secretlie to visit a familiar friend of his, in a small village adioining. So man suspected that he would depart, considering that a great multitude of Englishmen were left and continued in the citie. But after that he had passed three or four miles forward, he suddenly turned into a solitarie wood next adioining, where clothing himselfe in the simple coat of his page seruant, made and appointed his said minister leader and maister of his small companie, & he as an humble page diligentlie followed and serued his counterfeit gouernor, neither resting nor refreshing themselves, except the basking of their horses, till they by waies vnknewne, now this way, now turning that way, came to their companie abiding them in Angiers.

The fourth day after the earle of Richmond was thus departed, that craftie merchant Peter Landois, thirsting still after his preie promised by king Richard, was ready to set forward his crew of soldiers, which he priuily had consigned, with certaine trafficke captains for that onelie purpose appointed and elected, to performe and atchieue his pretended enterprise; dissembling and feining them to be conducted and hired by him to serue the earle of Richmond, and him to conduct in his returne toward his native countrie: meaning no other thing but to apprehend him, and the other noble men in his retinue, which no such fraud suspected, nor yet anie treason imagined, vnto ware and vnprouided, and destitute of all aid, and them to cast and commit suddenly into continuall captiuitie and bondage, to the intent that by this his wretched and naughtie act, he might satiffie the charitable request and longing desire of good king Richard, more for his owne profit than king Richards gaine.

But when this craftie dissembler Peter Landois, which was no wittier than an old fox, perceiued that the earle was departed (thinking that to be true that he imagined) Lord how curiously ran into euerie coast how light horsemen galloped in euerie street to follow and deteine him, if by anie possibilitie he could be met with and ouertaken, and him to apprehend and bring captiue into the citie of Tannes. The horsemen made such diligence, and with such celeritie set forward their iournie, that nothing was more likele than they to haue obtained, yea and seized their preie. For the earle of Richmond was not entered into the realme of France scarce one houre, but the followers came to the limits and confines of Britaine, and durst adventure no further, but baine (without their desire) sorrowfullie returned.

At which season were left at Tannes about the number of three hundred Englishmen, which not being called to counsell, and vnto ware of this enterprise, but knowing of the earles sudden departure, were so incontinentlie afforced, that in manner they were all in despair, both of him, and their owne libertie and safegard. But fortune turned his faile, and otherwise it happened than their feare them incumbered. For the duke of Britaine, now being somewhat recovered, was sore displeased, and nothing contented, that the earle of Richmond was in his dominion so vn-courteouslie vied and intreated, that he should be by fraud and vntruth compelled to leave and flie out of his duchie and countrie, contrarie to his honour. Wherefore he toke verie great displeasure with Peter Landois his treasurer, to whom (although he knew not, and was ignorant that all the guilt was vniuen and deuised by him) he laid the fault, and imputed the crime.

Hereupon he sent for Edward Mowbray, and Edward Poynings, valiant esquires of England, and deliuered vnto them monie sufficient for their conduct, willing them to conuie the rest of the Englishmen being in Britaine, to the earle of Richmond's presence. When the earle was thus furnished, and appointed with his trustie companie, and was escaped all the dangers, labirinths, and snares that were set for him: no maruell though he were iocund and glad of the prosperous successe that happened in his affaires. Wherefore, least he should seeme to be blotted with the note of ingratitude, he sent diners of his gentlemen to the duke of Britaine, the which should publish and declare to him on the behalfe of the earle, that he and his were onelie by his benefit and fauour conserued and deliuered from the imminent danger that they were like to be trapped in. Wherefore at that time he rendered vnto him his most hartie thanks in words, trusting and not doubting, but in time to come liberallie to recompense him with acts and deeds.

After this, the earle toke his iournie to Charles the French king, lieng then at Langes vpon the river of Loire, to whom (after great thanks giuen for manifold pleasures by him to the earle shewed) he disclosed and manifested the cause and occasion of his access and repaire to his person. After that, he required of him helpe and succour, to the intent that by his immortall benefit to him at that time shewed, he might safelie returne vnto the nobilitie of his realme; of whom he was generallie called to take vpon him the crown & scepter of the realme, which they much hated and abhorred the tyrannie of king Richard. King Charles promised him aid and comfort, and bade him be of good courage, and make good cheare; for he assured him that he would glablie shew to him his beneuolent mind and bountifull liberalitie. Which king from thence remoned to Apontargis, leading with him the earle of Richmond, and all the noble personages of his retinue and faction.

This is that Charles the French king, in whose time France was all adant, for the state of that realme is said, that then it was verie populous in multitudes of men, for wealth and riches euerie particular region most fertile and plentifull, for glorie in armes most flourishing & renowned, a policie well directed, discipline administered, an authoritie dreadfull, and in opinion and hope most mightie; lastlie their general conditions and faculties so well furnished, as perhaps it was not more happie in these mortall felicities since the daies of Charlemaine. It was newlie amplified in euerie one of the three parts wherein all Gall stood diuided by the ancients: for fortie yers before vnder Charles the tenth (a prince for his victories obtained with great dangers called Haplie) Normandie and the duchie of Guen, holden by the Englishmen, were reduced to the obedience of the French crowne. And in the last daies of Lewis the eleuenth, the earldome of Province, the dukedome of Burgognie, almost all Picardie, together with the duchie of Britaine, were by a new mariage inuessed in the power of Charles the eight.]

While the earle was thus attendant in the French court, John Wre earle of Drford, which (as you haue heard before) was by king Edward kept in prison within the castell of Hammes, so perswaded James Blunt capteine of the same fortreffe, and sir John Forsetscue porter of the towne of Calis, that he himselfe was not onelie dismissed and set at libertie, but they also abandoning and leauing their fruitfull offices, did condescend to go with him into France to the earle of Richmond, and to take his part. But James Blunt, like a wise capteine, because he left his wife remaining in the castell before his departure, did fortifie the same both with new munitions, and fresh souldiers. [And here because the names of Wre and Forsetscue are remembred, it shall not be amisse, somewhat out of due place, yet better a little out of order than altogether to omit the same, to adde a supplement for the further perfecting of a report recored in page 693, and adding some light also to this present place touching the said persons, with others.]

Know you therefore, that this sir John Wre earle of Drford (that withdrew himselfe from Barnet field, and with all speed fled into Scotland) in the yere 1473, and the thirteenth of Edward the fourth, did (after he had sometime sojourned there) saile into France, about the borders whereof he was continually hounding, as hoping to win some price (to support his estate) of such passengers as for merchandise cause or otherwise must keepe their course a long the sea. Whose good successe therein did not deceiue his mind. For in the end (what of one and other) hee got such riches and other furniture, as he was able to support a chosen number of followers. Wherewith he (being releued and encouraged to aduenture to set forth in his countrie in despite of king Edward) did with his companie of 397 persons, and with his sale of ships land in the west countrie the last of September, where (partlie by force of his, and partlie through feare of the inhabitants, but mostlie by a subtil shift) he gat and entered the castell of saint Michaels mount, a place of strength, and such an harbourough, as he determined to keepe the same against all assaillants. During the time of his remaine there, he would with his companie manie times descend the hill, and come abrode in the countrie, where (for his loue, for his honour, and for the hatred they bare to king Edward) he was well interteined of manie gentlemen and others of the countrie.

But this matter vnpossible long to be kept in secret, was at the length brought to the knowledge of king Edward; who being somewhat moued, thought in the beginning to withstand such mischance, least suffering too long, & the earle growing to strength, he might be put to as great plunge for the crowne as he had bene twice before: wherewith seeing he was perswaded, he grew resolute to keepe it both by policie and puissance, maugre the open violence and priuite practices as well of his professed as secret enemies.

For he ran through the pikes per he could obtaine it, and offered his bodie to manie desperate perils in hope to get it: which if he had either feared or shunned, it is a matter of demand whether he had euer had it. For pretious things, as principallities and such like, vnlesse they be hereditarie, as they are hardlie kept, so are they not easilie gotten: for he that desirith to gather a rose, must not be tender ouer his fingers because of thornes; and he that would fast honte fresh out of the hieue, must not be scared with the stinging of bees, as the poet verie sweetlie noteth:

Non quisquam fruitur veris odoribus,

Et ybleas latebris nec spoliat fauos,

Sis fronti caueat si timeat rubos,

Armat spina rosas, mella tegunt apes.

Wherefore king Edward gave in charge to Bodingham, ruler of Shirrife of Cornewall, to assemble such power as he could, and besieging the mount, he should either take or kill the earle of Drford. The which the Shirrife did accordingly, but that so feintlie and sauourable, as he permitted the earle of Drford (now in distresse) to reuittell the mount, knowing that there was no waie to expell the earle from thence but by famine. These things thus done (the king not pleased, and the earle not displeased) one Forsetscue (which surname is deduced from the strength of his shield, whereof that familie had first originall) was with a stronger and faithfuller companie sent by king Edward to laie siege to the castell, which he did, and long continued. For it was not easie to be had, being (of it selfe) by nature stronglie set, by policie well vittelled, and by manhood valiantlie defended: which moued the king to assay an other means therefore, and to see if policie might do that which force could not.

For which cause, as Forsetscue still continued the said siege, the king supposed it best (if possible he might) to weaken the earles part, by withdrawing the strength and hearts of his people from him: which might not be done but with rich promises and strong pardons. On which consideration he sent liberallie pardons to them, and in the end so secretlie wrought with the earles men: that if the earle/feared the worst, and iudging it better to trie the kings mercie, than to hazard the extremitie of taking, in which rested nothing but assured death) had not wholie submitted himselfe to king Edward, he had bene by his owne men most dishonestlie betrayed, and suddenlie taken prisoner. Wherupon the earle comming forth to Forsetscue, did there yield himselfe and the castell into the kings hands. At what time/being the sixteenth of Februarie, which from the first entrance of the earle into that castell being the last of September, was about foure moneths and fouretene daies) the same Forsetscue entered the mount, & toke possession thereof, finding it yet sufficientlie vittelled to haue sustained an other siege more than one halfe yere. After all things were thus quieted, the earle, the lord Beaumont, two brothers of the said earle, and Thomas Cliffe, were brought up as prisoners vnto king Edward. And now to our present historie againe.]

When the earle of Richmond saw the earle of Drford, he was causthed with an incredible gladnesse, that he being a man of so high nobilitie, of such knowledge and practices in seates of warre, and so constant, trustie and assured (which alwaie had stood for the maintenance and preferment of the house of Lancaster) was now by Gods prouision deliuered out of captiuitie and imprisonment; and in time so necessarie and conuenient come to his aid, succour, and aduancement; in whome more surer than anie other he might put his trust and confidence, and take lesse paine and trauell in his owne person. For it was not hid from him, that such as cuer had taken part with king Edward before this time, came to do him seruice, either for malice they bare king Richard, or else for feare to liue vnder his cruell rule and tyrannous gouernance.

Not long after, the French king returned againe to Paris, whome the earle of Richmond followed, intending there to solicit his matter to the conclusion. Whereupon he brought king Charles to take vpon him the whole tuition and defense of him and his cause, so that he and his compaignie being (by his means) aided and comforted, should confesse and saie, their wealth, victorie, and advancement to haue botwed and budded forth of his bountifullnesse and liberalitie, which they would (God willing) shortly acquite. In the meane season, diuerse Englishmen, which either fled out of England for feare, or were at Paris to learne and studie goddly literature and vertuous doctrine, came voluntarie and submitted themselves to the earle of Richmond, and botwed & swore to take his part. Amongst whom was Richard for a priest, a man of great wit and no lesse learning, whome the earle incontinent receiued into secret familiaritie, and in brasse time erected and aduanced him to high dignities and promotions, and in conclusion made him bishop of Winchester.

In the meane season, king Richard was credibly advertised, what promises and othes the earle and his confederates had made and sworn together at Reims, and how by the earles means all the Englishmen were passed out of Britaine into France. Wherefore being sore dismayed, and in a manner desperate, because his craftie chieuanee took none effect in Britaine, he imagined & deuised how to infringe and disturbe the earles purpose by an other meane; so that by the marriage of ladie Elizabeth his nece, he should pretend no claime nor title to the crowne. For he thought if that marriage failed, the earles chiefe combe had bene clearely cut. And because that he being blinded with the ambitious desire of rule before this time in obtaining the kingdome, had committed and done manie cursed acts, and detestable tyrannies, yet according to the old proverbe: Let him take the bull that scale awaie the calfe: he thought all facts by him committed in times passed to be but of small moment, and not to be regarded in comparison of that mischeuous imagination, which he now heliole began and attempted.

There came into his vngracious mind a thing not onelie detestable to be spoken of in the remembrance of man, but much more cruell and abominable to be put in execution. For when he reuolued in his waivering mind, how great a founteine of mischeue toward him should spring, if the earle of Richmond should be aduanced to the marriage of his nece: which thing he heard saie by the rumor of the people, that no small number of wise and witty personsages enterprised to compasse and bring to conclusion; he cleerlie determined to reconcile to his fauour his brothers wife queene Elizabeth, either by faire words, or liberall promises; firmelie beleening his fauour once obtained, that he should not flie to commit (and lounglie credit) to him the rule and gouernance both of hir and hir daughters, and so by that meane the earle of Richmond of the affinitie of his nece should be utterlie defrauded and beguiled.

And if no ingenious remedie could be otherwise inuented, to saue the innumerable mischeues which were euen at hand, and like to fall, if it should happen queene Anne his wife to depart out of this present life, then he himselfe would rather take to wife his consine and nece the ladie Elizabeth; than for lacke of that affinitie the whole realme should run to ruine, as who said, that if he once fell from his estate and dignitie, the ruine of the realme must needs shortly insue and follow. Wherefore he sent to the queene (being in sanctuarie) diuerse and often messengers, which first should excuse and purge him of all things before against hir attempted or procured, and after should so largelie promise promotions innumerable, and benefits, not onelie to hir, but also to hir sonne lord Thomas Marquesse Dorset, that they should bring hir (if it were possible) into some wanhope, or (as men saie) into a soles paradise.

The messengers, being men both of wit and grauitie, so perswaded the queene with great and pregnant reasons, & that with faire and large promises, that she began somewhat to relent, and to giue to them no deafe eare; inso much that she faithfullie promised to submit and yield hir selfe fullie and frankly to the kings will and pleasure. And so she putting in oblivion the murder of hir innocent children, the infamie and dishonour spoken by the king hir husband, the liuing in adulterie laid to hir charge, the bastarding of hir daughters; forgetting also the faithfull promise and open oth made to the countesse of Richmond mother to the earle Henrie, blinded by auaricious affection, & seduced by flattering words, first deliuered into king Richards hands hir five daughters, as lambs once againe committed to the custody of the rauenous wolfe.

After she sent letters to the marquesse hir sonne, being then at Paris with the earle of Richmond, willing him in anie wise to leaue the earle, and with out delaie to repaire into England, where for him were provided great honours, and honourable promotions; ascertaining him further, that all offenses on both parts were forgotten and forgiven, and both he and she highlie incorporated in the kings heart. Suerlie the inconstancie of this woman were much to be marvelled at, if all women had bene found constant; but let men speake, yet women of the worse bond of nature will follow their owne sex. [But it was no small allurement that king Richard bled to ouercome hir (for we know by experience that women are of a proud disposition, and that the waie to win them is by promises of preferment) and therefore it is the lesse maruell that he by his wille wit had made conquest of hir waivering will. Besides that, it is to be presumed that she stood in feare to impugne his demands by denials, least he in his malicious mood might take occasion to deale roughly with hir, being a weakie woman, and of a timorous spirit.]

Now when king Richard had thus with glorious promises, and flattering words, pleased and appeased the mutable mind of queene Elizabeth, which knew nothing lesse than that he most intended; he caused all his brothers daughters to be conueied into his palace with sollemne receiuing: as though with his new familiar and louing intertainment they should forget, and in their minds blot out the old committed iniurie, and late executed tyrannie. Now nothing was contrarie and against his diuillish purpose, but that his mansion was not void of his wife, which thing he in any wise aduised necessary to be done. But there was one thing that so much feared and staied him from committing this abominable murder, because (as you haue heard before) he began to counterfet the image of a god and well disposed person: and therefore he was afraid least the sudden death of his wife once openlie knowne, he should lose the good and credible opinion which the people had of him, without anie desert, conceived and reported.

But in conclusion, euill counsell preuailed in a wit latelie minded to mischeue, and turned from all goodnesse. So that his vngracious desire ouercame his his honest feare. And first to enter into the gates of his imagined enterprise, he abstained both from the bed and companie of his wife. When he complained to diuerse noble men of the realme, of the infortunate sterilitie and barrenesse of his wife, because she brought forth no fruit and generation of hir bodie. And in especiall he recounted to Thomas Mothe-ram archbishop of York (whome latelie he had deli-uered out of ward and captiuitie) these impediments of his quene, and diuerse other, thinking that he would reueale to hir all these things, trusting the se-quele hereof to take due effect, that the hearing this grudge of hir husband, & taking therfore an inward thought, would not long lue in this world.

Of this the bishop gathered (which well knew the complexion and vsage of the king) that the quenes daies were short, and that he declared to certeine of his secret friends. After this he procured a common rumour (but he would not haue the author knowne) to be published and spred abroad among the common people, that the quene was dead; to the intent that the taking some conceit of this strange faile, should fall into some sudden sickness or greivous maladie; and to proue if afterwards she should fortune by that or anie other waies to lease hir life, whether the people would impute hir death to the thought or sick-ness, or therof would laie the blame to him. Now when the quene heard tell that so horrible a rumour of hir death was sprung amongst the communitie, she sore suspected and iudged the world to be almost at an end with hir. And in that sorrowfull agonie the with lamentable countenance and sorrowfull cheare, repaired to the presence of the king hir husband, de-manding of him what it should meane, that he had iudged hir worthy to die.

The king answered hir with faire words, and with smiling and flattering leastings comforted hir, and bid hir be of good cheere, for (to his knowledge) she should haue no other cause. But howsoever that it fortune, either by inward thought and pensiuenesse of hart, or by infection of poison (which is affirmed to be most likelie) within few daies after the quene de-parted out of this transitorie life, and was with due solemnitie buried in the church of S. Peter at West-minster. This is the same Anne, one of the daugh-ters of the earle of Marlowe, which (as you haue heard before) at the request of Lewes the French king was married to prince Edward, sonne to king Henrie the first. The king thus (according to his long desire) loosed out of the bonds of matrimonic, began to cast a solisly fantasie to ladie Elizabeth his nace, making much sute to haue hir ioined with him in lawfull matrimonie.

But because all men and the maiden hirselfe most of all detested and abhorred this unlawfull, and in-manner unnatural copulation; he determined to pro-long and defer the matter, till he were in a more quietnesse. For all that verie season he was oppressed with great weightie, and urgent causes, and busines-ses on euerie side; considering that daile, part of the nobilitie sailed into France to the earle of Rich-mond: other prouillie fauoured and aided certeine of the conuiration, so that of his short end few or none were in doubt. And the common people (for the most part) were brought to such desperation, that manie of them had rather be reputed and taken of him in the number of his enimies, than to abide the chance and hazard to haue their goods taken as a spoile of bloodie, by his enimies. [In such hatred they had the wretch, wishing his hart in their hands with the ha-zard of their heads. For how can people saie well or thinke well of tyrants, whose propertie it is to feare them in paces with their clauies, like a wolfe let loose among a fold of sheepe? Wherefore Homer had an eie when he said in pitie sense as here followeth:

Quisquis inhumanis studet intestabilis viti Meritis, huic omnes viuo clam dira precantur: Huic omnes credunt sua insultare perempto.

Amongst the noble men whome he most mistrus-ted, these were the principall. Thomas lord Stanleie, sir William Stanleie his brother, Gilbert Talbot, and sir hundred other: of whose purposes although king Richard were not ignorant, yet he gaue neither confidence nor credence to anie one of them; and least of all to the lord Stanleie, because he was ioined in matrimonie with the ladie Margaret, mother to the earle of Richmond, as afterward apparantlie we may perceiue. For when the said lord Stanleie would haue departed into his countrie to visit his familie, and to recreate and refresh his spirits (as he openlie said, but the truth was, to the intent to be in a perfect readinesse to receiue the earle of Richmond at his first arrivall in England) the king in no wise would suffer him to depart, before he had left as an hostage in the court George Stanleie lord Strange, his first begotten sonne and heire.

While king Richard was thus troubled and vexed with imaginations of the troublous time that was like to come: lo, euen suddenlie he heard newes, that fire was sprung out of the smoke, and the war fierly begun; and that the castell of Hammes was deli-uered into the hands of the earle of Richmond, by the meanes of the earle of Drford; and that not onlie he, but also James Blunt captaine of the castell, were fled into France to aid the earle Henrie. Wherefore he, thinking it great policie to withstand the first burst, sent the most part of the garrison of Calis, to reconer againe by force the castell of Hammes. They which were in the castell, perceiuing their aduerfa-ries to approach, prepared munitions and engines for their defense, and sent also to the earle of Richmond, to aduertise him of their sudden inuasion, requiring him of hastie aid and speedie succour.

The earle sleeping not this first begun assault, sent the earle of Drford with an elected companie of souldiers to raise the siege, and rescue the castell: which at their first arriuing pitched their campe not far from their enimies. Now while king Richards men gaue vigilant eie, waiting least the earle of Drford should take anie aduantage of them that laie on that side of the castell; Thomas Brandon with thirtie appoy-ued men of war by a marsh, which laie on the other side, entered into the castell. The souldiers within greatlie encouraged, & much comforted by this new succour and aid, griued the enimies, by shooting from the walles more than they were accustomed to do. When they of the castell vied their enimies on the fore part: and the earle of Drford no lesse molested & vniquieted them on the other part. Which was the occasion that king Richards men offered (of their owne mere motion) licence to all being within the castell to depart in safetie, with bag and baggage, nothing excepted.

Which condition the earle of Drford, comming onelie for that purpose to deliuer his louing friends out of all perill and danger, and chiefe of all, his old hostesse Jane Blunt, wife to James Blunt the cap-taine, would in no wise forsake or refuse: and so lea-ving the castell bare and ungarnished both of vittels and artillerie, came safelie to the earle of Richmond sojourning in Paris. During this time, king Ri-chard was crediblie informed of his inquisitors and espials, that the earle of Richmond was with long sute in the court of France sore wearied; and desir-ing great aid, could obtaine small reliefe: in somuch that all things went so farre backwards, that such things as were with great diligence (and no lesse de-liberation) purposed and determined to be set forward, were now dashed and overthrowne to the ground.

King Richard either being too light of credence, or seduced and deluded by his craftie tale-tellers, greatly rejoiced, as though he had obtained the over hand of his enemies with triumphant victorie, and thought himselfe neuer so surelie deliuered of all feare and dreadfull imaginations: so that he needed now no more once for that cause either to wake, or to breake his golden sleepe. Wherefore he called home againe his ships of warre, which he had appointed to keepe the narrow seas, and dispatched all such souldiers as he had deputed to keepe certaine garrisons, and to stop certaine passages (as you haue heard before.) Yet lest he might for lacke of prouision be suddenly trapped, he strenghtlie charged and gaue in commandement to all noblemen, and especiallie such as inhabited nere the sea coast, and on the frontiers of Wales, that (according to the vse of the countrye) they should keepe diligent watch and strong ward, to the intent that his aduersaries in no wise should haue any place opportune easilie to take land, without defence or rebutting backe.

For the custome of the countries adioining nere to the sea is (speciallie in the time of warre) on euery hill or high place to erect a beacon with a great lanterne in the top, which may be seene and discerned a great space off. And when the noise is once heard that the enemies approach nere the land, they suddenly put fire in the lanternes, and make shouts and outcries from towne to towne, and from village to village. Some run in post from place to place, admonishing the people to be readie to resist the ieopardie, and defend the perill. And by this policie the same is sone blowne to euery citie and towne, in somuch that aswell the citizens as the rurall people be in short space assembled and armed, to repel and put backe the newe arrived enemies. [Whereas if the necessarie vse of this visible warning were neglected, the policie of the enemies might prouide so preuaile, as that the people should sooner fall into perill irreuerable, than they could thinke on (much lesse prouide) meanes to auoid it.]

But now to returne to our purpose. King Richard thus somewhat eased of his accustomed penitence, began to be a little more merrie, & toke lesse thought and care for outward enemies than he was wont to doe; as who say, that he with politike prouision should withstand the destinie which hong ouer his head, and was ordeined in briefe time suddenly to fall. Such is the force and puissance of diuine iustice, that euery man shall lesse regard, lesse prouide, lesse be in doubt of all things, when he is most nereest punishment, and next to his mischance for his offenses & crimes. [For though God did forbear him a while, yet was that forbearance no acquittance, but rather a time of preparing & making by that which wanted of the plagues that God had purposed in iustice to powre vpon and ouerwhelme him for his foule offenses, which could not scape heauie iudgment & vengeance:

Nam scelus admissum poena seuerâ premit.

About this season, while the earle of Richmond was desiring aid of the French king, certaine noble men were appointed to rule the realme of France, during the minority of king Charles, which amongst themselves were not of one opinion. Of which dissent, Lewis duke of Orleans was the chiefe stirrer, who because he had married ladie Joane sister to the French king, toke vpon him aboue other the rule and administration of the whole realme. By reason of which controuersie, no one man was suffered to rule all. Wherefore the earle of Richmond was compelled to make sute to euery one of the counsell seuerallie one after another, requiring and desiring them of aid and reliefe in his weightie businesse, and so his cause was prolonged and deferred. During which time, Thomas marquisse Dorsset, which was (as you haue heard) inticed by his mother to returne againe into England, partly despairing in the good successe of the earle of Richmond, and partly overcome and vanquished with the faire gloving promises of king Richard: secretlie in the night season stole out of Paris, and with all diligent expedition toke his iourne toward Flanders.

When relation of his departure was made to the earle of Richmond, and the other noble men, no maruell though they were astonied and greatly amazed. Yet that notwithstanding, they required of the French king, that it might be lawfull for them in his name, and by his commandement, to take and staie their companion, confederate, and partaker of all their counsell, in what place within his realme and territorie he ener they could find him. Which petition once obtained, they sent out curroes into euery part, amongst whom Humfreie Cheynie (platerig the part of a good bloudhound) followed the tract of the silver to euen by the sent, that he ouertoke and apprehended him not far from Campeigne; and so what with reason, and what with faire promises, being perswaded, he returned againe to his companions.

The earle of Richmond unburdened of this misadventure, least by lingering of daies, and prolonging of time, he might lose the great opportunity of things to him offered and ministered: also lest he should further wound and molest the minds of his faithfull and assured friends, which daily did expect and tarie for his coming, determined no longer to protract and deferre the time; but with all diligence and celeritie attempted his begun enterprise. And so obtaining of king Charles a small crew of men, and borrowing certaine summes of monie of him, and of diuerse other his priuate friends, for the which he left as debter (or more likelie as a pledge or hostage) lord Thomas marquisse Dorsset (whome he halfe mistrusted) and sir John Bourchier, he departed from the French court, and came to the citie of Rhone.

While he taried there, making prouision at Harflet in the mouth of the riuer of Sene for all things necessarie for his nanie, tidings were brought to him that king Richard (being without children, & now a widower) intended shortly to marie the ladie Elizabeth his brothers daughter; and to prefer the ladie Cecile his sister to a man found in a cloud, and of an unknowne linage and familie. He toke these newes as a matter of no small moment; and so (all things considered) it was of no lesse importance than he toke it for. For this thing onelie toke awaie from him and all his companions their hope and courage, that they had to obtaine an hapie enterprise. And therefore no maruell though it nipped him at the berie stomach: when he thought, that by no possibilitie he might attaine the mariage of any of his daughters, which was the strongest foundation of his building; by reason whereof he iudged that all his friends in England would abandon and thinke from him.

Wherefore, making not mantle of his counsell, after diuerse consultations, he determined not yet to set forward: but to tarie and attempt how to get more aid, more friends, and more stronger succours. And amongst all other, it was thought most expedient to allure by assinitie in his aid, as a companion in armes, sir Walter Herbert, a man of an ancient stocke, & of great power among the Welch, who had with him a faire ladie to his sister, of age ripe to be coupled with him in matrimonie. And for the attaining of this purpose, messengers were secretlie sent to Henrie earle of Northumberland (which had been foze married another sister of sir Walter Herberts) to the intent that he should set forward all this devise and purpose: but the waies were so narrowlie watched, and so manie spies laid, that the messenger proceeded not in his iourne and businesse.

But in the meane season, there came to the earle a more sofull message from Morgan Isiduelle, learned in the temporall law, which declared that Rice ap Thomas, a man of no lesse valiantnesse than actiuitie, and John Sauage an approued capteine, would with all their power be partaker of his quarrell. And that Reginald Bric had collected and gotten togither no small summe of monie for the payment of the wages to the souldiers and men of warre: admoynishing him also to make quicke expedition, and to take his course directlie into Wales. The earle of Richmond, because he would no longer linger and wearie his frends, liuing continuallie betwene hope and feare, determined in all conuenient hast to set forward, and caried to his ships armes, weapons, 20 bittels, and all other ordinances expedient for warre.

After that all things were in readinesse, the earle being accompanied onelie with two thousand men, and a small number of ships, laded vp his anchors, and halied vp his sailles in the moneth of August, and sailed from Harflet with so prosperous a wind, that the seuenth daie after his departure, he arrived in Wales in the euening, at a place called Milford hauen, and incontinent toke land, and came to a place called Dulle; where he heard saie that a certeine companie of his aduersaries were laid in garison to defend his arrivall all the last winter. And the earle at the sunne rising remoued to Hereford west, being distant from Dulle not full ten miles, where he was sofullie receiued of the people, and he arrived there so suddenlie, that he was come and entered the towne at the same time when the citizens had but knowledge of his coming.

Here he heard newes, which were as vntrue as they trulie were reported to him in Normandie; that Rice ap Thomas, and John Sauage, with bodie and goods, were determined to aid king Richard. While he and his companie were some what astonied at these new tidings, there came such message from the inhabitants of the towne of Penbroke, that refreshed and reuiued their frosen harts and daunted courages. For Arnold Butler a valiant capteine, which first asked pardon for his offenses before time committed against the earle of Richmond, and that obtained, declared to him that the Penbrochians were ready to serue and giue their attendance on their natural and immediat lord Jasper earle of Penbroke. The earle of Richmond, hauing his armie thus increased, departed from Hereford west to the towne of Cardigan, being five miles distant from thence.

While the souldiers were refreshing and trimming themselves in their campe, strange tidings spiong among them without anie certeine author; that sir Walter Herbert, which laie with a great crue of men at Carmarden, was now with a great armie ready to approach and bid them battell. With which newes the armie was soze troubled, and euerp man assaied his armour and proued his weapon, and were prest to defend their enemies. And as they were in this fearfull doubt, certeine hostlemen, which the earle had sent to make inquirie and search, returned and reported all the countrie to be quiet, and no let nor impediment to be laid or cast in their iourne. And euen at the same time, the whole armie was greatly recomforted, by reason that the coming of Richard Griffith, a man of great nobilitie, the which notwithstanding that he was confederate with sir Walter Herbert, and Richard ap Thomas, yet at that berie instant he came to the earle of Richmond with all his companie, which were of no great number. After him the same daie came John Morgan with his men.

Then the earle advanced forward in god hast, making no repose or abode in anie one place. And to the intent to passe forward with sure and short expedition, he assaulted euerie place where his enemies had set anie men of warre; which with small force, and lesse difficultie, he byieslie did overcome & vanquish. And suddenlie he was by his espials ascertained, that sir Walter Herbert, and Rice ap Thomas were in harnesse before him, ready to encounter with his armie, and to stop their passage. Wherefore like a valiant capteine he first determined to set on them, and either to destroe or to take them into his fauour, and after with all his power and puissance to giue battell to his mostall enimie king Richard. But to the intent his frends should know in what readinesse he was, and how he proceeded forward; he sent of his most secret and faithfull seruants with letters and instructions to the ladie spargaret his mother, to the lord Stanleie and his brother, to sir Gilbert Talbot, and to other his trustie frends; declaring to them that he being succoured and holpen with the aid and reliefe of his frends, intended to passe ouer the riuer of Seuerne at Shrewesburie, and so to passe directlie to the citie of London.

Wherefore he required them, as his speciall trust and confidence was fixed in the hope of their fidelitie, that they would meet him by the waie with all diligent preparation; to the intent that he and they, at time and place conuenient, might communicate together the depenense of all his doubtfull and weightie businesse. When the messengers were dispatched with these commandements and admonitions, he marched forward toward Shrewesburie: and in his passing, there met and saluted him Rice ap Thomas with a goodlie band of Welshmen, which making oath and promise to the earle, submitted himselfe wholly to his order and commandement. For the earle of Richmond two daies before made to him promise, that if he would sweare to take his part and be obedient to him, he would make him chief gouernour of Wales: which part as he faithfullie promised and granted, so after that he had obtained and possessed the realme and diademe he liberallie performed and accomplished the same.

In the meane time the messengers, that were sent, diligentlie executed their charge, and laden with rewards of them to whom they were sent, returned to him the same day that he entered into Shrewesburie: and made relation to him that his frends were ready in all points to do all things for him, which either they ought or might do. The earle Henrie brought in god hope with this pleasant message, continued forth his intended iourne, and came to a little towne called Newport, and pitching his campe on a little hill adioining, reposed himselfe there that night. In the euening the same daie came to him sir Gilbert Talbot, with the whole power of the young earle of Shrewesburie, then being in ward, which were accounted to the number of two thousand men. And thus his power increasing, he arrived at the towne of Stafford, and there paused.

There also came sir William Stanleie accompanied with a few persons. And after that the earle and he had communed no long time together; he reuerted to his souldiers, whom he had assembled together to serue the earle: which from thence departed to Lichfield, and lay without the walles in his campe all the night. The next morning he entered into the towne, and was with all honoz like a prince receiued. A daie or two before, the lord Stanleie, hauing in his hand almost five thousand men, lodged in the same towne. But hearing that the erle of Richmond was marching thitherward, gaue to him place, dislodging him and his, and repaired to a towne called Aderstone, there abiding the coming of the erle. And this wille for did this act, to avoid all suspicion on king Richards part.

For the lord Stanleie was afraid, least if he should seeme openlie to be a fautor or aider to the erle his sonne in law, before the day of the battell, that king Richard, which yet vtterlie did not put in him diffidence and mistrust, would put to some cruell death his sonne and heire apparant George lord Strange, whome king Richard (as you haue heard before) kept with him as a pledge or hostage, to the intent that the lord Stanleie his father should attempt nothing peiudiciall to him. King Richard at this season keeping his house in the castle of Nottingham, was informed that the erle of Richmond, with such banished men as were fled out of England to him, were now arrived in Wales, and that all things necessarie to his enterprise were improuided, unpurueied, and verie weake, nothing meet to withstand the power of such as the king had appointed to meet him.

contemne-th the erle and his power.

This rumour so inflated his mind, that in maner disdaining to heare speake of so small a companie, he determined at the first to take little or no regard to this so small a sparkle, declaring the erle to be innocent and vnwise, because that he rashly attempted such a great enterprise with so small and thin a number of warlike persons: and therefore he gaue a definitive sentence, that when he came to that point that he should be compelled to fight against his will, he either should be apprehended alieue, or else by all likelihood he should of necessitie come to a shamefull confusion: and that he trusted to be shortly done by sir Walter Herbert, and Rice ap Thomas, which then ruled Wales with equall power and like authoritie.

But yet reuoluing and casting in his mind, that a small war begun and winked at, and not regarded, maie turne to a great broile and trouble; and that it was prudent policie not to contemne and disdaine the little power and small weaknesse of the enimie (be it neuer so small) thought it necessarie to prouide for afterclaps that might happen & chance. [For victorie doth not alwaies follow the greatest multitude, neither is it a necessarie consequent, that the biggest bodie is indued with most force. For we see that the small viper is the huge buls deadly bane, and a little cure doth catch a boze bolserous and big; as the poet properlie (and to the purpose) verie well saith:

Ouid.

Parsua necat morsu spatio sum vipera tantum, A cane non magno sepe tenetur aper.

The king sendeth of men.

Wherefore he sent to John duke of Norfolk, Henrie erle of Northumberland, Thomas erle of Surrie, and to other of his especiall & trustie friends of the nobilitie, which he iudged moze to preferre and esteeme his wealth and honour, than their owne riches and pinate commoditie; willing them to muster and biew all their seruants and tenants, and to elect and chose the most couragious and aduie persons of the whole number, and with them to repaire to his presence with all speed and diligence. Also he wrote to Robert Bakenberie lieutenant of the Tower, commanding him with his power to come to his armie, and to bring with him (as fellows in armes) sir Thomas Bourchier, & sir Walter Hungerford, and diuerse other knights and esquires, in whom he cast no small suspicion.

Now while he was thus ordering his affaires, tidings came that the erle of Richmond was passed Seuerne, & come to Shrewesburie without anie detriment or incumbiance. At which message he was sore moued and boyled with melancholie and dolor, crieng out, & asking vengeance of them that against their oth and promise had so deceiued him. For which cause he began to haue diffidence in other, insomuch that he determined himselfe out of hand the same daie to meet with and resist his aduersaries: and in all haste sent out espials to biew and espie what waie his enimies kept and passed. They diligently doing their dutie, shortly after returned, declaring to the king that the erle was incamped at the towne of Lichfield.

When he had perfect knowledge where the erle with his armie was sojourning, he hauing continued all repaire of his subjects to him, began incontinentlie without delate to marshall and put in order his battels (like a balliant capteine and politike leder) and first he made his battels to set forward, fure and fure in a ranke, marching toward that way where his enimies (as was to him reported) intended to passe. In the middle part of the armie, he appointed the traffike and cartage pertaining to the armie. Then he (intrenched with his gard) with a frowning countenance and cruell visage, mounted on a great white courser, and followed with his footmen, the wings of horsemen coasting and ranging on euerie side: and keeping this arrate, he with great pompe entered the towne of Leicester after the sunne set [full of indignation & malice, which vttered it selfe from the inward hart by the mouth, out of which flowed speaches of horrible heate, tempered with cruell threatenings, equall to his of whome it was thus said long ago:

Horrebant seuis omnia verba minis.]

The erle of Richmond raised his campe, and departed from Lichfield to the towne of Tamworth: thereto nere adioining, and in the mid way passing, there saluted him sir Walter Hungerford, and sir Thomas Bourchier knights, and diuerse other which yielded and submitted themselves to his pleasure. For they, being aduertised that king Richard had them in suspicion and gelousie, a little beyond stonie Stratford left and forsooke pituallie their capteine Robert Bakenberie; and wandering by night, and in maner by vnknowne paths, and vncertaine waies searching, at the last came to erle Henrie. Diuerse other noble personages, which inwardlie hated king Richard worse than a tode or a serpent, did likewise resort to him with all their power and strength: nothing and working his destruction, who otherwise would haue bene the instrument of their casting away.

There happened in this progression to the erle of Richmond a strange chance worthy to be noted. For albeit he was a man of valiant courage, & that his armie increased, and daillie moze and moze he waxed mightier and stronger; yet he was not a little afraid, because he could in no wise be assured of his father in law Thomas lord Stanleie, which for feare of the destruction of the lord Strange his sonne (as you haue heard) as yet inclined to neither partie. For if he had gone to the erle, and that notified to king Richard, his sonne had bene shortly executed. Wherefore he accompanied with twentie light horsemen lingered in his iournie, as a man musing & imagining what was best to be done. And the moze to aggravate his pensiuenesse, it was shewed him, that king Richard was at hand with a strong power & a great armie.

While he thus heauilie dragged behind his hof, the whole armie came before the towne of Tamworth; and when he for the deepe darknesse could not perceiue the steps of them that passed on before, and had wandered hither & thither, seeking after his companie, and yet not once hearing anie noise or whispering of them; he turned to a verie little villiage, being about thre miles from his armie, taking great thought, and much fearing least he should be espyed, and so trapped by king Richards scout watch. There he he taried all night, not once aduenturing to aske or dem and a question of any creature, he being no more amayed with the icopardie & perill that was passed, than with this present chance, soze feared that it shuld be a prognostication or signe of some infortunate plage after ward to succed. As he was not merie being absent from his armie, so likewise his armie much marvelled, and no lesse mourned for his suddenn absence.

The next morning earlie in the dawning of the day he returned, and by the conduct of god fortune, espied and came to his armie, excusing himselfe not to have gone out of the way by ignorance: but that for a policie (denied for the nonce) he went from his campe to receiue some glad newlage from certeine of his priuie friends and secret allies. This excuse made, he prouillie departed againe from his host to the towne of Aberfcon, where the lord Stanleie and sir William his brother with their bands were abiding. There the erle came first to his father in law, in a litle close, where he saluted him, and sir William his brother: and after diuerse and frendlie imbracings, each reioised of the state of other, and suddennlie were surprised with great ioy, comfort, and hope of fortunate successe in all their affaires and doings. Afterward they consulted together how to giue battell to king Richard if he would abide, whome they knew not to be farre off with an huge host.

In the euening of the same day, sir John Sauage, sir Brian Sanfozd, sir Simon Digbie, and manie other, leauing king Richard, turned and came to the part of the earle of Richmond, with an elect compaignie of men. Which refusall of king Richards part, by men of such experience, did augment and increase both the god hope, and the puissance of the earle of Richmond. In the meane season, king Richard which was appointed now to finish his last labor, by the very diuine iustice & prouidence of God (which called him to condigne punishment for his mischievous deserts) marched to a place meet for two battells to encounter, by a village called Bosworth, not farre from Leicester: and there he pitched his field on a hill called Anne Weame, refreshed his souldiers, and toke his rest.

The same went, that he had the same night a dreadfull and terrible dreame: for it seemed to him being asleepe, that he did see diuerse images like terrible diuels, which pulled and haled him, until suffering him to take anie quiet or rest. The which strange vision not so suddennlie strake his heart with a sudden feare, but it stuffed his head and troubled his mind with manie busie and dreadfull imaginations. For incontinent after, his heart being almost damped, he prognosticated before the doubtfull chance of the battell to come; not vsing the alacritie and mirth of mind and countenance as he was accustomed to doe before he came toward the battell. And least that it might be suspected that he was abashed for feare of his enemies, and for that cause looked so pitiouslie; he recited and declared to his familiar friends in the morning his wonderfull vision and fearefull dreame.

But I thinke this was no dreame, but a punishment and pricke of his sinfull conscience: for the conscience is so much more charged and aggravated, as the offense is greater & more heinous in degree. [So that king Richard, by this reckoning, must needs haue a wonderfull troubled mind, because the deeds that he had done, as they were heinous and unnatural, so did they excite and stirre by extraordinary motions of trouble and verasions in his conscience.] Which sting of conscience, although it strike not alwaie; yet at the last daie of extreame life, it is wont to shew and represent to vs our faults and offenses, and the paines and punishments which hang ouer our heads for the committing of the same, to the intent that at that instant, we for our deserts being penitent and repentant, maie be compelled (lamenting and bewailing our sinnes like forakers of this world) to cund to depart out of this mischæe life.

Now to returne againe to our purpose. The next daie after, king Richard being furnished with men & all ablements of warre, bying all his men out of their campe into the plaine, ordered his foreward in a maruellous length, in which he appointed both horsemen and footmen, to the intent to imprint in the hearts of them that looked a farre off, a sudden terror and deadlie feare, for the great multitude of the armed souldiers: and in the fore-front he placed the archers like a strong fortified trench or bulwourke.ouer this battell was capteine, John duke of Norfolk, with whome was Thomas earle of Surrie his sonne. After this long vant-gard, followed king Richard himselfe with a strong compaignie of chosen and approued men of warre, hanning horsemen for wings on both sides of his battell.

After that the earle of Richmond was departed from the communication of his friends (as you haue heard before) he began to be of a better stomach, and of a more baltant courage, and with all diligence pitched his field iust by the campe of his enemies, and there he lodged that night. In the morning betimes, he caused his men to put on their armour, and apparel themselves readie to fight and giue battell; and sent vnto the lord Stanleie (which was now come with his band into a place indifferent betwene both the armies) requiring him with his men to approach naxre to his armie, and to helpe to set the souldiers in arrate. But he answered that the earle should set his owne men in god order of battell, while he would arrate his compaignie, and come to him in time conuenient. Which answer made otherwise than the earle thought or would haue indged, considering the oportunitie of the time & the weight of the businesse. And although he was therewithall a litle vbered, & began somewhat to hang the head; yet he without anie time delaing, compelled of necessitie, after this manner instructed and ordered his men.

He made his foreward somewhat single and slender, according to the small number of his people. In the front he placed the archers, of whome he made capteine John earle of Drenford. To the right wing of the battell he appointed sir Gilbert Talbot to be the leader. To the left wing, he assigned sir John Sauage, who had brought thither with him a crue of right able personages, clad in white coats and hoods, which mustered in the eyes of their aduersaries right humilie. The earle of Richmond himselfe, with aid of the lord Stanleie, gouerned the battell, accompanied with the earle of Denbroke, hauing a good compaignie of horsemen, and a small number of footmen. For all his whole number exceeded not five thousand men, beside the power of the Stanleies, wherof three thousand were in the field, vnder the standard of sir William Stanleie. The kings number was double so much and more. When both these armies were thus ordered, and all men readie to set forward, king Richard called his chiefeins together, and to them said as followeth.

and type of this famous realme, and noble region: by whose puissance & baliantnesse I haue inioind and possessed the state roiall & dignitie of the same, maugre the ill will and seditious attempts of all my cankered enemies, and insidious aduersaries: by whose prudent & politike counsell I haue so gouerned my realme, people, & subiects, that I haue omitted nothing apperteyning to the office of a iust prince; nor you haue pretermitted nothing belonging to the dutie of wise and sage counsellors. So that I maie saie, and trulie affirme, that your approued fidelitie & tried constancie, maketh me to beleue firmelie, and thinke that I am an vndoubted king, and an indubitate prince.

And although in the adeption and obtaining of the garland, I being seduced, and prouoked by sinister counsell, and diabolical temptation, did commit a wicked and detestable act: yet I haue with streit penance and salt tears (as I trust) expiated & clereleie purged the same offense: which abhominable crime I require you of friendship as clereleie to forget, as I daile remember to deploze and lament the same. If ye will euen now diligentlie call to remembrance in what case and perplexitie we do stand; and in what doubtfull perill we be all intrapped; I doubt not but you in heart will thinke, and with mouth confesse, that if euer amitie and faith preuailed betwene prince and subiects, or betwene subiect and subiect; or if euer bond of allegiance obliged the bassall to loue and serue his naturall souereigne lord; or if anie obligation of dutie bound anie prince to aid & defend his subiects; all these loues, bonds, and duties of necessitie are now this day to be tried, shewed, and put in experience.

For if wise men saie true (as they do not lie) there is some policie in getting, but much more in keeping; the one being but fortunes chance, & the other high wit and policie. For which cause, I with you, and you with me, must needs this day take labour and paine, to keepe and defend with force, that preheminance and possession, which by your prudent deuises I haue gotten & obtained. I doubt not but you know how the diuell (continuall enimie to humane nature, disturber of concord, & sower of sedition) hath entered into the heart of an vnknowne Welshman (whose father I neuer knewe, nor him personallie saw) exciting him to aspire and couet our realme, crowne, and dignitie, and thereof clereleie to depriue and spoile vs and our posteritie. Ye see further, how a companie of traitors, theues, outlawes, and runnagates of our owne nation, be aiders and partakers of his feat and enterprize, readie at hand to ouercome and oppresse vs.

You see also, what a number of beggerlie Britans and faint-hearted Frenchmen be with him arrited to destroe vs, our wiues and children. Which imminent mischeifs and apparant inconueniences, if we will withstand & resell, we must liue together as brethren, fight together like lions, & feare not to die together like men. And obseruing and keeping this rule and precept, beleue me, the fearefull hare neuer fled faster before the greedie greihound, nor the fillie larke before the sparrowhawk, nor yet the simple sheepe before the rauenous wolfe; than your proud bragging aduersaries, astonied and amazed with the onelie sight of your manlie visage, will flee, run, and skir out of the field. For if you consider and wisely ponder all things in your mind, you shall perceiue, that we haue manifest causes, and apparant tokens of triumph and victorie.

And to begin with the erle of Richmond captaine of this rebellion, he is a Welsh milkesop, a man of small courage, and of lesse experience in martiall acts and feats of warre, brought up by my mothers meanes, and mine, like a captiue in a close cage in the court of Francis duke of Britaine; and neuer saw armie, nor was exercised in martiall affaires: by reason whereof he neither can, nor is able by his owne will or experience to guide or rule an host. For in the wit and policie of the captaine consisteth the chiefe adeption of the victorie, and ouerthrow of the enemies. Secondly feare not, but put awaie all doubts; for when the traitors and runnagates of our realme, shall see vs with banner displayed come against them, remembering their oath, promise, and fidelitie made vnto vs, as to their souereigne lord and annointed king; they shall be so pricked and stung in the bottome of their scrupulous consciences, that they for verie remorse and dread of the diuine plague, will either shamefullie flee, or humble submit themselves to our grace and mercie.

And as for the Frenchmen and Britans, their baliantnesse is such, that our noble progenitors, and your baliant parts haue them oftener banquished and overcome in one moneth, than they in the beginning imagined possible to compass and finish in a whole yeare. What will you make of them: braggers without audacitie, drunkards without discretion, ribalds without reason, cowards without resisting, and in conclusion, the most effeminate and lasciuious people that euer shewed themselves in front of battell; ten times more courageous to flee & escape, than once to assault the breast of our strong & populous armie. Wherefore considering all these advantages, expell out of your thoughts all doubts, auoid out of your minds all feare; and like baliant champions aduance forth your standards, & assaie whether your enemies can decide and trie the title of battell by dint of sword. Aduance (I say againe) forward my captains, in whome lacketh neither policie, wisdom, nor yet puissance. Euerie one giue but one sure stripe, & such like iournie is ours. What preuaileth a handfull to a whole realme?

Desiring you (for the loue that you beare to me) and the affection that you haue to your native and naturall countrie, and to the safeguard of your prince & your selues, that you will this daie take to you your accustomed courage and couragious spirits, for the defense and safeguard of vs all. And as for me, I assure you, this daie I will triumph by glorious victorie, or suffer death for immortall fame. For they be maintained out of the palace of fame disgraced, dieng without renoume, which do not asmuch prefer and exalt the perpetual honour of their native countrie, as their owne mortall and transitorie life. Now saint George to bozow, let vs set forward, and remember well, that I am he which shall with high aduancements reward and preferre the balaunt and hardie champions, and punish and torment the shamefull cowards, and dreadfull standards.

This exhortation incouraged all such as fauoured him; but such as were present (more for dread than loue) kissed them openlie, whome they inwardlie hated. Other swore outwardlie to take part with such, whose death they secretlie compassed, and inwardlie imagined. Other promised to inuade the kings enemies, which fled and fought with fierce courage against the king. Other stood still and looked on, intending to take part with the victors and overcomers. So was his people to him vntrue and vnfaithfull at his end, as he was to his nephues vntrue and vnfaithfull in his beginning. [How then was it possible that this princes regiment could long stand, seeing the preservation and prologation of his reigne consisted not in the loue of his subiects? In place whereof because feare (yea seruile and forced feare succeeded) he was the sooner forsaken of his people, whose hearts fell from him as icicles from a penthouse in a sunnie daie; and in this case the poet saith truelie, and was well worthy of credit when he craued it, saying:

Credite quem metuit quisq; perire cupit.

When the earle of Richmond knew by his foreriders that the king was so nere imbatelled, he rode about his armie from ranke to ranke, & from wing to wing, giuing comfortable words to all men, and that finished (being armed at all peeces, sauing his helmet) mounted on a little hill, so that all his people might see and behold him perfectlie, to their great reioicing. For he was a man of no great stature, but so formed and decorated with all gifts and lineaments of nature, that he seemed more an angelicall creature, than a terrestriall personage. His countenance and aspect was cherefull and couragious, his haire yellow like the burnished gold, his eyes graie shining and quicke, prompt and readie in answering, but of such sobrietie, that it could neuer be iudged whether he were more dull than quicke in speaking (such was his temperance). Now when he had overlooked his armie ouer euerie side, he paused awhile, and after with a lowd voice and bold spirit spake to his companions these, or the like words following.

The oration of king Henrie the seventh to his armie.

If euer God gaue victorie to men fighting in a iust quarrell, or if he euer aided such as made warre for the wealth & fission of their owne naturall and nutritiue countrie, or if he euer succoured them which aduentured their liues for the releefe of innocents, suppressing of malefactors and apparant offenders; no doubt my fellowes & friends, but he of his bountifull goodnesse will this daie send vs triumphant victorie, and a luckie iourne ouer our prouid enemies, and arrogant aduersaries: for if you remember and consider the verie cause of our iust quarrell, you shall apparantlie perceiue the same to be true, godlie, and vertuous. In the which I doubt not, but God will rather aid vs (yea and fight for vs) than let vs be banquished and ouerthrowne by such as neither feare him nor his laws, nor yet regard iustice or honestie.

Our cause is so iust, that no enterprisse can be of more vertue, both by the lawes diuine & ciuill. For what can be a more honest, goodlie, or godlie quarrell, than to fight against a capteine, being an homicide and murtherer of his owne bloud or progenie, an extream destroyer of his nobilitie, and to his and our countrie and the poze subiects of the same a deadlie mallet, a drie brand, and a burthen intollerable? Beside him, consider who be of his band and company: such as by murther and vntrueth committed against their owne kin and lineage, yea against their prince and souereigne lord, haue disherited me and you, and wrongfullie deteine and vsurpe our lawfull patrimonie & lineall inheritance. For he that calleth himselfe king, keepeth from me the crowne and regiment of this noble realme and countrie, contrarie to all iustice and equitie.

Likewise, his mates and friends occupie your lands, cut downe your woods, and destroye your manors, letting your wiues and children range abroade for their liuing: which persons for their penance and punishment I doubt not, but God of his goodnes will ether deliuer into our hands, as a great gaine and bootie; or cause them (being graued and compuncted with the pricke of their corrupt consciences) cowardlie to flie, and not abide the battell. Beside this I assure you, that there be yonder in the great battell, men brought thither for feare, and not for loue; souldiers by force compelled, and not with good will assembled; persons which desire rather the destruction than saluation of their maister and capteine: and finally, a multitude, whereof the most part will be our friends, and the least part our enemies.

For truelie I doubt which is greater, the malice of the souldiers toward their capteine; or the feare of him conceived of his people. For suerlie this rule is infallible, that as ill men daile couet to destroye the good; so God appointeth the good men to confound the ill. And of all wofullie goods the greatest is to suppress tyrants, and releue innocents; whereof the one is as much hated, as the other is beloued. If this be true (as clearkes preach) who will spare spare yonder tyrant Richard duke of Glocester, vntruelie calling himselfe king, considering that he hath violatid and broken both the lawes of God and man: What vertue is in him which was the confusion of his brother, and murtherer of his ne-phues: What mercie is in him that sleieth his trustie frends as well as his extreame enemies: Who can haue confidence in him which putteth diffidence in all men:

If you haue not read, I haue heard good clarkes saie, that Tarquine the proud for the vice of the bodie lost the kingdome of Rome; and the name of Tarquine banished the citie for euer: yet was not his fault so detestable as the fact of cruell Pero, which slue his own mother, and opened his entrailles, to behold the place of his conception. Behold yonder Richard, which is both Tarquine and Pero: yea a tyrant more than Pero, for he hath not onlie murthered his nephue being his king and souereigne lord, bastarded his noble bethzen, and defamed the wombe of his vertuous and womanlie mother; but also compassed all the meanes and waies that he could inuent, how to defile and carnallie know his owne nere, vnder the pretense of a cloked matrimonie, which ladie I haue swozne and promised to take to my make and wife, as you all know and beleue.

If this cause be not iust, and this quatell godlie; let God (the giuer of victorie) iudge and determine. We haue (thanks be gi-uen to Christ) escaped the secret treasons in Britaine, and auoided the subtil snares of our fraudulent enemies there, passed the troublous seas in good and quiet safegard, and without resistance haue ouergone the ample region & large countrie of Wales, and are now come to the place which we so much desired: for long we haue sought the furious boze, and now we haue found him. Wherefore let vs not feare to enter into the toile, where we may fuerlie sleie him; for God knoweth that we haue liued in the bales of miserie, tossing our ships in dangerous stormes: let vs not now dread to let bp our full sailes in faire weather, hauing with vs both God and good fortune.

If we had come to conquer Wales and had atchiued it, our praise had bene great, and our gaine more: but if we win this battell, the whole rich realme of England, with the lords and rulers of the same, shall be ours, the profit shall be ours, and the honour shall be ours. Therefore labour for your gaine, & sweat for your right. While we were in Britaine, we had small liuings and little plentie of wealth or welfare; now is the time come to get abundance of riches, and copie of profit; which is the reward of your seruice, and merit of your paines. And this remember with your selues, that before vs be our enemies; and on either side of vs be such, as I neither fuerlie trust, nor greatlie beleue, backe-ward we cannot flee: so that here we stand like shepe in a fold, circumvented and com-passed betwene our enemies and our doul-full friends.

Therefore let all feare be set aside, and like swozne bethzen let vs ioine in one: for this daie shall be the end of our trauell, and the gaine of our labour, either by honorable death or famous victorie: and as I trust, the battell shall not be so slowe, as the profit shall be sweet. Remember that victorie is not gotten with the multitudes of men, but with the courages of hearts, and baliante of minds. The smaller that our number is, the more glorie is to vs if we banquish: if we be overcome, yet no laud is to be attributed to the victors, considering that ten men fought against one. And if we die so gloriois a death in so good a quarell, neither fretting time, nor cancarding obliuion, shall be able to darken or rase out of the booke of fame either our names, or our godlie attempt. And this one thing I assure you, that in so iust and good a cause, and so notable a quarrell, you shall find me this daie rather a dead carrion vpon the cold ground, than a free prisoner on a carpet in a ladies chamber.

Let vs therefore fight like inuincible giants, and let on our enemies like vtimo-rous tigers, & banish all feare like rapping lions. And now aduance forward true men against traitors, pitifull persons against murtherers, true inheritors against blurpers, the scourges of God against tyrants. Displaine my banner with a good courage, march forth like strong and robustious champions, and begin the battell like hardie conquerors. The battell is at hand, and the victorie appoeth; and if we shamefullie recule, or cowardlie flee; we and all our sequele be destroyed, and dishonored for euer. This is the daie of gaine, and this is the time of losse; get this daie victorie, and be conquerors: and lese this daies battell, and be villaines. And therefore in the name of God and S. George, let euerie man couragioullie aduance forth his standard.

These cherefull words he set forth with such gesture of his bodie, & smiling countenance, as though alreadie he had vanquished his enemies, and gotten the spoile. He had scantlie finished his saying, but the one armie spied the other. And how hastilie the soldiers buckled their healmes, how quicklie the archers bent their bowes and thrust the feethers, how readi-lie the bilmen shooke their billes, and proued their scaues, readie to approach and toine, when the terrible trumpet should sound the bloudie blast to victorie or death! Betwixte both armies there was a great marish then (but at this present, by reason of dikes cast, it is growne to be firme ground) which the carle of Richmond left on his right hand; for this intent, that it should be on that side a defense for his part, and in so doing he had the sunne at his backe, and in the faces of his enemies. When king Richard saw the earles compaignie was passed the marsh; he did command with all hast to set vpon them. Then the trumpets sounded, and the soldiers shouted, and the kings archers couragiously let fite their arrowes. The earles bowmen stood not still, but paid them home againe.

The terrible shot once passed, the armies joined and came to hand-strokes, where neither sword nor bill was spared. At which encounter, the lord Stanleie joined with the earle. The earle of Orford in the meane season, fearing lest while his companie was fighting, they should be compassed and circumuented with the multitude of the enemies, gave commandement in euerie ranke, that no man should be so hardie, as to go about ten foot from the standard. Which commandement once knowen, they knit themselves together, and ceased a little from fighting. The aduersaries suddenly abashed at the matter, and mistrusting some fraud and deceit, began also to pause and lest striking; and not against the wills of manie, which had rather had the king destroyed, than saved, and therefore they fought verie familie, or stood still.

The earle of Orford, bringing all his hand together on the one part, set on his enemies freshlie againe. The aduersaries perceiving that, placed their men slender and thin before, but thicke and broad behind, beginning againe hardlie the battell. While the two fore-wards thus mortallie fought, each intending to vanquish and conuince the other; king Richard was admonished by his explorators and espials, that the earle of Richmond (accompanied with a small number of men of armes) was not far off. And as he approached and marched toward him, he perceived his personage by certaine demonstrations and tokens, which he had learned and knowen of others that were able to give him full information. Now being inflamed with ire, and vexed with outrageous malice, he put his spurs to his horse, and rode out of the side of the range of his battell, leaving the vant-gard fighting; and like a hungry lion ran with speare in rest toward him. The earle of Richmond perceived well the king furiously coming toward him, and because the whole hope of his wealth and purpose was to be determined by battell, he gladlie proffered to encounter with him bodie to bodie, and man to man.

King Richard set on so sharplie at the first bunt, that he overthrow the earles standard, and slew sir William Brandon his standard-bearer (which was father to sir Charles Brandon by king Henrie the eighth created duke of Suffolke) and matched hand to hand with sir John Cheine, a man of great force and strength, which would have resisted him: but the said John was by him manfully overthrowen. And so he making open passage by dint of sword as he went forward, the earle of Richmond withstood his violence, and kept him at the sword's point without advantage, longer than his companions either thought or indged: which being almost in despaire of victorie, were suddenly recomforted by sir William Stanleie, which came to his succors with three thousand tall men. At which verie instant, king Richards men were driven backe and fled, & he himselfe manfully fighting in the middle of his enemies, was slaine, and (as he worthilie had deserved) came to a bloudie death, as he had lead a bloudie life.

In the meane season, the earle of Orford with the aid of the lord Stanleie, after no long fight, discomfited the fore-ward of king Richard, whereof a great number were slaine in the chase and fight: but the greatest number which (compelled by feare of the king, and not of their more voluntarie motion) came to the field, gave neuer a stroke, and having no harme nor damage, safelie departed, which came not thither in hope to see the king prosper and preuaile, but to heare that he should be shamefullie confounded and brought to ruine. In this battell died few a boue the number of a thousand persons: and of the nobilitie were slaine John duke of Suffolke, which was warned by diuerse to refraine from the field, in so much that the night before he should set forward toward the king, or wrote this time upon his gate: Jacke of Norfolke be not too bold,

For "Dikon thy maister is bought and sold."

* Richard.

Yet all this notwithstanding, he regarded more his oth, his honoz, and promise made to king Richard, like a gentleman; and as a faithfull subject to his prince, absented not himselfe from his maister; but as he faithfullie liued vnder him, so he manfully died with him, to his great fame and laud. And therefore, though his seruice was ill imployed in aid of a tyrant (whome it had bene more honorable to haue suppressed than supported) yet because he had upon his fealtie undertaken to fight in his quarell, he thought it lesse losse of life and liuing than of glorie & honour: so that he might haue said, in respect of his loialtie & promised truth testified with constancie to the death:

Est mihi supplicium causa fuisse pium.

Ouid.

There were slaine beside him, Walter lord Fferrers of Chartleie, sir Richard Radcliffe, and Robert Bakenberie lieutenant of the Tower, and not manie gentlemen more. Sir William Catesbie learned in the lawes of the realme, and one of the chiefe counsellors to the late king, with diuerse other, were two daies after beheaded at Leicester. Amongst them that ran awate, were sir Francis bicount Lonell, and Humfreie Stafford, and Thomas Stafford his brother, which toke sanctuarie in saint Johns at Gloucester. Of captiues and prisoners there were a great number. For after the death of king Richard was knowen and published, euerie man in manner vnminding himselfe, & casting awate his abilliments of warre, meekelie submitted themselves to the obedience and rule of the earle of Richmond: of the which the more part had gladlie so done in the beginning, if they might haue conuenientlie escaped from king Richards espials, which hauing as cleere eyes as Lynx, and open eares as Aspidas, ranged & searched in euerie quarter.

Amongst these was Henrie the fourth earle of Northumberland, which (whether it was by the commandement of king Richard, putting diffidence in him; or he did it for the loue and fauour that he bare vnto the earle) stood still with a great companie, and intermitted not in the battell, which was incontinentlie receiued into fauour and made of the council. But Thomas Howard earle of Surreie, which submitted himselfe there, was not taken to grace; because his father was chiefe counsellor, and he greatlie familiar with king Richard, but committed to the Tower of London, where he long remained; and in conclusion deliuered, was for his truth and fidelitie after promoted to high honozs, offices and dignities. On the earle of Richmonds part were slaine scarce one hundred persons, among whom the principall was sir William Brandon his standard-bearer. This battell was fought at Bosworth in Leicestershire, the two and twentieth daie of August, in the yeare of our redemption 1485. The whole conflict indured little about two houres.

King Richard (as the same went) might haue escaped and gotten safegard by fleeing. For when the which were next about his person, saw and perceived at the first joining of the battell the soldiers faintlie and nothing couragiously to set on their enemies; and not onlie that, but also that some withdrew themselves priuillie out of the prease and departed; they began to suspect fraud and to smell treason; and not onelie exhorted, but determinatlie aduised him to saue himselfe by flight. And when the losse of the battell was imminent and apparant, they brought to him a swift swift and a light horse, to conueie him awaie. He which was not ignorant of the grudge and ill will that the common people bare toward him, casting awaie all hope of fortunate successe and happie chance to come, answered (as men saie) that on that daie he would make an end of all battels, or else there finish his life. Such a great audacitie and such a stomach reigned in his bodie.

For suerlie he knew that to be the daie, in the which it should be decided and determined whether he should peaceablie obtaine and enjoy his kingdome during his life, or else utterlie forgo and be deprived of the same. With which to much hardines he being overcome, hastily closed his helmet, and entered fiercelie into the hard battell, to the intent to obtaine that daie a quiet reigne and regimint; or else to finish there his vnquiet life, and vnforgotten gouernance. And so this miserie at the same verie point had like chance and fortune, as happeneth to such which in place of right iustice and honestie, following their sensuall appetite, loue, and vile to embrace mischief, tyrannie, and vnchastitie. Suerlie these be examples of more behemencie, than mans tong can expresse, to feare and astonish such euill persons, as will not liue one houre vacant from doing and exercising crueltie, mischief, or outragious liuing.

When the earle had thus obtained victorie, and slaine his mostall enimie, he kneeled downe and rendered to almightie God his hartie thanks, with deuout and goodlie orisons; beseeching his goodnesse to send him grace to aduance and defend the catholike faith; and to mainteine iustice and concord amongst his subiects and people, by God now to his gouernance committed & assigned. Which praier finished, he replenished with incomparable gloriouse ascended by to the top of a little mountaine, where he not onelie praised and lauded his valiant souldiers; but also gaue vnto them his hartie thanks, with promise of condigne recompense for their fidelitie and valiant facts, willing and commanding all the hurt and wounded persons to be cured, and the dead carcases to be deliuered to the sepulture. When the people rejoiced, and clapped their hands, crying by to heauen; King Henric, king Henric.

When the lord Stanleie saw the good will and gladnesse of the people, he tooke the crowne of king Richard which was found amongst the spoile in the field, and set it on the earles head; as though he had bene elected king by the voice of the people, as in ancient times past in diuerse realmes it hath bene accustomed: and this was the first signe and token of his good lucke and felicitie. ¶ I must put you here in remembrance, how that king Richard (putting some diffidence in the lord Stanleie) had with him as an hostage the lord Strange, his eldest sonne, which lord Stanleie (as ye haue heard before) ioined not at the first with his sonne in lawes armie, for feare the king would haue slaine the lord Strange his heire.

When king Richard was come to Bosworth, he sent a puruant to the lord Stanleie, commanding him to aduance forward with his companie, and to come to his presence; which thing if he refused to do, he swaie by Christs passion, that he would strike off his sonnes head before he dined. The lord Stanleie answered the puruant that if the king did so, he had more sonnes aliue; and as to come to him, he was not then so determined. When king Richard heard this answer, he commanded the lord Strange incontinent to be beheaded; which was at that verie same season, when both the armies had fight ech of other. But the counsellors of king Richard pondered the time and cause, knowing also the lord Strange to be innocent of his fathers offense, & perswaded the king that it was now time to fight, & no time to execute,

Besides that, they aduised him to keepe the lord Strange as prisoner till the battell were ended, and then at leisure his pleasure might be accomplished. So (as God would) king Richard brake his holie oth, and the lord was deliuered to the keepers of the kings tents, to be kept as prisoner. Which, when the field was done, and their maister slaine, and proclamation made to know where the child was, they submitted themselves as prisoners to the lord Strange, and he gentlie receiued them, and brought them to the new proclaimed king; where, of him and of his father he was receiued with great ioy. After this the whole campe remoued with bag and baggage.

The same night in the euening, king Henric with great pompe came to the towne of Leicester; where as well for the refreshing of his people & souldiers, as for preparing all things necessarie for his iourne toward London, he rested and reposed himselfe two daies. In the meane season the dead corps of king Richard was as shamefullie caried to the towne of Leicester, as he gorgeouslie (the day before) with pompe and pride departed out of the same towne. For his bodie was naked and despoiled to the skin, and nothing left about him, not so much as a clout to couer his priue members, and was trusted behind a puruant of arms, one Blanch Senglier, or White boze, like a hog or calfe, his head and armes hanging on the one side of the horse, and his legs on the other side, and all besprinkled with mire and blood he was brought to the grate friers church within the towne, and there late like a miserable spectacle.

But suerlie considering his mischievous acts and ingratiuous doings, men made wonder at such a cattife, who although he deserued no buriall place either in church or churchyard, chappell or chancel, but otherwise to haue bin bestowed: yet in the said church he was with no lesse finer all pompe & solemnitie interred, than he would to be done at the buriall of his innocent nephews, whome he caused cruellie to be murdered, and vnnaturallie killed. Now when his death was knowne, few lamented, and manie rejoiced. The proud bragging white boze (which was his badge) was violentlie rased & plucked downe from euerie signe and place where it might be espied: so ill was his life, that men wished the memoire of him to be buried with his carren corps. He reigned two yeers, two moneths, and one daie (so long by six and twentie moneths, and foure and twentie hours in most mens opinions, to whome his name and presence was as sweet and delectable, as his doings princelie, and his person antlike.)

As he was small and little of stature, so was he of bodie greatlie deformed; the one shoulder higher than the other; his face was small, but his countenance cruell, and such, that at the first aspect a man would iudge it to fauour and smell of malice, fraud, and deceit. When he stood musing, he would bite and chaw busilie his nether lip; as who said, that his fierce nature in his cruell bodie alwaies chased, stirred, and was euer vnquiet: beside that, the dagger which he wore, he would (when he stabled) with his hand plucke by & downe in the sheath to the midst, neuer drawing it fullie out: he was of a readie, pregnant, and quicke wit, wilie to feine, and apt to dissemble: he had a proud mind, and an arrogant stomach, the which accompanied him euen to his death, rather choosing to suffer the same by dint of sword, than being forsaken and left helpelesse of his vnfaitfull companions, to preserve by cowardlie flight such a fraille and vncertaine life, which by malice, sickness, or condigne punishment was like shortlie to come to confusion.

Thus ended this prince his mostall life with infamie and dishonour, which neuer preferred fame or honestie ness before ambition, tyrannie and mischief. And if he had continued still protector, and suffered his nephews to have lived and reigned, no doubt but the realm had prospered; & he as much praised & loved as he is now had in hatred: But to God, which know his inward thoughts at the houre of his death, I remit the punishment of his offences committed in his life; which if the one be as manifold as the other, Gods iustice were not to be charged with cruelty. For by nature he is mercifull, slow to anger, and loth to smite: but yet euery sinne (in respect of his righteousness) being deadly (much more heinous and horrible) how can he but by iustice (which is an essentiall vertue in him) punish it severely? And if he did it with ten thousand torments, who shall be so hardie as to expostulate and reason why he do sooth?

But to leaue the tyrant as he died, you shall understand that H. Henrie the seventh caused a stone to be made and set by ouer the place where he was buried, in the church of the grate friers at Leicester, with a picture of alabaster representing his person, doing that honour to his enemie, vpon a princelie regard and pittifull zeale, which king Richard (moued of an hypocriticall shew of counterteit pittie) did to king Henrie the first, whom he had first cruelly murdered, and after in the second yeare of his blisped reigne, caused his corpes to be removed from Chertsey into Windsor, and there solemnly interred. And now to conclude with this cruell tyrant king Richard, we may consider in what sort the ambitious desire to rule and gouerne in the house of Poike, was punished by Gods iust prouidence.

For although that the right might seeme to remaine in the person of Richard duke of Poike,aine at Wakefield, yet maie there be a fault worthie reputed in him, so to seeke to prevent the time appointed him by authoritie of parlement to attaine to the crowne intayled to him and his issue, in whose also, and not onely in himselfe, that offence (as maie be thought) was duly punished. For although his eldest sonne Edward the fourth, being a prince right pudent and circumspect for the libertie of his owne estate and his children, in somuch that not content to cut off all his armed and apparant enemies, he also of a zealous feare, made a waite his brother the duke of Clarence, and so thought to make all sure: yet Gods vengeance might not be disappointed, for (as ye haue partly heard) he did but further thereby the destruction of his issue, in taking away him that onlie might haue staied the crueltye of his brother of Gloucester, who enraged for desire of the kingdom, bereft his innocent nephews of their liues & estates.

And as it thus well appeared, that the house of Poike shewed it selfe more bloudie in seeking to obteine the kingdom, than that of Lancaster in blurring it: so it came to passe, that the Lords vengeance appeared more heauie towards the same than towards the other, not ceassing till the whole issue male of the said Richard duke of Poike was extinguished. For such is Gods iustice, to leaue no vntrepentant wickednesse unpunished, as especiallie in this case Richard the third, not deserving so much as the name of a man, much lesse of a king, most manifestly appeareth. [At whom the will end with a comparison of the like practise in Lodowicke Sforza, aspiring to the dukedome of Milan, the name, armes and title wherof he took vpon him, hauing secretly plotted before, that he receiued them as appertaining to him by the inuestiture of the king of Romans.

It was published that the death of Calcas (his late predecessor) happened by immoderate cohabitation, but the vniuersall iudgment of Italie was, that he died not of infirmities naturall, nor by incontinencie, but by poison and violent compulsion. Whereof Theodor de Paula, one of the physicians, assisting when the king visited him, assured the king to see most apparant and manifest signes: and if he were dispatched by poison, there was none that doubted that his uncle was innocent, either directlie or indirectlie; as he, who not content with an absolute power to be gouernor of the state, but aspiring according to the common desires of great men, to make himselfe glorious with titles and honours; and especially he iudged, that both for his proper merit and the succession of his children, the death of the lawfull prince was necessarie, and therefore thought to establish in himselfe the power and name of duke. Wherein ambition and couetousnesse preuailed about conscience and law of nature, and the zealous desire of dominion informed his disposition (other wise abhorring bloud) to that vile action.

But to end with king Richard sometimes duke of Gloucester, a title of dignitie ioined with misfortune and unluckinesse (as is noted before). So that for infelicities it might well be compared vnto the name of Ione, a name unhappie and much accursed for the kingdom of Naples. As for king Richard, better had it bene for him to haue contented his heart with the protectorship, than to haue cast by his snout, or lifted by his hornes of ambition so high, that with a settled intent as to hacke and hew downe by violent blowes all likelie impediments betwixt him and home. Better (I say) had it bene for him to haue dwelt vpon his first honor, than to haue wandered in princeliesse; and better had it bene for him neuer to haue inioied the flattering prosperitie of a king, than afterwards to fall, and neuer to recover losse or ruine, as is noted by the poet, saying:

Est melius nunquam felicia tempora nosse, Quam post blanditias fortuna, fata maligna Nec reparanda pati infortunia sortis iniqua.

[In this yeare 1483 died William Dumble who (by the translation of Laurence Both bishop of Durham and chancellor of England from the see of Durham to the citie of Poike) was made bishop of Durham (in place of the said Laurence), by the popes bulles. For by vertue thereof, Edward the fourth in the sixteenth yeare of his reigne, and in the yeare of Christ 1476, directed his letters patents to the knights and other free men of that bishopricke, with all solemnities to install the said William Dumble (borne of the honorable house of the lords Dumblets) in the said bishopricke of Durham, and to deliuer him quiet possession thereof, who was consecrated thereunto in the yeare of Christ 1477, in which he worthily gouerned six yeares, and died in this yeare, as before.]

Now of learned men that liued, and wrote in the daies of this blurper and his nephew king Edward the first, these we find recorded by Iohn Bale. First, John Denke, an Augustine frier of Warrington in Lancashire, a right subtil fellow in disputation, following the footsteps of his master John Duns, whom he chiefly studied, he wrote diuers treatises, and made that infamous sermon at Baules crasse, in fauour of the duke of Gloucester then protector, for the disheriting of Edward the first, his lawfull king and gouernor; John Bent, or Baile, borne in South Wales; George Ripley, first a canon of Wyke, and after a Carmelite frier in Woolston, a great mathematician, rhetorician, and poet; John Heyne a Carmelite frier of Wyke, that proceeded doctor of diuinitie in Cambridge; and such like.

Thus farre Richard the usurper, vnnatural vncle to Edward the first and Richard duke of Yorke, brethren.

Henrie the seauenth, sonne to Ed- mund earle of Richmond, which Edmund was brother by the moother's side to Henrie the sixt.

Anno Reg. 1.

Edward
Plantagenet
earle of War-wike sonne and heire to George duke of Clarence committed to the Tower.

King Henrie
commeth to London.

King Henrie hauing thus got the victorie at Bosworth, and slaine his mostall enimie there in the field, did send before his departure from Lanchester, Sir Robert Willoughby knight, to the manour of Sheriffhutton in the countie of Yorke, for Edward Plantagenet earle of War-wike, sonne and heire to George duke of Clarence then being of the age of fiftene yeares; whome king Richard had kept there as prisoner during the time of his usurped reigne. Sir Robert Willoughby re-ceiuing the young earle of the constable of that castell conueied him to London, where he was shut up in the Tower, for doubt lest some vniquiet and euill disposed persons might inuent some occasion of new trouble by this young gentleman: and therefore king Henrie thought good to haue him sure.

There was beside him in the castell of Sheriff-hutton the ladie Elizabeth eldest daughter to king Edward the fourth, whome king Richard (as ye haue heard) meant to haue married: but God otherwise ordained for hir, and preserved hir from that vnlawfull copulation and incestuous bed. Shortly after, she being accompanied with a great number as well of noblemen, as honourable matrons, was with good speed conueied to London, and brought to hir mother. In the meane season king Henrie remoued forward by soft iournies towards London, the people comming in from all sides to behold him, and excedingly reioicing at his presence, as by their voices and gestures it well appeared.

At his approaching nere to the citie, the maior and his brethren, with other worshipfull citizens, being clothed in violet, met him at Shordich, and reuerentlie saluted him: and so with great pompe and triumphe rode thorough the citie to the cathedrall church of S. Paule, where he offered three standards.
In the one was the image of saint George, in an other was a red fierie dragon beaten upon white and graine saueren, and in the third was painted a burning colde upon yellow tarterne. After his prayers said, and the Deum song, he departed to the bishops palace, and there continued a season. Anon after, he assembled together the sage counsellors of the realme, in which counsell like a prince of iust faith, and true of promise, to auoid all ciuill discord, he appointed a daie to come in marriage with the ladie Elizabeth, heire of the house of Yorke, with his noble personage, heire to the line of Lancaster. Which thing not onely reioiced the hearts of the nobles and gentlemen of the realme, but also gained the fauours and good wils of all the commons.

After this, with great pompe he rowed vnto Westminster, & there the thirtieth daie of October he was with all ceremonies accustomed, annointed, & crowned king, by the whole assent as well of the commons as of the nobilitie, and called Henrie the sea-uenth of that name: which was in the yeare of the world 5452, and after the birth of our Lord 1485, in the fourth and first yeare of Frederike the third then emperor of Almaine, Maximilian his sonne being newlie elected king of the Romans, in the second yeare of Charles the eight then king of France, and in the five and twentieth of king James then ruling the realme of Scotland. For the establishing of all things, as well touching the preservation of his owne estate, as the commendable administration of iustice and preferment of the common wealth of his realme, he called his high court of parlement at Westminster the seauenth daie of November, wherein was atteinted Richard late duke of Glocester, calling and naming himselfe by usurpation, king Richard the third.

Likevise there was atteinted as chiefe aiders and assistants to him in the battell at Bosworth, aduanced against the present king, John late duke of Buckingham, Thomas earle of Surrie, Francis Lovell knight vicount Louth, Walter Deuereux knight late lord Ferrers, John lord Zouch, Robert Harrington, Richard Charlton, Richard Ratcliffe, William Berkeley of Wilete, Robert Spaldeton, James Harrington, Robert Blakenberge, Thomas Wilmington, Walter Hopton, William Catesbie, Roger Wake, William Saprote of the countie of Huntington, Humfre Stafford, William Clerke of Wlenlocke, Gertie saint Germaine, Richard Watkins herald of armes, Richard Keuell of Der-byshe, Thomas Pulter of the countie of Kent, John Wells otherwise called Hastings, John Herdall late secretaire to the said Richard late duke of Glocester, John Bucke, Andrew Kat, and William Hampton of Burford.

In which atteintment neuertheless there were di-uerse clauses and promises for the benefit of their wiues and other persons, that had or might claime any right, title, or interest lawfull vnto any castles, manours, lordships, townes, towneships, honours, lands, tenements, rents, seruices, fe farmes, annuities, knights fees, advowsons, reuerfions, remainders, and other hereditaments; whereof the said persons atteinted were possessed or seized to the viles of such other persons: with a speciall promise also, that the said atteintment should not be prejudiciall to John Catesbie knight, Thomas Keuell, and William Ashbie esquiers, in, of, & upon the manour of Kirkebie vpon Wrettshe in the countie of Leicesters, nor in in, of, and vpon anie other lands and tenements in ment of Thomas Dauers, & John Lie. And further, notwithstanding this atteindoz, diuerse of the said persons afterwards were not onelie by the king pardoned, but also restored to their lands and livings.

Moreover, in this present parlement, he caused proclamation to be made, that all men were pardoned and acquitted of their offenses, which would submit themselves to his mercie, and receiue an oth to be true and faithfull vnto him: whereupon manie that came out of sanctuaries and other places were receiued to grace, and admitted for his subiects. After this, he began to remember his speciall friends, of whome some he aduanced to honour and dignitie, and some he enriched with goods and possessions, eu-erie man according to his deserts and merits. And to begin, his vnckle Jasper earle of Penbrooke, he created duke of Bedford; Thomas lord Stanleie was created earle of Derby; and the lord Chendely of Britaine his speciall friend, he made earle of Bath; sir Giles Daubeneie was made lord Daubeneie; sir Robert Willoughbie was made lord Willoughbie. And Edward Stafford eldest sonne to Henrie late duke of Buckingham, he restored to his name, dignitie, & possessions, which by king Richard were confiscat and atteind. Beside this, in this parlement was this notable act assented to and concluded as fol-loweth; to the pleasure of almighty God, wealth, prosperitie, and suertie of this realme of England, and to the singular comfort of all the kings subiects of the same, in auoiding all ambiguities and questions.

An act for the establishing of the croune in the line of Henrie the seuenth.

BE it ordeined, established, and enacted by this present parlement, that the inheritance of the croun of this realme of England, & also of France, with all the preheminance, and dignitie roiall to the same appertaining, all other seignories to the king belonging beyond the sea, with the appurtenances thereto in anie wise due or appertaining, shall rest, remaine, and abide, in the most roiall person of our now souereigne lord king Henrie the seuenth, and in the heires of his bodie lawfullie comming, perpetual-lie, with the grace of God so to indure, and in none other.

Beside this act, all atteindozs of this king enacted by king Edward and king Richard were adnihilat-ed, and the record of the same iudged to be defaced; and all persons atteinted for his cause and occasion were restored to their goods, lands, and possessions.
Diuerse acts also made in the time of king Edward and king Richard were reuoked, and other adnjudged more expedient for the common wealth were put in their places and concluded. After the dissolution of this parlement, the king remembering his friends left in hostage beyond the seas, that is to wit, the marquess Dorsset, & sir John Bourchier, he with all conuenient speed redeemed them, and sent also into flanders for John Hopton bishop of Elic. These acts performed, he chose to be of his councill a conuenient number of right grane and wise counsellers.

¶ This did he, that he might the more roiallie gouerne his kingdome, which he obtained and inioied as a thing by God elected and provided, and by his es-peciall fauour and gracious aspect compassed and atchined: Insomuch that men commonlie report that seauen hundred ninte & seauen yeres passed, it was by a heauenlie voice reuealed to Cadwalader last king of Britains, that his stocke & pogramme should reigne in this land & beare dominion againe. Whereupon most men were perswaded in their owne opinion, that by this heauenlie voice he was provided & ordeined long before to inioy & obtaine this kingdome.
Which thing k. Henrie the first did also shew before, as it were by propheticall inspiration, at such time as the earle of Penbrooke presented the said Henrie (at that time a proper child) vnto Henrie the first, whome after he had beheld, and a good while viewed the come-linesse of his countenance, and orberlie lineaments of his bodie, he said to such yeres as stood about him: Lo, suertie this is he, to whome both we and our ad-uerfaries, leauing the possession of all things, shall hereafter giue roine and place: & so it came to passe by the appointment of God, to whose gouernement, gift, and disposing, all realmes and all dominions are subiect, as king David confesseth, saing: Omnia sunt regno subdita regna Dei.

Now although by this meanes all things seemed to be brought in god and perfect order, yet there lacked a wrett to the harpe, to set all the strings in a monocord and perfect tune, which was the matrimonie to be finished betwene the king and the late E-lizabech, daughter to king Edward. Which like a god prince, according to his oth, & promise, he did both so-lemnize & consummate shortly after, that is to saie, on the eighteenth daie of Januarie. By reason of which marriage, peace was thought to descend out of heauen into England, considering that the lines of Lancaster and York were now brought into one knot, and connered together, of whose two bodies one heire might succeed to rule and inioie the whole monarchie and realme of England, which before was rent and diuided into factions & partakings, whereby manie a mans life was lost, great spoiles made of peoples goods, wast of wealth, worship, and honor, all which ended in this blessed and gracious conuenion, authorized by God, as our Anglorum prelia satis:
Hoc Deus omnipotens pacis consecrat auctor, Ciuillisque habuit tandem contentio finem.

Shortly after, for the better preservation of his roiall person, he constituted and ordeined a certeine number, as well of archers, as of diuerse other persons, hardie, strong, and active to giue daillie attendance on his person, whom he named yeomen of his gard, which present men thought that he learned of the French king when he was in France. For it is not remembered, that anie king of England before that daie used anie such furniture of daillie souldiers.
¶ In this same yere a new kind of sickenes invaded suddenlie the people of this land, passing through the same from the one end to the other. It began about the one and twentieth of September, and continued vntill the latter end of October, being so sharpe and deadlie, that the like was neuer heard of to anie mans remembrance before that time.

For suddenlie a deadlie burning sweat so assailed their bodies, and dissempered their blood with a most ardent heat, that scarce one amongst an hundred that sickened did escape with life: for all in maner as soone as the sweat took them, or within a short time after, yelded the ghost. Beside the great number which decaied within the citie of London, two maiors successiuelie died within eight daies and six aldermen. At length, by the diligent obseruation of those that escaped (which marking what things had done them good, and holpen to their deliuerance, bled the like againe. When they fell into the same disease, the second or thirde time, as to diuerse it chanced, a remedie was found for that mortall maladie, which was this. If a man on the day time were taken with the sweat, then should he straight lie downe with all his clothes and garments, and continue in his sweat foure and twentie houres, after so moderate a sort as might be.

When the night he chanced to be taken, then should he not rise out of his bed for the space of foure and twentie houres, so casting the clothes that he might in no wise prouoke the sweat, but lie so temperatlie, that the water might distill out softe of the owne accord, and to abstaine from all meat if he might so long suffer hunger, and to take no more drinke neither hot nor cold, than would moderatlie quench and asswage his thirstie appetite. Thus with lukewarme drinke, temperate heate, and measurable cloaths manie escaped: few which used this order (after it was found out) died of that sweat. Marie one point diligentlie about all other in this cure is to be obserued, that he neuer did put his hand or feet out of the bed to refresh or coole himselfe, which to doe is no lesse teopardie than short and present death. Thus this disease comming in the first yeare of king Henries reigne, was iudged (of some) to be a token and signe of a troublous reigne of the same king, as the profe partlie afterwards shewed it selfe.

The king requested a prest of six thousand marks.

The king standing in need of monie to discharge such debts, and to mainteine such port as was be- housefull, sent the lord treasurer with maister Reginald Bzaie, and others, unto the lord maior of London, requiring of the citie a prest of six thousand marks. Whereupon the said lord maior and his brethren, with the commons of the citie, granted a prest of two thousand pounds, which was leuied of the companies, and not of the wards: and in the yeare next ensuing, it was well and trulie againe repaid euerie pence, to the good contentation and satisfieng of them that disbursed it. The king considering that the suretie of his totall estate and defense of the realme consisted chafelie in god lawes and ordinances to be had and obserued among his people, summoned effectones his high court of parlement, therein to deuise and establish some profitable acts and statutes, for the wealth and commoditie of his people.

The king goeth into the North.

After this, hauing set things in quiet about London, he toke his iourne into the North parts, there to purge all the degrees of malicious treason that might rest in the hearts of vnquiet persons, and namelie in Northeshire, where the people bare more fauour unto king Richard in his life time, than those of anie other part of the realme had commonlie done. He kept the feast of Easter at Lincoln; where he was certified that the lord Louell and Humfreie Stafford, and Thomas Stafford, his brother, were departed out of the sanctuarie at Colchester, to what place or whither, no man as yet could tell. The king little regarding the matter, kept on his iourne, and came to York, where as soon as he was once settled, it was openlie shewed and declared for a truth to the king himselfe, that Francis lord Louell was at hand with a strong and mightie power of men, and would with all diligence invade the citie.

Stafford.

It was also told him, that the forenamed Staffords were in Worcester-shire, and had raised a great band of the countrie people and commons there, and had cast lots what part should assault the gates, what men should scale the walls of the citie of Worcester, and who should let the passages for letting of rescues and aiders. The king could not beleue this report to be true at the first, but after that, by letters of credence sent from his friends, he was fullie persuaded that it was so true, he was put in no small feare, and not without great cause. For he wiselie considered, that he neither had anie competent armie ready, nor convenient furniture to arme them that were present; and also he was in such place, where he could not assemble anie power, but of those whom he soze mistrusted, as friends to them that were most his enemies; the memorie of king Richard as yet being not amongst them forgotten nor woyn out of mind.

But because the matter required quicke expedition, he appointed the duke of Bedford with three thousand men not altogether the best armed (for their best plates for the most part were of tanned leather) to march forth against the lord Louell, and to set upon him without anie lingering of time. The duke having forwarde, approached to the campe of his enemies, & before he would assaile them, he caused the heralds to make proclamation, that all those that would depart from their armour, and submit themselves as subiects unto their naturall prince and soveraigne lord, should be pardoned of all former offenses. The lord Louell upon this proclamation, either putting mistrust in his souldiers, or fearing himselfe in his owne behalfe, fled priuilie in a night from his companie, and left them as a flocke of sheepe without a shepheard.

Which departure of the lord when his armie understood, it put the souldiours in such despair of attacking anie further enterpryse, that they immediatlie put off their armour, and came directlie unto the duke, euerie man humbly submitting himselfe, and desiring pardon of his offenses. So in this wise was that dangerous storme and cruell rage of those furious rebels appeased, which was doubted would haue growne to the destruction of manie a man. The lord Louell the procurer of this businesse, escaping awaie got him into Lancashire, and there for a certeine space lay lurking in secret with sir Thomas Blount knight, which in those parties was a man of no small authoritie and power.

The lord
Louell
escaped.

Sir Humfreie Stafford also, hearing what had happened to the lord Louell, in great displeasure and sorrowe, and for feare lest his enterpryse, and in like manner fled, and toke sanctuarie at Colham, a village not past two miles from Abindon. But because that sanctuarie was not a sufficient defense (as was proued before the iustices of the kings Bench) for traitours, he was taken from that place, & brought to the Tower, & after put to execution at Abborne: but his brother Thomas that was with him, was pardoned, because he was thought not to haue attempted anie thing of himselfe other wise than by the euill counsell and persuation of his elder brother. After that the king had quieted all these commotions and tumults, and reformed the rude and babling people of the North parts, he returned to London.

In this yeare John Persuall, one of the mayo of Londons officers, and his caruer, was chosen one of the shiriffes of London. For when the mayo (as the custome of London is) doth elect one of the shiriffes of London for the yeare ensuing, by taking and drinkeing a cup of wine to such a one as he list to name shiriffe; the mayo for the time being, whose name was sir Henrie Collet, toke the cup of wine, and dranke unto the aforesaid John Persuall his caruer standing bareheaded before him, and waiting upon his bowd, and called him shiriffe of London for the yeare ensuing: and forthwith the said mayo caused the same Persuall to sit downe at his owne table, and to couer his head. And the same Persuall toke upon him the office of shiriffalitie, and after was mayo of London, and was made knight.

same altogether false and fained, there was an open path made and beaten forth, for a greater inconvenience to insue. The which matter might seeme verie strange, how such trouble and mischefe should grow thereof, if the time were not considered, in which it happened. For in those daies manie persons, either borne in the wombe of continuall dissention, or nourished with the milke of ciuill sedition, could not forbear their vsuall custome of mouing strife, and following debate, ever glad to haue anie occasion, though neuer so small, to stirre byroz of warre, and slaughter of people. Which men if they knew (a matter of weightie conceipt) the hurts thereof, they would be as earnest in seeking after peace as they are greedy in pursuit of warre, speciallie ciuill warre: but the cause whie they are defectiue therein, is the want of meekenesse and humilitie, as the wiseman saith:

Mite cor horribili seditione vacat.

Amongst other such monsters and limmes of the diuell, there was one sir Richard Simond prest, a man of base birth, and yet well learned, but not so learned as willie, nor so willie as vngacious, delighting in fraud & deceit, even from his youth. He had a scholer called Lambert Simenell, one of a gentle nature and pregnant wit, to be the organe and cheefe instrument, by the which he might conueie and bring to passe his mischeuous attempt. The diuell cheefe master of such practises, put in the venemous braine of this dissuall and traitorous prest, to deuise how he might make his scholer the foresaid Lambert to be reputed as right inheritor to the crowne of this realme: namelie, for that the same went that king Edwards chylzen were not dead, but fled secretlie into some strange place, and there to be liuing: and that Edward earle of Marwike, sonne and heire to the duke of Clarence, either was, or shortly should be put to death.

These rumors though they seemed not to be grounded of anie likelihood to the wiser sort of men, yet incouraged this pcurly prest to thinke the time come, that his scholer Lambert might take vpon him the person and name of one of king Edwards chylzen. And therevpon at Wyke, where their abiding was, the said prest instructed his pupill both with princelie behaviour, ciuill maners, and good literature, declaring to him of what lineage he should asseme himselfe to be descended, and omitted nothing that might serue for his purpose. Some after, the rumor was blowne abroad, that the earle of Marwike was broken out of prison. And when the prest sir Richard Simond heard of this, he straight intended now by that occasion to bring his inuented purpose to passe, and changing the childes name of baptisme, called him Edward, after the name of the young earle of Marwike, the which were both of like yeares, and of like stature.

Then he with his scholer sailed into Ireland, where he so set forth the matter vnto the nobilitie of that countrie, that not onelie the lord Thomas Cere, diocane chancelor of that land deceived through his craftie tale, receiued the counterfeite earle into his castell with all honour and reuerence; but also manie other noble men determined to aid him (with all their powers) as one descended of the blood rosall, and lineallie come of the house of Yorke, which the Irish people euermore highly fauoured, honoured, and loued above all other. By this meanes euerie man throughout all Ireland was willing and ready to take his part, and to submit themselves to him; already reputing and calling him of all hands king. So that now they of this sea (by the aduise of the prest) sent into England certaine priuie messengers to get friends here.

Also they sent into Flanders to the ladie Margaret sister to king Edward, & late wife to Charles duke of Burgonie, to purchase aid and helpe at hir hands. This ladie Margaret bare no small rule in the low countries, and in verie deed sore grudged in hir heart, that king Henrie (being descended of the house of Lancaster) should reigne and gouerne the realme of England: and therefore, though she well vnderstood that this was but a coloured matter; yet to worke hir malicious intention against king Henrie, she was glad to haue so fit an occasion: and therefore promised the messengers all the aid that she should be able to make in furtherance of the quarrell; and also to procure all the friends she could in other places, to be aiders and partakers of the same conspiracie.

King Henrie aduertised of all these doings, was greatly bered therewith: and therefore to haue god aduise in the matter, he called together his counsell at the Charterhouse beside his manor of Richmond, and there consulted with them, by which means best this begun conspiracie might be appeased and disappointed without more disturbance. It was therefore determined, that a generall pardon should be published to all offenders that were content to receive the same. This pardon was so freely granted, that no offense was excepted, no not so much as high treason committed against the kings roiall person. It was further agreed in the same counsell for the time then present, that the earle of Marwike should personally lie he shewed abroad in the cite, and other publicke places: whereby the vntreue report falselie spread abroad, that he should be in Ireland, might be among the communalitie proued and knowne for a vaine imagined lie.

In this solemnne counsell, diuerse & manie things for the wealth of the realme were debated and concluded. And among other it was determined, that the ladie Elizabeth wife to king Edward the fourth, should lose and forfeit all hir lands and possessions, because she had voluntarilie submitted hir selfe and hir daughters wholie to the hands of king Richard, contrary to hir promise made to the lords and nobles of this realme in the beginning of the conspiracie made against king Richard, whereby she did inough to haue quailed all the purpose of them that joined with hir in that matter. But though hir fault was grieuous, yet was it iudged by some men that she deserved not by quitte of iustice so great a losse and punishment. Howbeit, this iudgement was altogether affectionate and parciall in hir behalfe; besides that it was reasonable in great measure (all circumstances considered) for she was not lightlie induced to do as she did, neither stood it with the frailtie of a woman to withstand the temptations of a mightie man, or rather a reaching tyrant.

But such was hir chance by hir lightnesse and inconstancie, that she wan the displeasure of manie men, and for that cause liued after in the abbete of Bermondsey beside Southwarke a wretched and a miserable life, where not manie yeares after she deceased, and is buried with hir husband at Windsor. Though fortune thus ruleth manie things at hir pleasure, yet one worke that this queene accomplished cannot be forgotten: for in the life time of hir husband king Edward the fourth, she founded and erected a notable colledge in the vniuersitie of Cambridge, for the feeding of scholers and students of the same vniuersitie, and endowed it with sufficient possessions for the long maintenance of the same, which at this daie is called the Quenes colledge.

When all things in this counsell were sagelie concluded and agreed to the kings mind, he returned to London; giuing in commandement, that the next sundae insuing, Edward the young earle of Marwike

Margaret duchesse of Burgonie sister to king Edward the fourth, her malicious mind to Lancaster house,

A generall pardon excepting no offense, whiche should be brought from the Tower through the most publicke streets in all London, to the cathedraall church of saint Paule, where he went openlie in procession, that euerie man might see him, hauing communication with manie noble men, and with them especially that were suspected to be partakers of the late begun conspiracie; that they might perceiue how the Irishmen vpon a vaine shadowe moued warre against the king and his realme. But this medicine little auailed euill disposed persons. For the earle of Lincolne sonne to John de la Pole duke of Suffolke, and Elizabeth sister to king Edward the fourth, thought it not meet to neglect and omit so ready an occasion of new trouble.

Wherefore they determined to vphold the enterprise of the Irishmen, and other complices of this conspiracie: so that consulting with sir Thomas Broughton, and certeine other of his most trustie friends, he purposed to saile into Flanders to his aunt the ladie Margaret duchesse of Burgognie, trusting by hir helpe to make a puissant armie, and to iointe with the companions of the new raised sedition. Therefore after the dissolution of the parlement which then was holden, he fled secretlie into Flanders vnto the said ladie Margaret; where Francis lord Louell landed certeine daies before. Where after long consultation had how to proceed in their business, it was agreed, that the earle of Lincolne, and the lord Louell should go into Ireland; and there to attend vpon the duchesse hir counterfeitt nephew, and to honoꝝ him as a king, and with the power of the Irishmen to bring him into England.

Now they concluded, that if their doings had successe, then the foresaid Lambert (misnamed the earle of Marwike) should by consent of the counsell be deposed, and Edward the true earle of Marwike deliuered out of prison and annointed king. King Henrie supposing that no man would haue bene so mad as to haue attempted anie further enterprise in the name of that new found & counterfeitt earle, he onelie studied how to subdue the seditious conspiracie of the Irishmen. But hearing that the earle of Lincolne was fled into Flanders, he was somewhat moued therewith, and caused soldiors to be put in a readinesse out of euerie part of his realme, and to bring them into one place assigned, that when his aduersaries should appeare, he might suddenlie set vpon them, vanquish and overcome them.

Thus disposing things for his sauetie, he went towards St. Edmunds burie, and being certified that the marquesse Dorset was comming towards his maiestie, to excuse himselfe of things that he was suspected to haue done when he was in France, he sent the earle of Oxford to arrest the said marquesse by the waie, and to conueie him to the Tower of London, there to remaine till his truth might be tried. From thence the R. went south to Poꝝwich, and tarrying there Christmasse daie, he departed after to Walsingham, where he offered to the image of our ladie, and then by Cambridge he shortly returned to London. In which meane time, the earle of Lincolne had gotten together by the aid of the ladie Margaret about two thousand Almaines, with one Martine Sward, a valiant and noble capteine to lead them.

With this power the earle of Lincolne sailed into Ireland, and at the citie of Duelin caused young Lambert to be proclaimed and named king of England, after the most solemne fashion, as though he were the verie heire of the blood roiall lineallie borne and descended. And so with a great multitude of beggerlie Irishmen, almost all naked and vnarmed, sauing skins and mantels, of whome the lord Thomas Gerartine was capteine and conductor, they sailed into England with this new found king, and landed for a purpose at the pille of Fowlsheie, within a litle of Lancaster, trusting there to find aid by the means of sir Thomas Broughton, one of the chiefe companions of the conspiracie.

The king had knowledge of the enemies intent before their arrivall, and therefore hauing assembled a great armie (ouer the which the duke of Bedford, and the earle of Orenford were chiefe capteins) he went to Conventrie, where he was aduertised, that the earle of Lincolne was landed at Lancaster with his new king. Where he took aduise of his counsellors what was best to be done, whether to set on the enemies without further delaie, or to protract time a while. But at length it was thought best to delaie no time, but to giue them battell, before they should increase their power, and therevpon he remoued to Nottingham, & there by a litle wood called Bosworth, he pitched his field.

Shortly after this came to him the lord George Talbot earle of Shrewesburie, the lord Strange, sir John Cheine, right valiant capteins, with manie other noble and expert men of warre, namelie of the countries neere adioining; so that the kings armie was wonderfullie increased. In this space the earle of Lincolne being entered into Poꝝkestre, passed tollie on his iournie without spoiling or hurting of anie man, trusting thereby to haue some companie of people resorted vnto him. But after he perceived few or none to follow him, and that it was too late now to returne backe, he determined to trie the matter by dint of sword, and herevpon directed his waie from Poꝝke to Melwarke vpon Trent.

But before he came there, king Henrie knowing all his enemies purposes, came the night before the daie of the battell to Melwarke; and tarrying there a litle, went thre miles further, and pitching his field, lodged there that night. The earle of Lincolne certified of his comming, was nothing abashed, but kept still on his iournie; and at a litle bilage called Stoke, nigh to the king and his armie, set downe his campe. The next daie the king diuided his whole power into three battels, and after in good arraie approached nigh to the towne of Stoke. The earle likewise set forth his armie, and encountering with the kings people in a faire plaine there, met for the trial of such a conflict, set vpon them with a manlie courage, desiring his soldiors to remember his honour and their owne liues.

Then both the armies joined and fought verie earnestlie, in so much that the Almaines, being tried and expert men of warre, were in all things, as well in strength as policie, equals and matches to the Englishmen. But as for Martine Sward their coronell, few of the Englishmen, either in valiant courage, or strength, and nimbleness of bodie was to him comparable. On the other side, the Irishmen, although they fought manfullie, and stucke to it valiantlie; yet because they were (after the maner of their countrie) almost naked, without anie conuenient furniture of armour, they were striken downe and slaine like dull & brute beasts, which was a great discouragement to the residue of the companie. Thus they fought for a space so long and so egerlie on both parts, that no man could well iudge to whome the victorie was like to incline.

But at length the kings foreward being full of people, and well fortified with wings, which onke both began and continued the fight, set vpon the aduersaries with such force and violence, that first they oppressed and killed such capteins, one by one, as refused their might and puissance: and after that, put all the other to flight, the which were either apprehended as prisoners in their running awaie, or else slaine.

laine and brought into confusion in a small moment. Now when this battell was ended, and fought out to the extremitie, then it well appeared, what high prowesse, what manfull stomachs, what hardie and courageous hearts rested in the kings aduerfaries.
For there the chiefe captaine, the earle of Lincolne, and the lord Louell, sir Thomas Broughton, Martine Sward, and the lord Gerardine captaine of the Irishmen were laine, and found dead in the verie places which they had chosen alieue to fight in, not gi-uing one foot of ground to their aduerfaries.

Howbeit some affirme, that the lord Louell toke his horse, and would haue fled ouer Trent, but was not able to recouer the further side for the highnesse of the bankes, and so was drowned in the riuer. There were killed at that battell, with their fiue captaine before rehersed, of that partie about foure thousand.
Of the kings part there were not halfe of them which fought in the fore-ward, and gaue the onset laine or hurt. Then was Lambert the youngling, which was falslie reported to be the sonne of the duke of Clarence, and his maister sir Richard Simond priest both taken, but neither of them put to death; because that Lambert was but an innocent, and of yeares insufficient of himselfe to do any such enterpryse; and the other was pardoned of life, because he was a priest, and annointed man; but yet was committed to perpetuall prison.

Lambert was at length made one of the kings falcons, after that he had bene a turnebroch for a space in the kings kitchen. This battell was fought on a saturday being the sixteenth daie of June, in this second yere of his reigne. In this yere died Thomas Bourchier archbishop of Canturburie: and John Poxton bishop of Cle, a man of excellent learning, vertue and pollicie, succeeded in his place, whom Alexander pope of Rome, the first of that name, created a cardinall, and the king created him also chan-celloz of England. Of which pope (hauing so conuenient a place to speake) it were a fault to omit the ambition, accompanied with other disorders vnbecoming a successor of Peter (but neither personallie nor localle) as all the brood of them brag of themselues, & will be intituled with a pismasse, vsurped.

This Alexander the first pope of that name, was sometime an ancient cardinall, and one of the greatest in all the court of Rome. One meane that raised him to the seat of the pope, was the difference be-twene the cardinals Alcanius Sforze, and Julian S. Petri ad Vincula: but the chiefe thing that accomplished his election, was, that with a new example for that time, he bought by the consent and knowledge of euerie one, partlie for monie, and partlie with promises of offices and great dignities, manie voices of the cardinals, who reiecting the instruction of the gospell, were not ashamed to passe to him by sale, an authoritie and potver to make merchandize of the holie treasures, & that with the name of the celestiall authoritie in the most high part of the temple.

So which abhominable & too too prophane negotiation manie of them were induced by the cardinall Alcanius, but that was not more with persuasions and lutes, than with his example: for that being corrupted with the infinit desire of riches, he made the pope promise him for his hire and recompense of so great wickednesse, the office of vicechancellozship (the principallest place in the court of Rome) togither with benefices, castles, and his palace of Rome full of moveables of great valour. But the pope for all this could not auoid; neither for the time to come, the iudgment and iustice of God; nor for the present, the infamie and iust hate of men, in whom for this election was no small impressions of astonishment and horrour, not onelie for that it was intangled with meanes dishonest, but also because the natures and conditions of the man chosen, were (for the greatest part) knowen to manie.

Manie sentences and coniectures were made of his successe. And amongst other, Ferdinand king of Naples, dissembling openlie the griefe he had of that election, signified to the quene his wife with teares (which he was wont to forbear even in the death of his children) that there was created a pope who would be most hurtfull to Italie, and the whole common weale of christendome. A iudgement not vnworthy of the wisdom of such a prince: for that in Alexander the first (for so would his new pope be called) was a subtiltie, sharpenesse, and expedition of wit most singular, a counsell excellent, a wonderfull efficacie in persuasion, and in all great affaires a iudgement and care incredible. But these vertues were maruel-louslie defaced by his vices, for touching his manners and customes, they were verie dishonest, in his administrations he expelled little sinceritie, in his countenance no shame, in his words small truth, in his heart little faith, and in his opinion lesse religion. Of the contrarie, all his actions were defiled with an insatiable couetousnesse, and immoderate ambition, a barbarous crueltie, and a burning desire to raise and make great (by what meanes soeuer) his children, who were manie in number; and amongst others, one no lesse detestable than the father, to whose cursed counsels he became a wicked instrument. Thus much (by waie of digression) of Alexander, a pope (as you heare) well qualified, and therefore forward enough to creat cardinals both in England and elsewhere of like disposition. But to returne to the storie.]

After that the king had got the upper hand of his enimies, he removed to Lincolne, and there staid thre daies, causing euerie of the same daies solempne processions to be made in rendering thanks to God for his fortunate victorie. Then caused he execution to be done, of such rebels & traitors as were taken in the field, either at the battell, or in the chase. And shortlie after he went into Woxshire, & there coasted the countie ouerthwart, searching out such as had aided his enimies, and were thought to be seditious persons, whom he punished, some by imprisonment, some by fines, and some by death: according to the qualitie of their offenses, and as was thought most expedient [not by extremitie of rigor inclining to ty-rannie, but by due moderation of iustice tempering execution with clemencie; according to the good rule of iustice prescribed by the wise man, saieing:

Solus commissum plectat clementia crimen, Parua negat poenam culpa subire grauem.

About the middelt of August entering into the third yere of his reigne, he came to Newcastell upon Tyne, and from thence sent in ambassage into Scotland Richard For, latelie before made bishop of Excester, and with him Richard Cogecombe knight, controller of his house, to conclude some peace or truce with king James of Scotland. The English ambassadors were honorablie receiued, and longlie intertained of the said king, who gladlie would haue concluded a perpetuall peace with the king of England, if he might haue bene licenced so to haue done; but his people being stedfast in their old accustomed bidge, would not agree to ante peace, but yet were contented to gratifie their king, that he should take truce with England for the tearme of seuen yeares, which was concluded.

Then was secret promise made by king James, that he would not onlie obserue peace, & continue in perfect amitie with the king of England during his life, but also would renew againe this truce new taken for other seuen yers, before the first seuen yers were fullie expired. The king of Scots indeed was as desirous of the king of Englands friendship, as the king of England was of his: because that his subjects bare him much euill will, mistaking with all things that either he could do or saie. [So that his regiment was no longer liked, than they were in a good mood, which was when they were well minded; and that was neuer: for that if by gentleness he allured them, they esteemed him a flatterer; if by severity, a tyrant. And therefore it stood him vpon to strengthen himselfe against such a people, of whose pleasure & displeasure depended his estate.]

King Henrie
returneth out of the north
countrie,

The French
kings request for aid against Francis duke of Britaine.

10 King Henrie after the returne of his ambassadoys out of Scotland, came from Newcastle to Yorke, and so toward London, and in the way being at Leicester, there came to him ambassadoys from Charles the French king, which declared both the recovery of certeine towne out of the hands of Maximilian king of Romans, which he had wrongfullie detained from the crowne of France before that time; and also that their maiesty king Charles had now wars in hand against Francis duke of Britaine, because that he succoured and mainteined diuers noble men, as the duke of Orleans and others, that were rebels and traitors, against him and the realme of France. Wherefore his request was, that for the old familiaritie that had bene betwixt them, he would either assist and helpe him, or else stand neuter betwixt them, neither helping nor yet hurting the one nor the other.

Upon good and deliberate aduise taken in this matter, because it was iudged weightie, the king for answer told the French ambassadoys, that he would neither spare paine nor cost, to set some reasonable state betwixt their soueraigne lord king Charles, and the duke of Britaine: so that a small end and some perfect conclusion of friendship might be had betwixt them. And so as some as the French ambassadoys were returned home, the king sent his chapleine Christopher Urswike over into France to king Charles, as well to shew that he was glad of the victorie which he had against Maximilian; as to declare that a tempestuous storme of ciuill rebellion himselfe had escaped & overcome here in England.

But the chiefest point of Urswikes errand consisted in this, that he should intimate to the French king, how his maiesty king Henrie offered himselfe as a mediator betwixt him and the duke of Britaine, to make them friends: and if he perceived that the French king gave eare hereunto, then should he go into Britaine, to moue the duke there to be contented, that some reasonable order might be taken for a quietnesse to be had betwixt the French king and him. Whilst Urswike was travelling in this matter (according to his commission) the king came backe againe to London, where he was receiued of the citizens with great ioy and triumph, they being heartilie glad and greatlie reioysing that he with such good successe had subdued his enemies.

60 Shortlie after, he deliuered the lord Thomas Marques Dorset out of the Tower, receiuing him againe to his former fauor and old familiaritie: because his truth and loialtie by diuers assaies and sundrie arguments had bene throughlie tried, and sufficientlie proued. In which meane time, the king for the great loue that he bare to his wife queene Elizabeth, caused her to be crowned and anointed queene on saint Matharins day in Nouember, with all solemnitie, as in such cases appertineth. In the meane season Christopher Urswike (according to his commission) travelled betwixt the French king and the duke of Britaine in the king of Englands name, to make them friends. But although the French king seemed willing enough to haue peace, yet meant he nothing lesse. For he had as manie subtilties in his heart, as there be faces in the world, according to the poet:

For whilst he went about with faire words, courteous letters, and sweet promises to beare the king of England in hand to labour a peace betwixt him and the Britains, he enforced his whole puissance to subdue them, and besieged the citie of Paris. And on the other part, the duke of Orleans being with drawne to the duke of Britaine, and one that ruled most about him, had no liking to heare of peace, but did what he could to hinder it. The English ambassadoys Christopher Urswike (having thus passed from the French king to the duke of Britaine, and backe againe to the French king) returned shortly after into England, and shewed vnto king Henrie what he had done betwixt them.

20 Immediatlie after came to the French king the lord Bernard Daubenete a Scot borne, which on the French kings behalfe required King Henrie to make some maner of end of those Brittainish warres, whatsoeuer it were. King Henrie being desirous of the same, sent ouer againe into France, John the abbat of Abingdon, sir Richard Edgecombe knight, and the forenamed Christopher Urswike, with full and perfect commission & long instructions how to proceed, in obtaining of some agreement betwixt the French men and the Britons. These orators (according as they had in commandement) first went vnto the French king, and after they had communed with him, sir Richard Edgecombe, and Christopher Urswike departed straight to the duke of Britaine, in full hope to conclude a peace, vpon such offers and articles as they had to propound vnto him.

30 But all their hope was vaine, for the duke refused to agree vpon any such articles and conditions as they offered; and so without concluding any thing with the duke, they returned backe into France; and from thence signified to the king of England by letters all that they knew, or had done. But in the meane time, Edward lord Mowbray, uncle to the queene, sued to king Henrie that he might haue a power of men appointed to him, with the which he would scale pituillie ouer without licence or passport, so that euery man should thinke that he was fled the realme, without knowledge of the king, for that no warre should arise by his meanes betwixt the realmes of France and England, and yet should the duke of Britaine be aided against the power of the Frenchmen, which sought to vanquish him, that they might leine his countrie vnto the dominion of France: which in no wise ought to be suffered, considering what annoyance & hurt the same might bring to the realme of England in time to come.

40 Although this request was bitterlie denied, and that the lord Mowbray was straightlie commanded by the king to make no such attempt; yet could not all that staie him, but that withdrawing him into the Ile of Wight, whereof he was made ruler and capitaine, he there gathered together a cruoe of tall & hardie personages, to the number of 400, & with prosperous wind & weather arrived in Britaine, and joined himselfe with the Britons against the Frenchmen. The French king aduertised herof, was not well pleased in his mind towards the king of England; till King Henrie by new messengers informed him how guiltlesse he was in the matter, and that by plain and euident proofes: With the which erule the French king seemed to be the better pacified, and was content to differre the matter.

50 Then the English ambassadoys, renewing the league and amitie betwixt king Henrie & the French king, for the space of twelue moneths, they returned into England; and shewed the king all things that they had either heard or seen: so that he perceived that the French king dealt craftilie in this matter of Britaine, Britaine, still motioning peace when he meant nothing else but warre. He therefore called his high court of parlement, in the which it was not onelie determined that the duke of Britaine should be aided with a power of men against the worisfull inuasions of the Frenchmen, but also there were diuerse summes of monie granted to the furnishing forth and maintenance of the same. And immediatlie herupon, the king sent his ambassadozs into France to certifie the French king what the estates assembled in parlement here in England had decreed.

Wherefore he required him either to surceale the warres which he had in hand against the Britons, or else not to be grieved though he condescended to the iudgement and determination of the lords both spiritual and temporal, and commons of his realme, in taking vpon him the defense of the duke of Britaine; promising neuertheless that the English armie should onelie take land within the duchie of Britaine, and seeke to defend the same against all those that did inuade it, and not to make any warre within the French dominions. This message was nothing regarded of the French king, in so much that the French armie proceeded in oppressing the Britons, destroying the countrie, and besieging townes.

At length on the seuen and twentieth, (as the chronicles of Anton haue) the eight and twentieth daie of Julie, the duke of Britains armie gaue battell to the French host nere to a towne called Saint Aubin, hauing apparelled a thousand and seuen hundred of the Britons in coates with red crosses, after the English fashion, to make the Frenchmen beleue that they had a great number of Englishmen, although they had but foure hundred onelie with the lord Moulle. The victorie in this battell fell to the Frenchmen, so that almost all the Englishmen were slaine with the lord Moulle, beside six thousand Britons. The duke of Cleuance and the prince of Daings were taken prisoners, which were there on the Britons part. The Frenchmen lost twelue hundred men, and amongst other, that balliant Italian capteine James Galeot.

These newes being brought into England, caused king Henrie to make hast in sending forth his armie, and therefore was the lord Woke, with sir John Cheine, sir John Dibleton, sir Rafe Hilton, sir Richard Cobbet, sir Thomas Leighton, sir Richard Laton, and sir Edmund Cornetwall sent ouer into Britaine with all conuenient speed, hauing with them an eight thousand men, well armed and furnished in warlike wise, to aid the duke of Britaine against the Frenchmen. These lustie capteins being arrived in Britaine, after they had a little refreshed them, marched forward, and coming nere to their enemies, pitched downe their field, not farre from the Frenchmens campe.

The Frenchmen by experience knowing the Englishmen (so long as they be fresh and lustie) in manner to be inuincible, thought not good to match with them in open battell, till they were somewhat wearied with long and lingering abroad in the field. And therefore at the first they sought to wearie them with light skirmishes, appointing their horsemen to giue them alarmes, & some skirmishes; in the which the Frenchmen, by reason of the English archers (which galled both men and horses) were euer put to the worse. But behold the mutabilitie of worldlie chancas! While this warre was thus set forward, Francis duke of Britaine departed this life, & then the chiefe rulers of Britain, falling at dissention among themselves, tendered not the defense of their countrie, but rather minded the destruction thereof.

Herupon the Englishmen, perceiving in what danger they were, and considering that it was in the middest of winter, a time not meet for men of warre to lie in the cold and frostie fields, they returned into England, within five monethes after their first setting forth. So that finally the French king got the upper hand of the Britons, and did incorporate that duchie to his realme and crowne of France, as in the historie of France it may appere at large. ¶ In Julie this yere was a pest leued for the king in the cite of London, of foure thousand pounds, which was repaid the yere next following. In September, the queene was deliuered at Winchester of hir first sonne, named prince Arthur; and the five and twentieth of Nouember (next ensuing) she was crowned at Westminster with all due solemnitie.

¶ We haue heard, how there was in the last parlement monie granted for the furnishing forth of the armie into Britaine; that is to wit, it was agreed, that euerie man should be taxed after the rate of his substance, to paie the tenth partie of his goods. Which monie the most part of them that dwelled in the bishopricke of Durham, and in the parties of Dorsetshire refused utterlie to paie: either for that they thought themselves ouercharged with the same; or were procured to shew themselves disobedient, thorough the euill counsell of some seditious persons, which conspired against the king, to put him to new trouble. Therefore such as were appointed collectors, after that they could not get the monie, according to their extract deliuered to them by the commissioners, they made their complaint priuillie to Henrie the fourth earle of Northumberland, chiefe ruler of the North parts.

The earle forthwith signified to the king all that matter, and the king not willing to pardon them of any one partie (least the example might do hurt by encouraging others to shew the like stubbornnes in other parts of the realme) commanded the earle either by distresse or otherwise, to leuie the monie as he should thinke most meet. The rude and headlie people hearing of this answer from the king, by and by with great violence set vpon the earle by the exciting of a simple fellow named John a Chamber, whome the earle with faire words sought to appease. But they like vnreasonable villaines, alledging all the fault to be in him, as chiefe author of the tax, furiously and cruelly murdered both him and diuerse of his household seruants. Diuerse affirme that the Northerne men bare against this earle continuall grudge euer since the death of king Richard, whome they entircly fauoured.

Although this offense was great and heinous; yet there succeeded a more mischief: for incontinentlie (to cloke this presumptuous murder) the Northerne men got them to armour, and assembling together, chose them a capteine, no lesse seditious than desirous of trouble, called sir John Egremond knight; and passing by the countries, they published and declared that they would bid the king battell onelie in defense of their libertie & common freedom, of the which he went about to bareau them. But when the matter should come to be tried with blowes, their hearts so fainted that they scattered away, euerie man seeking to saue himselfe by flight: but that little auailed them.

For the king hearing of this business, sent forth Thomas earle of Surreie (whome not long before he had deliuered out of the Tower, and receiued to his special fauour) with a cruoe of men, to chastise those rebels of the north parts, who skirmished with a certeine companie of them, and them discomfited, and tooke alius John a Chamber, the first beginner of this rebellion. The king himselfe rood after into Dorsetshire, of whose committing the surdie rebels were so abashed and afraid, that they fled more and lesse: which afterward were apprehended, and punished.

shed according to their demerits. Yet the king of his clemencie pardoned the innocent people, and executed the chiefe procurers. For John a Chamber was hanged at Yorke on a gibbet set vpon a square paire of galloves like an archtraitor, and his complices and lowd disciples were hanged on the lower galloves round about their maister, to the terrible example of other.

But sir John Gremond fled into Flanders to the ladie Margaret duchesse of Burgognie, that euer enuied the prosperitie of king Henrie. After this the king returned to London, leauing the earle of Surrie to rule the north parts, and appointed sir Richard Tunsfall, a man of great wit and policie, to gather the subsidie to him due of the people. This yere the king bozrowed of cuerie alderman of London two hundred pounds, and of the Chamber nine thousand eightie two pounds seuentene shillings foure pence; which he repaid againe to the bittermost, with great equitie and thankfulness. [A vertue verie laudable in this god king, and so much the more notable as it is rare; speciallie in mightie men and great estates of the world, that count what soeuer they can catch their owne, as though the purses of the people were theirs to possesse at pleasure & vse at last, without conscience or care of restitution. Which foule fault Ecclesiasticus noteth (affirming that all is lost that is lent them) in expresse words, saying:

Reddere magnates nolunt, quæ mutuas sumunt, Mutua quæ trades interisse scias.

In this season, the emperor Frederike made warre against the Flemings, namelie against Bruges and certeine townes of Flanders, which had rebelled against his sonne Maximilian king of Romans, their liege and souereigne lord; in so much that they of Bruges had not onelie slaine his officers but imprisoned him within their towne, till they had caused him to pardon all their offenses, and also to sweare neuer to remember, nor reuenge the same in time to come. But his father Frederike the emperor could not suffer such a reproch & dishonour done to his sonne (whose fame & princelie estate as he tendered and had in gelosie; so was it his hart greefe and immoderat veration that he should be abused of open contemners, in such villanous sort as tended highlie to the indignitie of his person, and the aggravating of their offense and punishment) to passe unreuenged, & therefore scourged the countrie of Flanders with sharpe and cruell warre.

The lord of Kaenstaine being vsuen to take the same oath, that his maister Maximilian toke at Bruges, to shew that the warre was not begun with his assent, forsake Maximilian his lord, and toke the townes of Ypre and Sluis, with both the castels of the same hauein, and further did not onelie stir the Cantois, Brugeans, and other townes of Flanders, to rebell against their souereigne lord; but also sent to the French kings lieutenant in Picardie, the lord Cozdes, to aid him to conquer such townes of Flanders, as were not of his opinion. The lord Cozdes, otherwile called monsieur de Querdes, was glad to haue so good occasion to set foot in Flanders, as he that had sufficient instructions of his maister the French king, vpon anie such offered occasion so to do, sent forthwith to the aid of the Flemings eight thousand Frenchmen, commanding them to conquer such townes, as were in the waie betwixt France and Bruges.

The capitaine, according to his denisse, besieged a litle walled towne called Dirmeto, to whome came foure thousand Flemings with bittels and artillerie, sent from the lord of Kaenstaine. They laid siege on the north side of the towne, in a marish ground then being drie, and so deepele ditched and rampired their campe about (on which rampire they laid their ordnance) that it was in maner impossible to enter their campe, or do them anie displeasure or damage. The king of England was daile aduertised of these doings, which nothing lesse desired than to haue the English pale inuironed with French fortresses. Wherefore to prevent that mischiefe in time, with all expedition he sent ouer to the lord Daubeneie, then his deputie of Calis, the lord Hozeleie, with a cruue of valiant archers & souldiers, to the number of a thousand men, with priuite instructions what they should do.

At their coming ouer it was bzuted abroad, that they were sent onelie to defend the English pale, against all attempts that might vpon the sudden in anie wise be made by the Frenchmen, or Flemings; but their enterprise was all otherwile. For on a tuesdaie at the shutting of the gates at night, the lord Daubeneie chieftaine of the armie, the lord Hozeleie, sir James Tirrell capteine of Guisnes, sir Henrie Willoughbie, sir Gilbert Talbot, and sir Humfreie Talbot marshall of Calis, with diuerse other knights, and esquieres, and other of the garisons of Hammes, Guisnes, and Calis, to the number of two thousand men or thereabouts, issued priuile out of Calis, & passed the water of Craueling in the morning betimes; and left there for a scale, and to keepe the passage, sir Humfreie Talbot, with sir score archers, and came to Zetwport, where they found the souereigne of Flanders with sir hundred Almaines, and there they staid that night.

On the next daie they went toward Dirmeto, and by the guiding of a prisoner, that should haue bene hanged on the next morning, they issued out of the southgate of the towne of Dirmeto, and were conueied by their said guide by an high banke set with willowes; so that the Cantois could not well espie them, and so secretlie gat to the end of their enemies campe, and there paused. The lord Daubeneie commanded all men to send their hostes and wagons backe, but the lord Hozeleie said he would ride till he came to hand strokes. Thus they marched forth till they came to a low banke, and no deepe ditch, where the ordinance laie; and there the archers shot altogether, euerie man an arrow, and so fell prostrate to the ground. The enemies here with discharged their ordinance, and ouerthot them.

The Almaines lept ouer the ditch with their morrice pikes. The Englishmen in the fore-front waded the ditch, and were holpen by by the Almaines, and set on their enemies, and toke manie prisoners. The other Englishmen passed by the cause to enter in at the north gate of the campe, where the lord Hozeleie being on horsebacke in a rich coate, was slaine with a gun. When his death was knowne, euerie man killed his prisoner, and slue all such as did withstand them, to the number of eight thousand men; in so much that of two thousand that came out of Bruges (as the Flemish chronicle reporteth) there came not home one hundred. On the English part was slaine the lord Hozeleie, and not an hundred more.

The Englishmen toke their ordinance and sent it to Zetwport, with all the spoile and great hostes. And by the waie hearing certeine Frenchmen to be at Dikend, they made thitherward: but the Frenchmen fled, and so they burned part of the towne, and came againe to Zetwport, where the lord Daubeneie left all the Englishmen that were hurt and returned to Calis, where he buried the bodie of the lord Hozeleie. The Englishmen got great riches at this field, for they that went forth in cloth, came home in silke, and those that went out on foot, came home on great hostes. The lord Cozdes being at Ypre with twentie thousand men, was sore displeased with this overthrow; & therefore thinking to be reuenged, besieged the take of Petport right strongly, and shot baslie at the wals, breaking them in many places.

But the Englishmen that were hurt at Dimeswels before, and might either stand or draw bowes, neuer came from the wals. On a date the Frenchmen gave a great assault to a tower, and perforce entered it, and set up the banner of the lord Cordes. But the chance! During the time of the assault, there arrived a barker with foure scoze fresh English archers, which came streight to the tower, and did so much, that what with the helpe of such as before were wounded and hurtmen, and of the contragious harts of the new come archers encouraged greatly by the women of the towne, crying; Shot Englishmen, shot: the tower was regained out of the Frenchmens hands, and the banner of the lord Cordes rent in peeces, and in place thereof the pennon of saint George set up. When the Frenchmen, supposing a great aid of Englishmen to have bene come to the towne by sea, left the assault.

And the night following, the envious lord Cordes (which so longed for Calis, that he would commonlie saie, that he could be content to lie seven yeares in hell, so that Calis were in possession of the Frenchmen) byake up his siege, and returned to Helbing with shame. And the Englishmen glad of this victorie returned to Calis. This yeare James the third of that name king of Scots was slaine by his owne subiects, after they had vanquished him in a pight field. About the same time one Adrian an Italian was sent in ambassage from pope Innocent the eight into Scotland, to haue taken up the variance betwixt the king there and his people. But being arrived here in England, he was informed that king James was slaine, and therfore taried here certeine moethes.

And for that he was a man of excellent learning, vertue, and humanitie, the archbishop of Canturburie John Hoxton so commended him to the king, that he made him first bishop of Hereford, and shortly after, that resigned and given ouer, he promoted him to the bishopricke of Bath and Welles. And after that with these honors he was returned to Rome, he was aduanced by all the degrees of spiritual dignities into the college of the cardinals. And worthy sure he was of great preferment, for by his meanes, learned men were moued to take out the vse of eloquent writing and speaking in the Latine tongue, he being the first in the time of our fathers that taught the trade to chose and ble apt words and fit termes.

In the first yeare of king Henries reignt there came ambassadors to him from the French king the lord Francis of Lutzenburgh, Charles Martignane, and Robert Caguine minister of the Bonnehommes of the trinitie. The effect of their coming was to haue concluded a peace with king Henrie, and that with god will the French king might dispose of the mariage of the young duchesse of Britaine, as he should thinke good; and to make void the contract and former mariage, which by pforce the deuisie of Parmillan king of Romanis had before time contracted & made with hir. But thereto would not king Henrie give his consent, ever harping on this string, that the maiden being once lawfullie combined in matrimonie with Parmillan, ought not to be compelled against hir will and promise (yes and contrarie to all law, right and equitie) to take anie other person than him to his spouse and husband.

In deed king Henrie was loth that the French king should marrie the duchesse of Britaine himselfe (as he perceived his meaning was) and so to some the duchesse of Britaine to the crowne of France; and therefore he did what he could to hinder that bargaine. Yet at length it was agreed that a forme of a league should be drawn with conditions, clauses, and covenants. And for full concluding of the same, it was thought expedient, that the king of England should send ambassadors to the French king to finish all matters betwixt them. Whereupon the French ambassadors being dismissed with great rewards, straightwaies Thomas erle of Dymond, and Thomas Goldenfon pilot of Chilles church in Canturburie, were appointed by the king to followe them into France, instructed fullie in althings that he would haue on his behalfe either moued or determined.

In this meane space, Lionell the bishop of Concordia was sent as our from pope Alexander the first to the French king for certeine matters; and amongst other things, he had in charge to conclude a peate and trillie betwixt the French king and the king of England. He mousing this matter to the French king, found him nothing strange, to incline to his motion. Whereupon the bishop of Concordia conceiuing god hope, and therewith desirous (as became him best bearing that title) to set an atfement betwixt those two kings, took his iourne towards England, to the intent he might moue king Henrie to be agreeable thereto, and so coming to Calis, found the English ambassadors there, being so farre on their waie towards the French king; and being honorablie receiued of them into that towne, after they had communed together, the bishop took the sea, and was transported ouer into England, and the ambassadors departed towards the French king.

After the bishop of Concordia had talked with king Henrie, and perceived that (upon reasonable conditions) he could be content to conclude a peace with all christian princes, and to live in rest after so manie troubles afore time sustained, the said bishop returned backe into France to sollicit this purpose to some perfect conclusion. But the Frenchmen so handled the matter, that whilst they outwardlie shewed how they desired nothing but friendship and amitie, they allured the young dutchesse of Britaine to submit herselfe wholly to their discretion, so that shortly after she was married to king Charles. Now the English ambassadors, after they perceived which waie the wind would blowe, returned againe to their countrie, and nothing done, agreed upon in their matters.

King Henrie for troubled in his mind therewith, determining wth those with peaceable messages, but with open waite to determine all controuersies betwixt him and the French king, called his high court of parlement; and thereto declared the cause why he was iustlie provoked to make waite against the Frenchmen; and therewith desired them of their benivolent aid of might and manie towards the maintenance therof. The cause was so iust, that neuer man allowed it; and to the setting forth of the waie taken in hand for so necessarie occasion, euerie man promised his helping hand. The king commended them for their true and faithfull hearts. And to the intent that he might spare the power lost of the commonwealth (whome he ever desired to keepe in fauor) he thought good first to exact minie of the richest lost by waie of a benivolence.

Which kind of lending minie was first devised by king Edward the fourth, as it appeareth before in his history. King Henrie following the like example, published abroad, that by their open gifts he would measure and search their benivolent hearts and good minies toward him; so that he that gaue most, should be iudged to be his most loving friend; and he that gaue little, to be esteemed according to his gift. By this it appeareth, that whatsoever is practised for the prince princes profit, and brought to a president by matter of record; maie be turned to the great prejudice of the people, if rulers in authoritie will so adiudge and determine it. But by this means king Henrie got innumerable great summes of monie, with some grudge of the people, for the extremitie shewed by the commissioners in diuers places.

We haue heard before, how the lord of Hauenstein, by the aid of Buges & Cant, had taken the towne and two castles of Sluis, which he kept against his souereigne lord Maximilian, and getting into the haven certaine ships and barks, robbed, spoiled, & took prisoners the ships and vessels of all nations that passed alongest by that coast, towards the mart at Antwerpe, or into anie part of Babant, Zeland, or Friesland, and was ever sufficientlie vittelled out of France and Picardie. There was a little towne also two miles from Buges towards the sea, called Dam, which was a bulworke to Buges, and an helpe to Sluis. The king of Romans had attempted the taking of this towne diuers times, but misse his purpose; till at length Albert duke of Saronie, a great friend to the king of Romans, by pollicie found means to get it.

Albert the duke of Saronie pollicie to get the towne of Dam.

This duke feining himselfe as a neuter betwixt the king of Romans, and the rebels of Flanders, required of the lords of Buges, that he might enter peaceable into their towne according to his estate, with a certaine number of men of armes, to communicate with them diuerse matters of great weight, and sent before his carriages and herbengers to make provision. They of Buges were in no doubt of him, so that his men of warre entered into the citie in good order, and he followed. They that went before, inquired for innes and lodgings, as though they would haue rested there all the night, and so went forth still in order asking after lodgings, till they came at the gate that leapech directly towards Dam, distant from Buges a Flemish mile, which is called the bulworke of Buges.

The duke of Saronie sent forth for aid to king Henrie to win Sluis.

The captains and inhabitants of Dam suspecting no harme to come out of Buges, thought their friends (knowing some danger towards) had sent them aid, and so nothing mistrusting those that approached their towne, suffered them to enter, and so was the towne of Dam taken by sleight, which could not be wonne by open force. This chance sore displeased them of Buges, for now could they haue no recourse to the sea, so that they must needs fall into ruine and decay. The duke of Saronie thus hauing wonne the towne of Dam, sent to the king of England, that if it would please him to aduise anie aid by sea, he would besiege Sluis by land. Whereupon the king of England, upon due consideration of the dukes motion (as he was wise enough in all his enterprizes; and no lesse fortunate in the issue of the same) would conclude nothing upon the sudden, but (as he did alwaies) ruled his affaires by good counsell, like to the wise man commended in the holie scripture:

The duke of Saronie sent forth for aid to king Henrie to win Sluis.

Gu. Ha. in Tob. 4.

Sir Edward Poynings a valiant captain sent into Flanders with an armie

At last he well remembering that Sluis was a troulesome, and a verie den of thieues to them that trauesed the seas towards the east parts, incontinentlie dispatched sir Edward Poynings a right valiant knight and hardie captaine, with twelve ships well furnished with bold soldiers, and sufficient artillery. Which sir Edward sailed into the haven, and kept the lord of Hauenstein from trafficking by sea. The Duke of Saronie besieged one of the castles, lying in a church over against it; and the Englishmen assaulted the lesse castell, and shewed out of their ships at the ebbe, neuer suffering their enemies to rest, in quiet one day together, for the space of twentie days, and euerie day slue some of their aduersaries; and on the English part were slaine one there; brother to the earle of Oxford, and fiftie more.

The lord of Hauenstein had made a bridge of botes betwene both the castles, to passe from the one to the other; which bridge one night the English men did set on fire. When he, perceiving that he must lose his castles by force, and that the Flemings could not aid him, yielded the castles to sir Edward Poynings, and the towne to the duke of Saronie, upon certaine conditions. Sir Edward Poynings kept the castles a while, of whom the Almains demanded their waages, because the duke had nothing to paie. Then these two captains so handled them of Buges, that they not onelie submitted themselves to their lord Maximilian; but also were contented to paie and dispatch the Almains. And so sir Edward Poynings taried there a long space, and at length returned to the king before Bullogne.

The first day of Aprill this present yeare, the nobles of the realme assembled in the cathedrall church of St. Paule in London, where the maior of the same citie, his brethren the aldermen, and the craftemen in their liveryes also assembled: to whom doctor Bolton chancelor made an oration, declaring how the king of Spaine had wonne the great and rich citie & countrey of Granada from the Turks: for soe whereof Te Deum was sung with great solemnitie. But because it is requisite and necessarie in this ample volume, to set downe the report of accidents as they are to be found at large in our owne English writers: you shall heare for the furtherance of your knowledge in this matter concerning Granada, what Ed. Hall hath left noted in his chronicle. Which although it containe diuerse actions of superstition, and popish trumperie: yet should it not offend the reader, considering that a people estranged from the true knowledge of God and sincere religion put the same in practise, as supposing principall holinesse to consist in that blind deuotion.

On the first of Aprill (saith he) this yeere, the king commanded all the nobilitie of his realme to assemble at the cathedrall church of St. Paule in London, where (after Te Deum solemnlye sung) the cardinal of Cantuarbie, standing on the steps before the quier doore, declared to the people, how the famous citie of Granada, which manie yeares had bene possessed of the Moors or Mauritanie nation, being infidels & unchristened people, was now of late besieged a great time by Don Ferdinand and Elisabeth his wife, king and queene of Spaine, Arragon, and Castile. And the said infidels, by reason of siege brought to great penurie and miserie, for lacke of vittels & necessarie viands, perceiving that all succours were clerelie stopped and excluded from them, and so brought into bitter despaire of aid, or comfort, after long consultation had amongst them, determined to render themselves and their citie to the said king upon diuerse covenants and conditions, and thereupon sent to him diuerse senators of the citie fullie instructed of their mind and purpose.

The king of Spaine and his counsell, considering and sagelie pondering that winter approached & was at hand, and that the christian host had long lien in the fieldes in soe tempests and grauous stormes (which they gladlie suffered for Christes sake, in whose cause and quarell they made that present waere) remembering also that the citie was of such riches, fame, and estimation, that it contained an hundred and fiftie thousand houses of name, beside other small houses and cotages; & that it was replenished with people innumerable, and furnished with three score thousand good fighting men; and finally, perceiving that he might in soe soon the possession of the same, without assault or effusion of christian blood, Admiral Bolton made an oration to the king of Spain.

The duke of Saronie sent forth for aid to king Henrie to win Sluis.

bloud by the aduise of his counsell, he accepted, accorded, and agreed to their offers the twentie and fift of Nouember, in the yere of Christs incarnation 1491, then being the daie of saint Katharine.

By the which composition, the roiall citie of Granada, with all the holds and fortresses of the realme, and the towers and castels of Alpuſſarare was reudered into the hands of the said king of Spaine; and that the king of Granada should become subiect and vassall to the king of Spaine, and to relinquish and forſake the vsurped name of a king for euer: and that all the men of warre should franklie depart out of the citie, and none there to remaine, but artifi-cers and merchants: and all these things to be done before the five & twentieth day of Januarie. But the time was prevented, for the Moors on the first day of Januarie sent six hundred notable personages out of the citie with their children for hostages into the campe of the king of Spaine, to the intent that he should put no diffidence nor mistrust in the citizens, but that he might peaceablie and quietlie with his people enter into the citie, and take possession of the same. The which hostages were distributed and lodged in the tents and pavillions of the Spanishe armie.

The third of Januarie, the lord of Guiterins Cardenes, great master & gouernor of Lion, of the order of S. James, departed from the armie, noble and triumphantlie accompanied with five hundred horſemen, and three thousand footmen toward the citie.
And as he approached nere to the suburbs, there issued out diuers noble and valiant captieins of the Moors, making to him humble obeisance, and conducted him to a palace adioining to the citie, called the palace of Anararas, and from thence conueied him to the palace roiall of the same citie called Alhambra, whereof hee took quiet and peaceable possession, to the behoofe of the king of Spaine, whome the Moors promised and confessed to take and obteine, as their king and soueraigne lord. And in signe and token that they thought in their hearts, that which they promised by mouth; they prostrated and humbled themselves before the said great master, and with dolorous lamentation and salt teares deli-uered to him the keyes of the said palace.

When he had the keyes, and was also possessed of that strong and magnificent place, he first of all dispatched the house of all the Moors and pagans, and appointed a garrison of valiant and noble christians, to keepe and defend the same: and the same day caused a masse solemne to be celebrate in a place of the same palace called Melchita; which done and finished, he took possession of all the fortresses, towers, and holds to the said citie and towne of Granada belonging or pertaining. And then he caused to be erected and set vp on the highest tower of the palace (where it might best be seene) the signe and token of the crosse, whereon Christ for vs sinners suffered his bitter passion. At the raising whereof were present an archbishop, and three bishops, with other prelates, which deuoutlie sang this anthem: O crux, auſpex vnicus.

The said crosse was three times deuoutlie liſſed, and at euerie exaltation, the Moors being within the citie, roied, howled, & cried, prostrating themselves, groueling on the ground, & making dolorous noise and pittifull outcries. The armie encamped without the citie, seeing these things, humbled themselves meeklie before the crosse, rendering to almightie God their most humble and heartie thanks. The king of Spaine, being mounted on horsebacke, perfecting the erection of the crosse, descended from his sennet, and knieled downe on the bare ground; and rendered to God, laud, honour, and praise; for that noble and triumphant victorie. And after that the crosse was thus set vp on the high tower, the banner of saint James, and the kings banners were pitched and fixed vpon the turrets and pinacles of the citie; an herald standing in the top of the high tower, proclaiming and publishing these wordes following.

Saint James, saint James, saint James; Castile, >> Castile, Castile; Granada, Granada, Granada. By >> high and mightie power, lord Ferdinando and Eli- >> zabeth, king and queene of Spaine, haue ioined from >> the infidels and Moors the citie and realme of Gra- >> nada, through the helpe of our Lord God, & the most >> glozious virgin his mother, and the vertuous apostle >> S. James, and the holie father Innocent the eight, >> together with the aids and succours of the great pre- >> lates, knights, and other gentlemen bozne, and com- >> mons of their realmes and countries. When the herald had finished, the artillerie sounded, the minstrels blew, the people applauded and clapped their hands for gladnesse, that the earth seemed to tremble and quake vnderneath them.

After this ioy ended, there issued out of the citie in maner of procession, seven hundred and mo christians, as well men, as women and children, which had bin there prisoners and liued in bonds, seruitude, and miserable captiuitie, whereof the most part were naked, wounded, and in maner famished for hunger.
To whome the king (of his great liberaltie) gaue both apparell, blands and monie. These poore prisoners comming out of the citie sang this psalme; Benedictus Dominus Deus Israel, qui visitauit & fecit redem-ptionem plebi suae; Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, which hath visited and redeemed his people. And so singing forth the psalme, went to the church of saint Faith, which the king Ferdinando had caused to be most sumptuouslie edified during the time of the siege, being distant from Granada two or three miles.

Now as this poore procession passed by the host, one espied his sonne, and another saw his brother; and the son perceived the father, and the father found the daughter, which were now deliuered out of miserable seruitude and bondage. But they could not refraine nor bysole themselves from disfilling of teares and sobbing, seeing their parents and kinfolk resored to libertie & freedome. And when these people had said their orisons in the church of saint Faith; and were come to the armie, they knieled before the king, killed his feet, crying with one voice; God grant to the king of Spaine euerlasting life. The next daie after the lord Cuenus de Mendoza, earle of Enduglie, was by the king made captieine of the house roiall and principall tower of the citie of Granada, called Alhambra, hauing to him appointed and assigned one thousand men of armes, and two thousand footmen. Vnto the which earle, the great master deli-uered the keyes of the said palace and tower, and other ports and fortresses.

On saturday the eight daie of Januarie, in the 60 yere of our Lord 1492, Ferdinando II. of Spaine & Granada, the queene, & their eldest son Don John prince of Spaine, the lord Peter of Mendoza, the archbishop of Toledo, the patriarch of Alexandria, the cardinall of Spaine, the lord Peter prince of Lion, the duke of Cadixan, the marques of Villena & Poia, the erle of Caprie, the erle of Uienra of Cifuentes, and manie other earles, barons, and nobles, whereof some were Englishmen (whose names I haue not) with ten thousand horsemen, and fiftie thousand footmen, with great triumph and roialtie entered into the citie of Granada, and thereof took real possession & seazine, and caused masse to be song in a great place called Melchita, where hee caused a solemne church to be builded in the honour of God and his mother.

The carle of Lendiglie capteine of the palace, feasted the king and quene, and all the nobilitie at his owne costes and charges. So the king of Spaine there remained till the countrie was reduced into a good conformitie and order, and diuerse fortresses and castels were made for the safegard and tuition of the realme. And because this victorie obtained, was to the glorie of God, and to the publike wealth of all christianitie, the said cardinall of Cantuarbie declared to the people, that the king had sent him and the other nobles thither that day, not onelie to notify and declare to them the vertue of the fact, but also to exhort them to giue lauds and praaisings to almighty God, for deliuering so goodlie a citie, so plentifull a countrie, and so notable a region out of the hands of his enemies, and persecutors of his faith and religion. Which declaration ended, the archbishop with the cleargie & the nobles with the communaltie, in most deuout manner went in generall procession, rendering to God for this great atchieued enterprise, glorie, honour, and most reuerent thanks.]

Sir James Parker by casualty at these mortalitie wounded. Two pardoners set on the pilloie.

Robert Fabian.

In the moneth of Maie next and immediatlie following this triumph, was holden a great and ballant within the kings palace of Shene, now named Richmond, the which indured by the space of a moneth, sometime within the said palace, and sometime without, upon the graine before the gate of the said palace. In which losses sir James Parker knight, running against a gentleman named Hugh Waghian, by casualty was so fore hurt and bruised, that he died thereof. This yeare also two pardoners were set on the pilloie in Coznehill thre market daies, for forging of false pardons, wherewith they had deceived the people, & got much monie. And for that one of them had feined himselfe to be a priest, he was sent to Newgate, where he died: the other was driven out of London with shame enough. Also this yeare was Robert Fabian thiriffe of London & alderman, who made a chronicle of England & of France, beginning at the creation of the world, and ending in the third yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the eight, which booke is now imprinted to the end of Richard the third.

Parimilian king of Romans, intending to be reuenged on the Frenchmen for the manie iniuries done to him of late (and especiallie for that king Charles had forsaken his daughter ladie Margaret, and purposed to take to wife the ladie Anne of Britaine) because he was not rich enough to mainteine the warre of himselfe, he sent his ambassadour, one James Contibald, a trian of great wisdom, to require the king of England to take his part against the French king, making diuers great offers on his owne behalfe, if it should please him so to do.

King Henrie and Parimilian agree to plague the Frenchmen.

Anno. Reg. 7.

The cause of Parimilians malice against Charles of France.

King Henrie no lesse desirous than Parimilian to put the French king to trouble, and chieflie to aid the Britains in the extremitie of their businesse, gladly consented to the request of Parimilian; and promised to prepare an armie with all speed, and in time convenient to passe the seas with the same, and invade the French territories. In this verie season, Charles the French king received the ladie Anne of Britaine, as his pupill into his hands, and with great solemnitie hir espoused, hauing with hir in dower, the whole duchie of Britaine.

John was Parimilian in great chafe toward the French king, not onelie for that he had refused his daughter, but also had bereuen him of his assured wife the said ladie Anne, contrarie to all right and conscience. Therefore he sent unto king Henrie, desiring him with all speed to passe the seas with his armie, that they might pursue the warre against their aduersarie, with fire, sword and blood. King Henrie hearing this, and hauing no mistrust in the promise of Parimilian, with all speed leued an armie, and rigged his nauie of ships. And when all things were readie, he sent his almonier Christopher Urswike, and sir John Kisele knight unto Parimilian, to certifye him, that the king was in a readinesse, and would arrive at Calis, as soone as he should be aduertised that Parimilian and his men were readie to ioine with him.

These ambassadours coming into Flanders, perceived that Parimilian was neither purueied of men, monie, nor armes, nor of any other thing necessary for the setting forth of warre; sauing onlie that his will was good, although his power was small. King Henrie being aduertised hereof by letters sent to him from his said ambassadours, was soze disquieted in his mind, and was almost brought to his wits end, to consider how his companions in arms should thus faile him at need; but taking aduise of his counsell, at length he determined not to stay his prepered iourne, and therefore he so increased his numbers before he took ship, that he with his owne power might be able to match with his aduersaries. When he had thus gathered and assembled his armie, he sailed to Calis the first day of October, and there incamped himselfe for a space, to see all his men and prouision in such readinesse, as nothing should be wanting.

In this place all the armie had knowledge by the ambassadours (which were newlie returned out of Flanders) that Parimilian could not set forth any armie, for lacke of monie: and therefore there was no succour to be looked for at his hand. But the Englishmen were nothing dismayd therewith, as they that iudged themselves able enough to match the Frenchmen without the helpe of any other nation. In the meane season, although the French king had an armie togither, both for number and furniture able to trie in battell with the Englishmen: yet he made semblance as though he desired nothing more than peace, as the thing much more profitable to him than warre: considering the minds of the Britains were not yet wholly settled.

And againe, he was called into Italie to make warre against the king of Naples, whose kingdome he pretended to appertene to him by lawfull succession from his father king Lewis, to whose Keine duke of Anjou last king of Sicill, of the house of Anjou, had transferred his right to that kingdome (as partly before ye haue heard) wrongfullie and without cause dis inheriting his cosine, godsonne and heire, Keine duke of Lorraine and Bar. The lord Chordes hauing commission from his master the French king to make some entrie into a treatie for peace with the king of England, wrote letters to him before he passed ouer to Calis, signifieng to him that if it might stand with his pleasure to send some of his counsellors to the borders of the English pale adjoining to France, there should be so reasonable conditions of peace proffered, that he doubted not but his grace might with great honour breake by his campe, and retire his armie home againe.

The king of England considering that Britaine was clerelie lost, and past recouerie, and that Parimilian for lacke of monie, and mistrust which he had in his owne subjects, late still like a doymonle doing nothing; and herewith weighing that it should be honorable to him, and profitable to his people to determine this great warre without bloodshed, appointed the bishop of Excester, and Giles lord Dandenie to passe the seas to Calis, and so to commun with the 1000 Chordes of articles of peace, which toke effect as after ye shall perceiue. In the meane time, whilest the commissioners were communing of peace on the marches of France, the king of England (as ye haue heard) was arrived at Calis: from whence after all things were prepared for such a tournie, he remained in foure battels forwarde, till he came nere to the towne of Bullogne, & there pitched his tents before it in a conuenient place for his purpose, meaning to assaile the towne with his whole force & puissance.

But there was such a strong garison of warlike soldiers within that fortresse, and such plentie of ar-tillerie, and necessarie munitions of warre, that the holle of Englishmen assaulting the towne (as was doubted) should be greater damage to the realme of England, than the gaining thereof should be profit.
Wherfore the daileie shot of the kings battering peeces brake the wals, and soze defaced them. But when euerie man was readie to giue the assault, a sudden rumor rose in the armie that peace was concluded; which bruite as it was pleasant to the Frenchmen, so was it displeasing to the Englishmen, because they were prest and readie at all times to set on their enemies, and brought into great hope to haue bene inriched by the spoile and gaine to haue fallen to their lots of their enemies goods, beside the glorious fame of renowned victorie.

And therefore to be defrauded heretof by an unprofitable peace, they were in great fume, and verie angrie: and namelie, for that diuerse of the capteins to set themselves and their bandes the more gorgeously forwarde, had borrowed large summes of monie, and for the repaiment had mortgaged their lands and possessions, and some happilie had made through sale thereof, trusting to recouer all againe by the gaine of this tournie. Wherfore offended with this sudden conclusion of peace, they spake euill both of the king and his counsell. But the king like a wise prince assuaged their displeasure in part with excusing the matter, alleging that losse and bloudshed was like to issue both of capteins and souldiers, if the assault should haue bene giuen to the vtterance, especiallie sith the towne was so well furnished with men and munitions. When he had somewhat appeased their minds with these and manie other reasons, he returned backe againe to Calis.

There were not manie of the English armie lost at this siege of Bullogne, & few of no men of name, saying that valiant capteine sir John Sauage knight, the which, as he and sir John Killicke rode about the wals of the towne, to view in what place it might be easilist assaulted, was compassed about by certeine Frenchmen that were issued out of the towne, and there staine standing at defense, and vtterlie refusing to yeld him- selfe as prisoner. But sir John Killicke escaped by slinging alwaie. When the king was thus returned to Calis, he began to smell a cer-teine secret smoke, which was like to turne to a great flame, without wise foresight, and good looking to. For by the craftie inuen- tion, and diu- elish imagination of the ladie Margarete duchesse of Burgognie, a new dole was set vp in Flanders, and by a forged name called Richard Plantagenet second sonne to king Edward the fourth, as though he had bene raised from death to life.

The newes heretof somewhat troubled him, so that he was with better will content to receive the honorable conditions of peace offered of his enemy: because he should not be constrained at one time to make warre both at home, and also in a forren region. The conclusion of this agreement made with the Frenchmen, was this: That this peace should continue both their liues; and that the French king should pay to the king of England a certeine summe of monie in hand, according as the commissioners should appoint for his charges sustained in this tour-nie. Which as the king certified the mayo: of London by his letters the ninth of Nouember) amounted to the summe of seven hundred fiftie and five thousand duchats: the which is of sterling monie, one hundred soure scoze and six thousand, two hundred and fiftie pounds. It was also concluded that he should yeare-lie (for a certeine space) paie or cause to be paid, for the monie that the king had spent & expended in the defence of the Britains five & twentie thousand crowns.

Which yearelie tribute the French king (afterwards continuallie occupied in the wars of Italie) yearelie satisfied & paid so long as the king lived, who after he had taried a conuenient space at Calis, tooke the sea, and arrived at Douer, and so came to his manour of Grenewich. Immediatlie after his returne thus into England, he elected into the fellowship of saint George, commonlie called the order of the garter, Alphonse duke of Calabze, sonne and heire to Ferdinando king of Naples. Christopher Arkwike the kings almoner was sent to him into Naples with the garter, collar, mantell, and other habillments appertaining to the companions of that noble order. The which was reuerentlie receiued of the said duke, who in a solemne presence reuelled himselfe with that habit, supposing by the countenance of that apparell to be able to resist his aduersarie the French king, sith he was now made a friend and companion in order with the king of England: but that little auailed him, as after it was right apparant. And here, because in sumorie actions we haue sene and obserued the French kings subtilties, his inconstancie, lacke of truth, honestie, and kinglike modestie; we maie be bold to set downe the description of his person, as we find the same readie & alone to hand; that by a view thereof we maie conclude that his properties were proportioned to his person.

It is verie certeine (saith mine author) that king Charles from his infancy was of complexion verie delicate, and of bodie vnfound and diseased, of small stature, and of face (if the aspect and dignitie of his eyes had bene taken alwaie) fowle and deformed, his other members bearing such equall proportion, that he seemed more a monster than a man: he was not onelie without all knowledge of good sciences, but scarcelie he knew the distinct characters of letters: his mind desirous to command, but more proper to anie other thing, for that being inuironed alwaies with his familiars and fauourits, he retained with them no maiestie or authoritie: he reiected all affaires and businesse, and yet if he did debate and consider in anie, he shewed a weake discretion and iudgement.
And if he had any thing in him that carried apparance of merit or praise, yet being thoroughlie weied and founde, it was found further off from vertue than from vice: he had an inclination to glorie, but it was tempered more with rashnesse and furie than with moderation and counsell: his liberalities were without discretion, measure, or distinction: immoueable oftentimes in his purposes, but that was rather an ill grounded obstinacie than constancie. And that which manie call bountie, deserued more reasonable in him the name of coldnesse & slackenesse of spirit.]

This yeare the two and twentieth of June, was borne at Grenewich the lord Henrie, second sonne to this king Henrie the seuenth, which was created duke of Yorke, & after prince of Wales, and in conclusion succeeded his father in gouernance of this realme, by the name of Henrie the eight, father to our gracions souereigne queene Elizabeth. But now conured by mens policies from death to life: ye shall vnderstand that the duchesse of Burgogne euer desiring to cast a scorpion in the bosome of king Henrie, not for anie displeasure by him towards hir wrought or done; but onelie because he was descended of the house of Lancaster, being an enimie to hir line, began to spin a new web, like a spider that daile weaueth when his kall is tozine: for after that the earle of Lincolne, which was by hir set forth, had missed the cushin, and lost both horse and spurres, he could not be quiet, untill he had practised a new deuise to put king Henrie to trouble. And as the diuell prouideth venomous sauce to corrupt stomachs, so for hir purpose she espied a certeine yong man of visage beautiful, of countenance demure, and of wit craftie and subtil.

Perkin war-becke & counterfeit duke of Yorke.

This youths name was Peter Warbecke, one for his faintnesse of stomach of the Englishmen in derision called Perkin Warbecke, according to the dutch phrase, which change the name of Peter to Perkin, of yonglings and little boies, which for want of age, lacke of strength, and manlike courage, are not thought worthe of the name of a man. This yong man traueilling many countries, could speake English and diuerse other languages; & for his basenesse of birth and stocke, was almost unknowne of all men; and diuened to seeke liuing from his childhood, was constrained to go and traueill thorough manie countries. The duchesse glad to haue got so meet an organ for the conuensing of hir inuented purpose, as one not unlike to be taken and reputed for the duke of Yorke, somtime to hir brother king Edward, which was called Richard, kept him a certeine space with hir priuile.

The readie wit of Perkin to learne all that made for his preferment to honor.

Besides that, the with such diligence instructed him both in the secrets and common affaires of the realme of England, and of the linage, descent and order of the house of Yorke, that like a good scholer, not forgetting his lesson, he could tell all that was taught him promptlie without anie flackering or faile in his words. And besides that, he kept such a princelie countenance, and so counterfeited a maiestie roiall, that all men in manner did firmelie beleue, that he was extracted of the noble house and familie of the dukes of Yorke. For suerlie, it was a gift giuen to that noble progenie, as of nature planted in the rof, that all the sequels of that line and stocke did studie and deuise how to be equiualent in honour and fame with their forefathers and noble predecessors.

The emulation of the dukes of Yorke.

When the duchesse had framed hir cloath meet for the market, she was informed that king Henrie prepared to make warre against Charles the French king. Wherefore she, thinking that the time serued well for the setting forth of hir malicious inuention, sent this Perkin hir new inuented matomet, first into Portugale, and so craftilie into the countrie of Ireland; to the intent that he, being both wittie and wille, might inuegle the rude Irishmen (being at those daies moze inclined to rebellion than to reasonable order) to a new seditious commotion. Shortly after his arrivall in Ireland, whether by his shrewd wit, or the malicious exhortation of the savage Irish gouernours, he entred so farre in credit with the people of that Ile, that his words were taken to be as true, as he vntrue with false demonstrations set forth and published them.

Perkin war-
becke arriueth in Ireland.

The French king aduertised hercof, then being in displeasure with king Henrie, sent into Ireland for Perkin, to the intent to send him against king Henrie, which was then inuading France (as ye before haue heard.) Perkin thought himselfe aloft, now that he was called to the familiaritie of kings, and therefore with all diligence sailed into France, and comming to the kings presence, was of him roiallie receiued, and after a princelie fashion interteined, and had a gard to him assigned, whereof was gouer-nour the lord Congreshall: and to him being at Paris, reposed sir George Peuill bassard, sir John Tailor, Rowland Robinson, and an hundred English rebels. Now, after that a peace (as before is said) was concluded betwixt the French king, and the king of England, the French king dismissed Perkin, and would no longer keepe him.

But some haue said (which were there attending on him) that Perkin, fearing least the French king should deliuer him to the king of England, beguiled the lord Congreshall, and fled from Paris by night.
But whether the French king knew of his departure or not, the truth is, that he being in maner in despaire, returned to his first founder the ladie Spargaret, of whome he was so welcomed to all outward appearance, that it seemed he could not haue reioiced at anie earthlie thing moze, than the did at his presence, and (as he could well dissemble) the made semblance as though she had neuer seene him before that time. Now as she had soze longed to know not once, but diuerse times in open audience, and in soleme presence, she willed him to declare and shew by what means he was preserved from death and destruction, and in what countries he had wandered and sought friendship; and finally, by what chance of fortune he came to hir court.

This did she, to the intent that by the open declaration of these fained phantasies, the people might be persuaded to giue credit, and beleue that he was the true begotten sonne of hir brother king Edward.
And after this, she assigned to him a gard of thirtie persons in murrie and blew, and highlie honoured him as a great estate, and called him the white rose of England. The nobilitie of Flanders did to him all reuerence. [All which port and pompe exhibited in most soleme sort, he was well content to take vpon him, forgetting the basenesse of his birth, and glory-eng in the counterfeited title of honour: much like the saw that would be called a swan, or like the crow that trimming hir selfe with the stolne feathers of a peacocke, would seeme Junos bird; as the poet sayth:

mentito nomine cygnam Graculus appellat sese, cornicula plumas Pauonis furata cepit pauo ipsa vidori.

In this yeare was one Hugh Clopton master of London, and of the staple, a gentleman, borne at Clopton village, halfe a mile from Stratford vpon Auen by nozth, who continued (during his life) a bacheler: he builded the great and sumptuous bidge of Stratford vpon Auen, at the east end of the towne.
This bidge hath foureteene great arches, and a long cawse with smaller arches, all made of stone, new walled on each side. At the west end of the bidge, he builded a faire large chappell. Toward the south end of that towne, & nere vnto the same, a pretie house of brikke and timber, where he laie, and ended his life.
He glased the chancell of the parish church in that towne, and made a waie of foure miles long, thre miles from Alesburie towards London, and one mile beyond Alesburie.]

But to returne to Perkin: the brute of whome in England, blowne throughout the realme, soze disquieted the people, in somuch that not onelie the me-ner sort, but also manie of the nobles and worthie personages beleued and published it abroad, that all was true which was reported of him. And not onelie they that were in sanctuaries, but also manie other that were fallen in debt, assembled in a companie, and passed ouer the seas into Flanders, to their counterfeit duke of Yorke, othertwise rightlie named Perkin Warbecke. Truelie the realme of England was in maner diuided (with the rumor and vaine fable spred abroad of this twise bozne duke) into partakings and contrarie factions. And some of the noble men conspired together, purposing to aid the fozesaid Perkin, as the man whome they reputed to be the verie sonne of king Edward; and that the matter was not feigned, but altogether true, iust, and not imagined of anie malicious pretense of euill purpose.

And bicause the thing was weightie, and required great aid and assistance, therefore they determined to send messengers vnto the ladie Margaret, to know when Richard duke of Yorke might conueni-entlie come into England; to the intent that they being thereof certified, might be in a readinesse to helpe and succour him at his arriual. So by the common consent of the conspirators, sir Robert Clifford knight, and William Barleie, were sent into Flanders, which discouered to the duchess all the secret intents and priuie meanings of the friends and fau-tors of the new found duke. The duchess gladielie re-ceiued this message, and after she had heard their errand, she brought the messenger to the sight of Perkin, who so well counterfeited the gesture, countenance, and maner of Richard duke of Yorke, that sir Robert Clifford beleued verelie, that he was the second sonne of king Edward; and therefore wrote a letter of credit into England to his complices: and to put them out of doubt, he affirmed that he knew him to be king Edwards sonne by his face, and other lineaments of his bodie.

Vpon this letter, the chiefe doers in this businesse spred the signification thereof abroad through the realme, to the intent to stirre the people to some new tumult and commotion; but it was done by such a secret craft, that no man could tell who was the author of that rumor. The king perceived that this vaine fable was not banished out of the mad brains of the common people. To prouide therefore against all perils that might thereby insue, he sent certeine knights that were skilfull men of warre, with competent bands of soldiers, to keepe the sea coasts and hauens, to vnderstand who came in and went out of the realme; doubting least some great conspiracie were in helowing against him. He also sent into the low countries certeine persons, to learne the truth of this forged dukes progenie, where some of them that were so sent, comming to Tourne, got knowlege that he was bozne in that cite, of base linage, and named Perkin Warbecke.

The king then aduertised not onclie by his espi-als vpon their returne, but also from other his truste friends, determined with all speed to haue the fraud published, both in England and forren parts: and for the same cause sent sir Edward Poynings knight, & sir William Warram doctor of the lawes vnto Philip archduke of Burgonie, and to his coun-cellors (bicause he was not of age able to gouerne of himselfe) to signifie to him and them, that the yong man, being with the ladie Margaret, had falselie and vnruefullie usurped the name of Richard duke of Yorke, which long before was murdered with his brother Edward in the Tower of London, by the commandement of their vncle king Richard, as manie men then liuing could testifie.

The ambassadors comming to the court of Philip the archduke, were honozable interteined of him and of his counsell, and willed to declare the effect of their message. William Warram made to them an eloquent oration, and in the later end somewhat trueibed against the ladie Margaret, not sparing to declare, how she now in hir later age had brought forth (within the space of a few peares together) two detestable monstres, that is to saie, Lambert (of whom yee heard before) and this same Perkin War-becke, and being conceiued of these two great babes, was not deliuered of them in eight or nine moneths as nature requireth; but in one hundred and eightie moneths, for both these at the lest were fiftene yeers of age, yet she would be brought in bed of them, and shew them openlie; and when they were newlie crept out of hir wombe, they were no infants but lustie yownglings, and of age sufficient to bid battell to kings. Although these talents angred the ladie Margaret to the hart, yet Perkin was more vered with the things declared in this oration, and especiallie because his cloaked iuggling was brought to light.

The duchess intending to cast hot sulphur into the new kindled fire, determined with might and maine to arme and set forward prettie Perkin against the king of England. When the ambassadors had done their message, and that the archdukes counsell had long debated the matter; they made answer, that to haue the king of Englands loue, the archduke and they would neither aid nor assist Perkin nor his complices in anie cause or quarrell. Yet notwithstanding if the ladie Margaret, persisting in hir rooted malice towards the king of England, would be to him aiding and helping, it was not in their power to withstand it; for bicause in the lands assigned to hir for hir dower, the might franklie and fraile order all things at hir will and pleasure, without contradiction of anie other gouernour.

After that the ambassadors were returned with this answer, the king straight sent forth certeine espi-als into Flanders, which should feigne themselves to haue fled to the duke of Yorke; and thereby search out the whole intent of the conspiracie, and after what sort they meant to proceed in the same. Others were sent also to intise sir Robert Clifford and William Barleie, to returne into England, promising to them pardon of all their offenses, and high rewards, for obeying the kings request. They that were sent, did so earnestlie and prudentlie applie their businesse, that they brought all things to passe at their otone desires. For first they learned who were the chiefe conspirators, and after perswaded sir Robert Clifford to giue ouer that enterpryse, which had no grounded staie to rest vpon. Albeit William Barleie at the first would not leave off, but continued his begun attempt; till after two peares, he repenting him of his follie, & hauing pardon granted him of the king, returned home into his native countrie.

When the king had knowledge of the chiefe cap-teins of this conspiracie (by the ouerture of his espi-als which were returned) he caused them to be appehended, and brought to London before his presence.
Of the which the chiefe were John Ratcliffe, lord Fitz-Water, sir Simon Montford, sir Tho. Whithwaits knights, William Daubencie, Robert Ratcliffe, Thomas Cressenoz, and Thomas Astwood. Also cer-teine preests & religious men, as sir William Rich-ford doctor of diuinitie, and sir Thomas Poines, both friers of saint Dominicks order, doctor William Sutton, sir William Worsleie deane of Paules, Robert Laiborne, and sir Richard Lefele. Other which were guiltie, hearing that their fellows were apprehended, fled and took sanctuary. The other that were taken were condemned, of the which sir Simon Montford, Robert Ratcliffe, and William Daubernie were beheaded.

Some had their pardons, and the preests also for their order sake; but yet few of them liued long after. The lord Fitz-Water parboned of life, was conueied to Calis, and there laid in hold, & after lost his head; bicause he went about to corrupt his keepers with rewards, that he might escape, intending (as was thought) to haue gone to Perkin. Thus by the policie and subtilie deuise of the king, practised to the point by his espials, the finewes of this conspiracie was rent in sunder. So that the malicious ladie Margaret was not a little swolne with indignation when she saw the course of hir deuise (now that it had passed so far as that it was knowne to people on this side and beyond the seas) stopped, and the confederacie (whereof she speciallie trusted) dissolved. Yet notwithstanding, as women will not (to die for it) giue ouer an enterprise, which of an envious purpose they attempt; so she put hir irons afresh into the fier to set hir hatred forward: whome a while we will leaue at worke, and shew some doings betwene England and Flanders.]

King Henrie taking displeasure with the king of Romans, for that he kept not touch in aiding him against the French king, and partlie displeased with the Flemings, but speciallie with the ladie Margaret, for keeping and setting forward Perkin Warbeck, not onelie banished all Flemish wares and merchandizes out of his dominions, but also restrained all English merchants from their repaire and traffike into anie of the lands and territories of the king of Romans, or of the archduke Philip, sonne to the same king of the Romans, causing the mart to be kept at Calis, of all English merchandizes and commodities. Wherefore the said king and his sonne banished out of their lands and seignories all English clothes, yarne, tin, lead, and other commodities of this realme. The restraint made by the king forced hindered the merchants aduenturers; for they had no occupying to beare their charges, and to support their credit withall.

And that most greued them, the Casserlings being at libertie, brought to the realme such wares as they were wont, & so serued their customers through out the realme. Whereupon there ensued a riot by the seruants of the mercers, haberdashers, & clothworkers in the citie of London, the tuesday before saint Edwards day. For they perceiuing what hinderance grew to their maisters, in that they were not able so well to keepe them as before they had done, assembled together in purpose to reuenge their malice on the Casserlings, & so came to the Stilliard, & began to rife & spoile such chambers & warehouses as they could get into. So that the Casserlings had much adoe to withstand them, & keepe them back out of their gates, which with helpe of carpenters, smiths, and other that came to them by water out of Southwarke, they shored & so fortified, that the multitude of the seruants and apprentices, being assembled, could not preuaile.

At length came the maior with a number of men, defensible weaponed, to remoue the force; at whose approach those riotous persons fled auaite like a flocke of sheepe. But diuerse of them were apprehended, and upon inquirie made before the kings commissioners, about foure score seruants & apprentices were found to be conspired together, and two: none not to reueale it; of whom some of the chiefe beginners were committed to the Towre, and there long continued. But in conclusion, because none of their maisters, nor a nie one housholder was found culpable, the king of his clemencie pardoned their offense, and restored them to libertie. [For he thought it no credit to his crowne to take vengeance of such sillie soules by seruic of death, whom in clemencie pardoning he might restore to a reformed life.]

¶ On the two & twentieth of Februarie in this yere were arreigned in the Guildhall of London foure persons, Thomas Wagnall, John Scot, John Heath, and John Herington, the which were sanctuarie men of saint Martins le grand in London, and latelie before were taken out of the said sanctuarie, for forging of seditious bills, to the slander of the king, & some of his counsell, for the which three of them were iudged to die; and the fourth named Wagnall, pleaded to be restored to sanctuarie: by reason whereof he was reprieved to the Towre till the next terme: and on the six and twentieth of Februarie, the other three with a Fleming, and a yeoman of the crowne, were all five executed at Tiborne. ¶ On the eight and twentieth of Aprill John Woughton widow was burnt in Smithfield, for holding certeine opinions of John Wickliffe. Wheat was sold at London at six pence the bushell, bate salt for three pence halfe penie the bushell, & anttwich salt was sold for six pence the bushell, white herrings nine shillings the barrell, red herrings at three shillings the cade, red sprats six pence the cade, & Calcoigne wine for six pounds the tun.]

Shortlie after sir Robert Cliford, partlie trusting on the kings promise, and partlie mistrusting the desperat begun enterprise, returned suddenly againe into England. The king certified before of his coming, went straight to the Towre of London the morow after the day of Epiphanie, & there taried till such time as sir Robert Cliford was there presented to his person. This was done for a policie, that if sir Robert accused anie of the nobilitie, they might be called thither without suspicion of anie enill, and their attached and late fall. Some thought also, that for a policie king Henrie sent sir Robert Cliford ouer as an espie, or else he would not so soon haue received him into fauour againe. Neuerthelesse, there were great presumptions that it was nothing so, for both was he in great danger after his begun attempt, and neuer was so much esteemed with the king afterward as he was before.

But this is true, upon his coming to the kings presence, he besought him of pardon, and obtained it; and therewith opened all the maner of the conspiracie, so far as he knew, and who were aiders, satours, and chiefe beginners of it; amongst whom he accused sir William Stanleie, whom the king had made his chiefe chamberleine, and one of his priue counsell. The king was soze to heare this, and could not be induced to beleue that there was so much bitterness in him, till by euident proofes it was tried against him. ¶ When the king caused him to be refreshed from his libertie in his owne chamber within the quadrat towre, and there appointed him by his priue counsell to be examined, in which examination he nothing denied, but wiselie and sagelie agreed to all things laid to his charge, if he were faultie therein.

The report is, that this was his offense. When communication was had betwixt him, and the aboue mentioned sir Robert Cliford, as concerning Perkin, which falselie usurped the name of R. Edwards sonne; sir William Stanleie said, that if he knew certeinlie that the yong man was the indubitate heire of king Edward the fourth, he would neuer fight or beare armour against him. This point argued, that he bare no hartie good will toward king Henrie as then. But what was the cause that he had continued some inward grudge towards the king; or how it chanced that the king had withdrawen his speciall fauor from him, manie haue doubted. Some indeed haue gessed, that sir William Stanleie, for the seruice which he shewed at Bosworth field, thought that all the benefitts which he received of the king to be farre vnder that which he had deserved, in preferring him not onelie the kings life; but also in obtaining for him the victorie of his enemies, so that his aduersarie was slaine in the field.

Wherefore desiring to be created earle of Chester, and therof denied, he began to disdaine the king. And one thing encouraged him much, which was the riches and treasure of king Richard, which he onlie possessed at the battell of Bosworth; by reason of which riches riches and great power of men, he set naught by the king his sovereign lord and master. The king having thus an hole in his coat, doubted first what he should do with him; for loth he was to lose the favour of his brother the earle of Derby: and againe to pardon him, he feared least it should be an euill example to other, that should go about to attempt the like offense. And so at length, seueritie got the upper hand, & mercie was put backe, in so much that he was arraigned at Westminster and adiudged to die, and (according to that judgement) was brought to the Tower hill the sixteenth daie of Februarie, and there had his head stricken off.

[This was the end of Sir William Stanley the chiefest helper of King Henrie to the crowne at Bosworth field against King Richard the third, and who set the same crowne first upon the kings head, when it was found in the field trampled vnder feet. He was a man (while he liued) of great power in his countrie, and also of great wealth; in so much as the common fame ran, that there was in his castell of Holt found in ready coine, plate, and iewels, to the value of forty thousand markes or more, and his land and fees extended to three thousand pounds by yeare. Heuertheless all helped not; neither his good seruice in Bosworth field, neither his forwardnesse (euen with the hazard of life) to prefer King Henrie to the crowne, neither his faithfullnesse in cleauing to him at all bannis, neither the bond of alliance betwixt them, neither the power that he was able to make, neither the riches which he was worth, neither intercession of friends, which he wanted not; none of these, nor all these could procure the redemption of his lost life:

Quicumque decus hominum, o variabile tempus.

¶ On the sixteenth of Nouember was holden the sergeants feast at the bishops place of Elie in Holborne, where dined the king, quene, and all the chiefe lords of England. The new sergeants names were master Dordant, Wygham, Kingsmill, Conisbie, Butler, Palestrie, Frowlicke, Drenbidge, & Constable. In digging for to laie a new foundation in the church of Saint Marie hill in London, the bodie of Jackeie, which had bene buried in the church the space of 175 yeares, was found whole of skynne, & the points of his armes pliable: which corpse was kept aboue ground foure daies without interuallance, and then buried againe. ¶ Also this yeare (as master Grafton saith) at the charges of master John Late alderman of London was the church of Saint Anthones founded, & annexed vnto the college of Wyndesore, wherein was erected one notable and free schole to the furtherance of learning, and a number of poore people (by the name of almshouses, which were poore, aged, and decreaied householders) releued, to the great commendation of that worthy man, who so liued in worship, that his death by his worthie doings maeth him still aliue; for he was not forgetfull to beautifie the good state of this citie, in which by wealth he had tasted of Gods blessings.]

About this same time, diuerse men were punished that had vpon a presumptuous boldnesse spoken manie slanderous words against the kings maiestie, hoping still for the arrivall of the feigned Richard duke of Yorke. After the death of Sir William Stanley, Giles lord Darnley was elected and made the kings chiefe chamberlaine. Also, the King sent into Ireland to purge out the euill & wicked seeds of rebellion amongst the wild & savage Irish people, sowed there by the craftie conuenance of Perkin Warbecke. Sir Henrie Deane, late abbat of Langtonie (whome he made chancelor of that Ile) & Sir Edward Poyninges knight, with an armie of men. The fauourers of Perkin, hearing that Sir Edward Poyninges was come with a power to persecute them, withdrew straightwaies, and fled into the woods and marishes for the safegard of themselves.

Sir Edward Poyninges according to his commission, intending to punish such as had aided and aduanced the enterpryse of Perkin, with his whole armie marched forward against the wild Irishmen, because that all other being culpable of that offense, fled and resorted to them for succour. But when he saw that his purpose succeeded not as he would haue wished it; both because the Irish lords sent him no succour according to their promises; and also for that his owne number was not sufficient to furnish his enterpryse, because his enemies were dispersed amongst woods, mounteins, and marishes; he was constrained to recule backe, sore displeased in his mind against Gerald earle of Kildare, being then the kings deputie.

Now, the cause of this his discontentment was, for that the said earle was suspected to be the meane that he had no succours sent him, and was so informed in deed by such as bare the earle no good will. And therefore suddenlie he caused the earle to be apprehended, and as a prisoner brought him in his companie into England. Which earle being examined, and sundrie points of treason laid to him, he confessed them all, & laid the burthen in other mens necks, that he was dismissed, and sent into Ireland againe, there to be deputie and lieutenant as he was before. The king being now in some better seruice of his estate, did take his progresse into Lancashire the five & twentieth daie of June, there to make merrie with his mother the countesse of Derby, which then laie at Lathome in the countrie.

In this meane while, Perkin Warbecke, being in Flanders, sore troubled that his tugging was discovered, yet he determined not to leaue off his enterpryse, in hope at length to attaine the crowne of England: and so gathering a power of all nations, some bankrupts, some false English sanctuarie men, some thieves, robbers, and vagabunds, which desiring to liue by rapine, were glad to serue him. And thus furnished, he took such ships as his friends had provided for him: and departing from Flanders towards England, he arrived vpon the Kentish coast, & there cast anchor, purposing to proue how the people there were affected towards him: and therefore he sent certeine of his men to land, to signifie to the countrie his arrivall with such power, that the victorie must incline to his part.

The Kentishmen vnderstanding that Perkin was but Perkin, and had none with him (to make account of) but strangers borne, like faithfull subjects determined to fall vpon those that were thus new come to land, and to trie if they might allure the whole number out of their ships, so to giue them battell. But Perkin wiselie considering that the maner of a multitude is not to consult, and sagelie to aduise with themselves in anie deliberate foit, but suddenlie and rashlie to run headlong into rebellion, would not let one foot out of his ship, vntill he saw all things sure. Yet he permitted some of his souldiers to go on land, which being trained for a pretie waie from their ships, were suddenlie compassed about and beset of the Kentishmen, and at one stroke vanquished and driuen backe to their ships.

Of these discomfited soules were taken prisoners an hundred and forty persons, whereof five, Pontfort, Corbet, White, Welt, & Quittin (or otherwise Genin) being captiues were brought to London by Sir John Beche, Shriffe of Kent, railed in ropes like horses drawing in a cart, & after vpon their arraignment confessed their offense, and were executed, some at London, and other in the towne adioining to the sea coast. And thus Perkin, missing of his purpose, fled hen he came into Flanders. In this verie season departed to God Cicilie duchesse of Yorke mother to king Edward the fourth, at hir castell of Berkhamsted, a woman of small stature, but of much honour and high parentage, and was buried by hir husband in the college of Ffodzingrie.

The king being aduertised that his enemies were landed, leaving off his progresse, purposed to haue returned to London; but being certified the next day of the luckie speed of his faithfull subiects, continued his progresse, & did send sir Richard Wilford both to commend the fidelitie and manhood of the Kentish men, and also to render to them most hartie thanks for the same. He also caused order to be taken for the erecting of beacons, and watching of them. Perkin then perceiuing that he should not be receiued into England, sailed into Ireland, trusting there to augment his numbers, and then to returne towards the coast of England againe, and to take land in the West countrie, if occasion serued; but if not, then he determined to saile straight into Scotland, to seeke friendship there.

After he had therefore staid a while in Ireland, and perceiued that the hope of victorie consisted not in the Irish nation, being naked people, without furniture of armour or weapon, he took the sea againe at Coffe, and sailed into Scotland; where comming to the presence of king James, he forged such a painted processe to moue him to beleue that he was the verie sonne of king Edward; that the Scottish king, whether blinded with error, or bying dissimulation, that he might vnder a colourable pretext make war against England, began to haue Perkin in great honour, and caused him openlie to be called duke of Yorke. And to perswade the world that so he was indeed, he caused the ladie Katharine, daughter to Alexander earle of Huntley, his nigh kinsman, to be espoused to him. But per we passe anie further, you shall see and peruse (if you will) the said painted processe of Perkin, as it is left in record by Edward Hall for an example what working force is in words (speciallie where the hearers are easie to be seduced) and not to be ouer hastie to giue them too quicke & hastie credit. For the poet saith of gate words void of truth:

Intus habent.*

The colourable oration or counterfeited tale that Perkin told the king of Scots to iustifie his false title.

Thinke it is not vnknowne vnto you (most noble king and puissant prince) into what ruine the stocke house, and familie of Edward the fourth, of that name king of England, is now of late brought to and fallen in, either by Gods permission, or by diuine punishment; whose indubitate sonne (if you know not alreadie) I am, and by the power of almighty God, preferred aloue to this houre from the mightie hand of a tyrant. For my father king Edward (when he died) appointed his brother Richard duke of Gloucester to be our gouernour, protector, and defendour; whome the more that he loued & studied to aduance and promote, the better he thought that he would loue, fauour, and tender his children. But alas my vnfortunate chance I may say! how hath his trust bene turned into treason, and his hope into hinderance, all men know and I feele.

Our vnckle was not the tutor and preseruer of our stocke and linage, but the confounder & destroyer of our blood and progenie. For that tyrant, blinded and glutted with the desire of ruling and souereignie, commanded Edward my brother & me to be slaine and dispatched out of this mortall life. Whereupon that person, to whome the weightie and cruell charge was committed and giuen to oppresse and destroye by poore innocent infants and guiltlesse babes, the more that he abhorred this heinous and butcherlie offense, the more he feared to commit it.

And so wauering in mind and doubtfull what to doe, at the length willing in part to slanch the bloudie thirst of the unnatural tyrant, and in part to abstaine from so heinous & detestable homicide, he destroyed my brother and preserued me; like the good priest Joiada, who saued little Joas, when all the children of the bloud roiall were commanded by Athalia the quene to be slaine and vtterlie destroyed. And further, to the intent that my life might be in surtie, he appointed one to conueie me into some strange countrie; where when I was furthest off, and had most need of comfort he forsooke me suddenly (I thinke he was so appointed to doe) and left me desolate alone without friend or knowlege of anie reliefe or refuge. And so king Richard did obtaine the crowne as a price mischefeoullie gotten by the dispatching awaie of my brother and me. So that I thus escaping, by reason of my tender infancie, forgot almost my selfe, and knew not well what I was. But after long wandering from countrie to countrie, and from citie to citie, I perceived and learned by little and little what was my estate & degree; and so in conclusion came to mine owne aunt the ladie Margaret lieng in Flanders, which was sometime married to Charles duke of Burgogny, which as ioifullie receiued and welcomed me, as if I had come out of hell into heauen, as the onelie type and garland of hir noble stirpe and linage. But forsomuch as he being onelie Dowager of the duchie of Burgogny, and hauing nothing but hir dowrie proper to hir selfe, was not of power to helpe me with men and munitions of warre, as she would gladlie haue done for the recouerie of my fathers reime & rightfull inheritance: I therefore am driuen to seeke further aid and succour.

And therefore by hir counsell and aduertisement, with this small handfull of men of warre and souldiers, I am repaired to your presence for succours; of whome (as the publike fame is spread ouer the whole world) there was neuer man by wrong or iniurie chased or driuen out of his countrie, region, or inheritance, or by extort power and tyrannie kept out of the same (as I my selfe from mine infancie haue bene) whose request was frustrate and denied at your hand. Therefore, by the maiestie of your realme & countrie I desire, & heartlie with with praier as I can, I beseech and exhort you to helpe and releue me now in my extream necessitie. And if it chance me by your aid and succour to recouer & possesse my fathers realme and dignitie; not onelie I, but all the kings of our linage, which hereafter shall obtaine the same, shall be so much obliged and bound vnto you; that they must needs thinke, that doing to you all the pleasure and benefits that they can, yet with all thanks that can be giuen your great kindnesse can neuer in full measure be recompensed.

When he had thus said, the king bad him be of good comfort, and promised him that whatsoeuer he were, it should neuer repent him of his comming to him. Shortly after, hauing this Perkin with him in companie, he entered into England with a puissant armie, and caused proclamation to be made, to spare all those that would submit themselves vnto Richard duke of Yorke. Wherewith they began the warre in most cruell maner, with slaughter of men, burning of towncs, spoiling of houses, and committing of all other detestable enormities; so that all the countrie of Northumberland was by them in maner wasted, and destroyed. At length, when the souldiers were laden with spoiles, and faciate with bloud, perceiuing that no succour came out of England vnto the new inuented duke, contrarie to that which he had made them to beleue would come to passe; they determined to retire rather with assured gaine, than to tarrie the vncertaine victorie of that counterfeited duke, and so thereupon they withdrew backe into Scotland enriched with preies and booties.

It is said, that Perkin Warbeck, being returned into Scotland with the king of Scots, vnder a cloked pretense should sore lament the great slaughter, spoile, and damage, which had bene done at this last roade made into England; and therefore as one that bare a naturall loue toward his native countrie, besought the king of Scots, that from thenceforth, he would no more so deface his naturall reline, and destroy his subjects with such terrible fire, flame and haucke; as who should saie, he being overcome now with compassion, did beualle the cruell destruction of his naturall countrie of England. But the Scottish king told him, that he seemed to take thought for that which appeared to be none of his, sith that not so much as one gentleman or yeoman (for ought he could see) would once thew themselves ready to aid him in the warre begun for his cause, & in his name, within that realme which he pretended to claerlie to appertene to him.

The king of England being certified of this invasion, prepared an armie with all diligence to haue resisted the Scots: but they were returned per the English power could assemble together. So when the king was truelie certified that the Scottish king was returned home, he staied all the preparations made at that time to go against him. But yet meaning to be reuenged of the wrongs done to him by king James and his people; he first called a parliament, and in that assemble of three estates of the realme, he declared the cause of the instant warre, and how necessarie it should be for the suertie and wealth of the realme of England to haue that warre pursued against those enemies that had begun it. To this motion all the nobilitie wholie agreed. And to the maintenance of that warre, a subsidie was by whole assent of the parlement frælie giuen and granted. Which payment though it was not great, yet manie of the common people soze grudged to pay the same, as they that euer abhorre such fares and exactions. At the same parlement were diuerse acts and statutes made, necessarie & expedient (as was thought) for the publike weale of the realme.

In the meane season the king of Scots, perceiuing that the Englishmen would shortly go about to reuenge the iniuries done to them by him and his people, assembled effloness a puissant armie, that he might either defend his realme against the English power, attempting to innade his countrie, or else afresh to enter into the English borders. And thus these two mightie princes minded nothing more than the one to indamage the other. But the king of England would not deferre one houre by (his good will) till he were reuenged, and therefore prepared a mightie armie to innade Scotland, and ordeined for chiefeine thereof the lord Daubenie. But as this armie was assembled, and that the lord Daubenie was forward on his iourne towards Scotland, he was suddenlie staied and called backe againe, by reason of a new commotion begun by the Cornishmen for the payment of the subsidie which was granted at the last parlement.

These vnrulie people the Cornishmen, inhabiting in a barren countrie and vnfruitfull, at the first soze repined that they should be so grauouslie taxed, and burdened the kings counsell as the onelie cause of such polling and pilling: and so being in their rage, menaced the chiefe authoers with death and present destruction. And thus being in a roze, two persons of the same assintie, the one called Thomas Flammoche, a gentleman, learned in the lawes of the realme; and the other Michaell Joseph, a smith, men of stout stomachs and high courages, toke vpon them to be capteins of this seditious companie. They laid the fault and cause of this exaction vnto John Hoxton archbishop of Canturburie, and to sir Reginald Bate; bicause they were chiefe of the kings counsell. Such rewards haue they commonlie that be in great authoritie with kings and princes.

The capteins Flammoche and Joseph exhorted the common people to put on harnesse, and not to be asfraid to follow them in that quarrell, promising not to hurt anie creature, but onelie to see them punished that procured such exactions to be laid on the people, without anie reasonable cause, as vnder the colour of a little trouble with the Scots, which (sith they were without anie home) they toke to be well quieted and appeased. So these capteins bent on mischief, (were their outward pretense neuer so finelie coloured) perswaded a great number of people to assemble together, and condescended to doe as their capteins would agree and appoint. Then these capteins praising much the hardines of the people, when all things were ready for their infortunate iourne, set forward with their armie, and came to Taunton, where they due the prouost of Perin, which was one of the commissioners of the subsidie, and from thence came to Welles, so intending to go to London, where the king then sojourned.

When the king was aduertised of these doings, he was somewhat astoned, and not without cause; being thus troubled with the warre against the Scots, and this ciuill commotion of his subjects at one instant. But first meaning to subdue his rebellious subjects; and after to proceed against the Scots, as occasion should serue, he reuoked the lord Daubenie which (as you haue heard) was going against the Scots, and increased his armie with manie chosen and piket warriors. Also mistrusting that the Scots might now (hauing such opportunitie) innade the realme againe; he appointed the lord Th. Howard erle of Surrie (which after the death of the lord Witham was made high tresuroz of England) to gather a band band of men in the countie Palatine of Durham, that they with the aid of the inhabitants adioining, and the borderers, might keepe backe the Scots if they chanced to make anie inuasion . The nobles of the realme hearing of the rebellion of the Cornishmen, came to London, euerie man with as manie men of warre as they could put in a readinesse, to aid the king if need should be. In the which number were the earle of Cless, and the lord Pontioy, with diuers other.

In the meane time, James Twichet lord Audleie being confederate with the rebels of Cornewall ioined with them, being come to Welles, and tooke vpon him as their chiefe captaine to lead them against their naturall lord and king. From Welles they went to Salisbury, and from thence to Winchester, and so to Kent, where they hoped to haue had great aid, but they were decieued in that their expectation. For the erle of Kent, George lord of Aburgauencie, John Brooke, lord Cobham, sir Edward Poinings, sir Richard Cilford, sir Thomas Bourchier, John Pede, William Scot, and a great number of of people, were not onelie prest and readie to defend the countrie, to keepe the people in due obedience, but bent to fight with such as would lift vp sword, or other weapon against their soueraigne lord: insomuch that the Kentishmen would not once come nere the Cornishmen, to aid or assist them in anie manner of wise.

Want of the holidays by night.

Which thing maruelouslie dismayd the hearts of the Cornishmen, when they saw themselves thus de-crued of the succours which they most trusted vpon, so that manie of them (fearing the euill chance that might happen) fled in the night from their companie, and left them, in hope so to saue themselves. The capteines of the rebels, perceiuing they could haue no helpe of the Kentishmen, putting their onelie hope in their owne puissance, bought their people to Blacke heath, a foure miles distant from London, and there in a plaine on the top of an hill, they ordered their battels, either readie to fight with the king if he would assaile them, or else to assault the citie of London: for they thought the king durst not haue encountred with them in battell. But they were de-crued: for the king although he had power inough about to haue fought with them before, yet their com-ming so nere to the citie, yet he thought it best to safer them to come forward, till he had them farre off from their natiue countrie, and then to set vpon them being destitute of aid in some place of aduan-tage.

The citie of London fore afraid of the rebels.

The cite was in a great feare at the first knowledge giuen, how the rebels were so nere incamped to the cite, euery man getting himselfe to barnesse, and placing the melues, some at the gates, some on the walles, so that no part was undefended. But the king deliuered the cite of that feare: for after that he perceived how the Cornishmen were all daie readie to fight, and that on the hill, he sent straight John Carle of Drenford, Henrie Bourchier, earle of Gloucester, Edmund de la Pole, earle of Suffolke, sir Wileam Thomas, and sir Humfreie Stanleie, noble warriors, with a great companie of archers and horsemen, to enuiron the hill on the right side, and on the left, to the intent that all bywaies being stopped and foreroloked, all hope of fight should be taken from them. And incontinentlie he himselfe, being as well incouraged with manlie stomachs as furnished with a populous armie and plentie of artillerie, set forward out of the cite, and incamped himselfe in saint Georges field, where he on the fridaie at night then lodged.

On the saturday in the morning, he sent the lord Daubeneite with a great compantie to set on them early in the morning, which first got the bridge at Dorsetford Strand, which was manfully defended by certain archers of the rebels, whose arrows (as is reported) were in length a full cloth yard. While the earles set on them on cuerie side, the lord Daubenie came into the field with his companie, and without long fighting, the Cornishmen were overcome; and first they take the lord Daubenie prisoner: but whether it were for feare, or for hope of fauour, they let him go at libertie, without hurt or detriment. There were slaine of the rebels which fought and resisted, aboue two thousand men (as Edward Hall noteth) and taken prisoners an infinite number, & amongst them the blacke smith, and other the chiefe captiues, which were shortly after put to death. When this battelle was ended, the king wanted of all his numbers but thre hundred, which were slaine at that conflict.

Some affirme, that the king appointed to haue 20 fought with them not till the morrowe, and preuenting the time set on them on the saturday before, taking them vnprovidid, and in no arraie of battell, and so by that policie obtained the field and victorie.
The prisoners as well captaine as other, were pardoned, saving the cheefe captaine and first beginners, to whome he shewed no mercie at all. The lord Audeley was dyawne from Fleetgate to the Tower hill in a coate of his owne armes, painted upon paper reversed and all to tyme, and there was bebra-30 ded the foure and twentieth of June. Thomas Flammocke & Michaell Ioseph were hanged, dyawne, and quartered after the maner of traitors, & their heade and quarters were pitched vpon stakes, and set vp in London, and in other places: although at the first, the king meant to haue sent them into Cornewall, to haue bene set by there for a terror to all others. But hearing that the Cornishmen at home were readie to begin a new conspiracie, least he shoud the more tritate and prouoke them by that displeasent sight, 40 he changed his purpose, for doubt to wray himselfe in more trouble than needed.

While these things were doing in England, the king of Scots being advertized of the whole matter and rebellion of the Cornishmen, thought not to let passe that occasion: and therefore he eiesones timaded the frontiers of England, waisting the countrie, burning towines, and murdering the people, sparing neither place nor person: and while his light horsemen were riding to forraie and despoile the bishoprike of Durham, and there burned all about, he with an other part of his armie did besiege the castell of Spokham. The bishop of Durham Richard For, being owner of that castell, had well furnished it both with men and munitions aforesaid, doubting least that would follow which came now to passe. The bishop, after that the Scots made this invasion, advertized the king (as then being at London) of all things that chanced in the Spoksh parts; and sent in all post hast to the earle of Surrie, to come to the rescue. The earle being then in Spokeshire, and having gathered an armie, upon knowledge given to him from the bishop, with all diligence marched forward, and after him followed other noble men out of all the quarters of the Spoksh, euerie of them bringing as manie men as they could gather, for defense of their countrie.

Amongst these, the chiefe leaders were, Rafe earle of Westmerland, Thomas lord Dacres, Rafe lord Penell, George lord Strange, Richard lord Latimer, George lord Lumley, John lord Scrope, Henry lord Clifford, George lord Dgle, William lord Coniers, Thomas lord Darcie, Wsknights, Thomas baron of Wylton, sir William Perse, sir William Walmer, sir William Gascoigne, sir Rafe Bigob, Kate Bowes, sir Thomas a Parre, sir Kate Ellec, ker, sir John Constable, sir John Katcliffe, sir John Scaill, sir Thomas Strangweiss, and a great num ber of other knights and esquires belides. The whole armie was little lesse than twentie thousand men, beside the nauie, whereof the lord Brooke was ad mirall.

When the Scots had diuerse waies assaulted and beaten the castell of Pozham, but could make no batterie to enter the same, they determined of their owne accord to raise the siege, and returne; and that so much the sooner in verte deed, because they heard that the earle of Surrie was within two daies four nie of them, with a great puissance. Wherefore king James raised his siege, and returned home into his owne realme. When the earle knew of the kings re turne, he followed him with all hast possible, trust ing suertie to ouertake him, and to giue him battell.

When the earle was entred Scotland, he ouerthrew and defaced the castell of Catodesreimes, the tower of Weterhall, the tower of Edington, the tower of fulden: and he sent Porrie king at armes to the capitaine of Hatton castell, which was one of the strongest places betwixt Berwike and Edenburgh, to deliuer him the castell. Which he denied to do, affir ming that he was sure of speedie succours.

The earle hereupon laid his ordinance to the ca stell, and continuallie beat it, from two of the clocke till fwe at night, in such wise, that they within ren dered by the place, their liues onelic saued. The earle caused his minors to raise & ouerthrow the fortrese to the plaine ground. The Scottish king was within a mile of the siege, and both knew it, and saw the smoke, but would not set one foot forward to the re scue. While the earle laie at Hatton, the king of Scots sent to him Pachemont, and an other herald, desir ing him at his election, either to fight with whole puissance against puissance, or else they two to fight person to person; requiring that if the victorie fell to the Scottish king, that then the earle should deliuer for his rancome, the towne of Berwike, with the fishgarths of the same.

The earle made answer hereto, that the towne of Berwike was the king his masters, and not his,
the which he neither ought nor would laie to pledge, without the king of Englands assent; but he would gage his bodie, which was more pretious to him than all the townes of the world, promising on his honour, that if he took the king prisoner in that sin gular combat, he would release to him all his part of the fine and rancome; and if it chanced the king to vanquish him, he would gladlie paie such rancome as was conuenient for the degree of an earle, and than ked him greatlie for the offer: for suertie he thought himselfe much honored, that so noble a prince would bondsafe to admit to poyze an earle to fight with him bodie to bodie. When he had rewarded and dismissed the heralds, he set his armie in a readinesse, to abide the coming of the king of Scots, and so stood all daie.

But king James not regarding his offers, would neither performe the one nor the other; fearing to cape with the English nation in anie condition; and so thereupon died in the night season with all his puis sance. When the earle knew that the king was reced ed, and had bene in Scotland sir or seven daies, be ing daile and nightke vexed with continuall wind and raine, upon god and deliberat aduise returned backe to the towne of Berwike, and there dissolved his armie, tattering there himselfe, till he might vi derstand further of the kings pleasure. In the meane time there came an ambassadour to the K. of Scots from the K. of Spaine, one Peter Hialas, a man of no lesse learning than wit & policie, to moue & intret a peace betwene the two kings of England & Scot land [that their people might fall to their necessarie trades of aduantage with quietnesse, and friend with friend, husband with wife, father with children, and maisters with seruants dwell and accompanie: a dis solution and separation of whome one from another pitie, so is there is no pietie, as one saith full trulie:

Nulla fides pietasque uiris qui castra sequuntur, Nulla salus bello.

Luc. lib. 18.

This Spanish ambassadour so earnestlie trauel led in his message vnto the king of Scots, that at length he found him conformable to his purpose: and therefore wrote to the king of England, that it would please him to send one of his nobilitie or coun cell, to be associat with him in concluding of peace with the Scottish king. The king of England was neuer dangerous to agree to anie reasonable peace, so it might stand with his honour; and therefore ap pointed the bishop of Durham doctor For, to go in to Scotland about that treatie which Peter Hialas had begun. The bishop (according to his commission) went honozable into Scotland, where he and Peter Hialas at the towne of Jedworth, after long argu ing and debating of matters with the Scottish com missioners, in stead of peace concluded a truce for cer teine yeares; upon condition, that James king of Scots should conuene Berkin Warbecke out of his realme, seignories, and dominions.

About the same time, king Henrie receiued the ambassadors that were sent to him from the French king, and had bene staied at Douer, till the Cornish rebels were vanquished and subdued. Also the lord of Camphire, and other oratours of Philip archduke of Austrich, and duke of Burgognie came to him for the conclusion of amitie, and to haue the English merchants to resort againe to their countrie. Which request being vertie agreable to the quietnesse and wealth of his realme, and especiallie at that time, he did fauorable grant and agree vnto. And so did the Englishmen resort againe into the archdukes domi nions, and were receiued into Antwerpe with gene rall procession: so glad was that towne of their re turne. Shortly after the concluding of the truce be twene England and Scotland, Berkin Warbecke being willed of the king of Scots to depart out of the Scottish dominions, sailed with his wife and fa milie into Ireland, there determining with himselfe either to repaire into Flanders to his first setter vp the duchess of Burgognie, or else soine and take part with the Cornishmen.

But howsoever it came to passe, whilste he laie in Ireland, he had knowledge from the Cornishmen, that they were readie to renew the warre againe.
Whereupon he minding not to let passe so fauie an occasion, hauing with him foure small ships, and not aboue sir scoze men, sailed into Cornewall, and there landed in the moneth of September, and came to a towne called Bodmar, and there did so prouoke the waivering people, that with faire wordes and large promises, that he gathered to him aboue three thou sand persons, which immediatlie called him their capitaine, promising to take his part, and follow him to the death. Then Berkin well encouraged, made proclamations in the name of king Richard the fourth, as sonne to king Edward the fourth. And by the aduise of his three counsellors, John Peron mer cer a bankrupt, Richard Skelton a tailor, and John Astelle a scriuener determined first of all to assaie the winning of Excester.

When hasting thither, he laid siege to it, and wan ting ordinance to make batterie, studied all waies of fire vnder the gates, he omitted nothing that could be deuised for the furtherance of his purpose. The citizens, perceiuing in what danger they stood, first let certeine messengers do tunc by cords ouer the wall, that might certifie the king of their necessitie & trouble. And herewith taking vnto them boldnesse of courage, determined to repell fire with fire, and caused fagots to be brought and laid to the inward parts of the gates, and set them all on fire; to the intent that the fire being inflamed on both sides the gates, might as well keepe out their enemies from entring, as that in the citizens from fleeing out, and that they in the meane season might make trenches and rampires to defend their enemies in stead of gates and bulwarks. Thus by fire was the citie preserved from fire.

Excester preserved from fire by fire.

Then Perkin of verie necessitie compelled to forsake the gates, assaulted the towne in diuerse weake and unfortified places, and set vp ladders to take the citie. But the citizens, with helpe of such as were come forth of the countrie adioining to their aid, so valiantlie defended the walles, that they slew aboue two hundred of Perkins souldiers at that assault. The king hauing aduertisement of this siege of Excester, hastened forth with his host, in as much speed as was possible, and sent the lord Daubeneie with certeine bands of light horsemen before, to aduertise all men of his coming at hand. But in the meane season, the lord Edward Courtenie earle of Deuonshire, and the valiant lord William his sonne, accompanied with sir Edmund Carew, sir Thomas Trenchard, sir William Courtenie, sir Thomas Fulford, sir John Haleswell, sir John Croker, Walter Courtenie, Peter Edgcombe, William saint Maure, with all speed came into the citie of Excester, and holpe the citizens, and at the last assault was the earle hurt in the arme with an arrow, and so were manie of his companie, but verie few slaine.

The king maketh out his power against Perkin.

When Perkin saw that he could not win the citie of Excester, sith he sawe it was so well fortified both with men and munitions, he departed from thence, and went vnto Taunton, and there the twentieth day of September he mustered his men; as though he were ready to giue battell: but perceiuing his number to be diminished, by the secret withdrawing of sundrie companies from him, he began to put mistrust in all the remnant. In deed when the people that followed him, in hope that no small number of the nobilitie would ioine with him, saw no such matter come to passe, they staid alwaie from him by secret companies. When the king heard that he was gone to Taunton, he followed after him with all speed. And by the way there came to him Edward duke of Buckingham, a yong prince of great towardnesse; and him followed a great companie of noble men, knights and esquires, as sir Alexander Baskham, sir Maurice Barkleie, sir Robert Lame, sir John Guise, sir Robert Pointz, sir Henrie Vernon, sir John Portimer, sir Thomas Tremaille, sir Edward Sutton, sir Amise Paulet, sir John Birkenhill, sir John Sapcotes, sir Hugh Lutterell, sir Francis Cheineie, and diuerse other.

At the kings approaching to the towne of Taunton, he sent before him Robert lord Roke lord steward of his house, Giles lord Daubeneie his chiefe chamberleine, and sir Rice ap Thomas. But as soon as Perkin was informed that his enemies were ready to giue him battell, he that nothing lesse minded than to fight in open field with the kings puissance, dissembled all the daie time with his companie, as though nothing could make him afraid: and about midnight, accompanied with three score horsemen, he departed from Taunton in post to a sanctuarie towne beside Southampton, called Beaulieu, & there he and John Heron with other registered themselves as persons privileged. When as king Henrie knew that Perkin was thus fled, he sent after him the lord Daubeneie with five hundred horsemen toward the sea side, to apprehend him before he should get away. Although Perkin escaped (as I haue said) vnto sanctuarie, yet manie of his chiefe capteins were taken and presented to the king.

Also the horsemen that were sent, without anie stop or staie came to saint Michaels mount, and there (as chance was) found the lady Katharine Gordon wife to Perkin, and brought hir straight to the king. At whose beaultie and amiable countenance the king much marvelled, and thought hir a preie more meet for a prince, than for the meane souldiers, and sent hir incontinentlie vnto London to the queene, accompanied with a sort of sage matrones and gentlewomen, because she was but yong. The common people that had followed Perkin, after that their chafeteine was fled, staid alwaie their armour as people amazed, and submitted themselves to the king, humbly beseeching him of mercie, which he most gentlie granted, and receiued them to his fauour. After this the king rood to Excester, and there not onelie commended the citizens, but also hartlie thanked them for doing so well their duties in defending their citie from their enemies. He also put there to execution diuerse Cornishmen, which were the authors and principall beginners of this new conspiracie and insurrection. Fewer the lesse, he vfed maruelous clemencie also in pardoning a great number of the rebels.

¶ For when king Henrie was come to Excester with a great armie, moued there vnto (as you haue heard) by reason of the rebellion of Perkin Warbecke, who was fled before the kings coming, he staid a few daies about the examination of the said rebellion, and the executing of the chiefe and principall capteins. In the end, the multitude of the offenders being great, and most humbly craning for pardon, the king caused them all to be assembled in the churchyard of saint Peters, where they all appeared bare headed, in their shirts, and with halters about their necks. His grace was then lodged in the treasurerors house, lieng fast vpon the churchyard, and out of a faire and large window (made for the purpose) he toke the view of them, who shouted and cried out for pardon. At length, when the king had paused, he made a speech vnto them, exhorting them to obedience, and in hope he should thenceforth find them dutifull, he pardoned them all: whereat they all made a great shout, gaue the king thanks, and hurled about their halters. Yet neuerthelesse, some returned againe, and ioined themselves with the Cornish people, which had not all submitted themselves, nor sought for pardon.]

Now while he remained at Excester, he considered with himselfe, that he had done nothing, if he could not get into his hands the chiefe head of this trouble and seditious businesse. Wherefore he caused the sanctuarie wherein Perkin was inclosed, to be intrenched with two bands of light horsemen, to watch diligetlie, that Perkin should not escape by anie meanes forth of that place vntaken: and withall attempted by faire promises of pardon and forgiveness, if Perkin would submit himselfe to him and become his man. Perkin perceiuing himselfe so shut by, that he could no waie escape, of his owne free will came out of the sanctuarie, and committed himselfe to the kings pleasure. When the king had thus atchained his purpose, he returned to London, and appointed certeine keepers to attend on Perkin, which should not (the bredth of a naile) go from his person; least he should conuete himselfe by anie meanes out of the he land [and set forth troubles abroad by such practises as he had to fore used, for the advancement of himself to the estate of a king, by assuming unto himself the name of a kings sonne, when in deed he was come of base parentage. But such will be a gentleman, the long eared alle will be taken for a leopard, and the king pleasure for a lion, as one saith: Nunc est propter vocat et formis leonem.

After this the king caused inquiries to be made of all such as had aided with men or monie the Scottish rebels, so that diuerse persons as well in Scotland as here were detected of that offence which he intended for example sake should take some part of the punishments for their crimes, according to the quality thereof. And therefore he appointed Thomas de Warracie, knight, and Robert Sherborne deane of Woules (that was after bishop of Chichester) to be commissioners for selling of their fines that were found culpable. These commissioners so bestowed themselves in tolling the offers and substance of all the inhabitants of both those shires, that there was not one person imbrued or spotted with the blood of that abominable crime, that escaped the paine which he had decreed: but to such yet as offended rather by contempt than of malice, they were gentle and fauourable, so that equitie therein was verie well and iustlie executed.

In this yeare all the gardens which had bene continued time out of mind, without any gate of London, were destroyed, and of their was made a plaine field for archers to shoot in. Also this yeare was a great drought, by reason whereof a load of haie, which was before sold at London at five shillings, was this yeare sold for ten or twelue more. Also this yeare, one Sebastian Cabato, a Genoas sonne, borne in Wiffow, professing himselfe to be expert in knowledge of the circuit of the world, and Islands of the same, as by his charts and other reasonable demonstrations he shewed, caused the king to man and bittell a ship at Wiffow, to search for an Island which he knew to be replenished with rich commodities. In the ship diuerse merchants of London aduentured small stocks, and in the companie of this ship sailed also out of Wiffow three or foure small ships straight with slight and grosse wares, as course cloath, caps, lases, points, and such other.

Sir Humfre Gilbert knight, in his booke intituled, A discouerie for a new passage to Cataia, writeth thus; Sebastian Cabato, by his personal experience and trauell, hath described and set forth this passage in his charts, which are yet to be seene in the queenes maiesties priue gallerie at Whitehall, who was sent to make this discouerie by king Henrie the seuenth, and entered the same fret, affirming that he sailed verie farre westward, with a quarter of the north, on the north side of terra de Labrador, the eleventh of June, untill he came to the septentrionall latitude of 67½ degrees, and finding the seas still open, said, that he might & would haue gon to Cataia, if the em-nitie of the maister and mariners had not bene. Peruerthelesse, he went verie farre, euen to a nation inhabited with people more like beastes than men, as ap-peareth in the yeare 1502, and the seuententh of this kings reigne, when the said trauelier was returned, and presented himselfe to the kings maiestie.]

In this yeare the warre had like to haue bene renewed betwixt the realmes of England and Scotland by a small occasion, as thus. Certaine pongmen of the Scots came arrived before Rosham castell, & beheld it wondrous circumspectlie, as though they would haue bene of counsell to know what was done therein. The keepers not perceiuing anie damage attempted against them for the first time, determined not to moue anie question to them, or once to stirre out. But when they came againe the next day, and viewed it likewise, the keepers of the castell suspecting some euill meaning, demanded of them what their intent was, and why they viewed and admired so the castell. The Scots answered them roughlie with disdainfull words, so that the English men fell to and replied with strokes, and after manie blowes giuen and receiued, diuerse Scots were wounded, and some slaine; and the residue ouermat-ched with multitude of the Englishmen, fled as fast as their horses could carie them.

The Scottish king hereof aduertised, was highlie displeased, and in all hast signified to king Henrie by his heralds appointment, in what sort his people (to the breach of the truce) were abused and handled.
King Henrie being not in will to breake with anie of his neighbours, excused the matter, affirming that he was not of knowledge to the misdemeanour of those that had the castell in keeping; requiring the king of Scots not to thinke the truce broken for anie thing done without his consent; promising in the word of a king to inquire of the truth, and if the offence were found to be begun on the partie of the keepers of the castell, he assured him that they should for no meed nor fauour escape due correction and punishment.

This answer (though it was more than reasonable) could not pacifie the king of Scots, till the bishop of Durham (that was owner of the castell of Rosham) who sore lamented, that by such as he appointed keepers there, the warre should be renewed) with sundrie letters written to the Scottish king, at length asswaged his displeasure, so that the said king wrote courteously to the bishop againe, signifieng that because he had manie secret things in his mind, which he would communicate onelie with him touching this matter now in variance; therefore he required him to take the paine to come into his coun-trie, trusting that he should thinke his labo- well befitted. The bishop was glad, and sent word hereof to the king his master, who willed him to accomplish the desire of the Scottish king, which he took to be reasonable.

At his comming into Scotland, he was courteously receiued of the king himselfe at the abbey of Spelrosse. And there, after the king had (for a countenance) complained much of the vnjust slaughter of his men late committed at Rosham: vpon the bishops gentle answers therunto, he forgave the same, and after began to talke secretlie without witness alone with the bishop. And first he declared what iust causes moued him in times past to seke amitie with the king of England: which now he desired much more to haue confirmed, for further maintenance & increase thereof. Which he doubted not but should sozt to a fortunate conclusion, if the king of England would vouchsafe to giue to him in matrimonie his first begotten daughter the ladie Margaret, vpon which point he purposed latelie to haue sent his ambassadors into England, which thing he would the sooner do if he knew the bishops mind therein to be readie to further his sute. The bishop answered but few words, saying that when he were returned to the king his maister, he would do the best in the matter that he could.

When the bishop was returned into England, and come to the king, he declared to him all the communication had betwene king James and him, from point to point in order. The king liked well thereof, as he to whom peace was euer a loue reigne solace and comfort. In this meane time Perkin Warbecke, disappointed of all hope to escape out of the Englishmens hands (which was the onelie thing that he most desired) found meanes yet at length to escape

deceiue his keepers, & took him to his heels. But when he came to the sea coasts, and could not passe, he was in a marvellous perplexitie: for euerie by way, lane, and cozier was laid for him, and such search made, that being brought to his wits end, and cut short of his pretended iournie, he came to the house of Bethlem, called the priore of Shene beside Richmond in Southerie, and betooke himselfe to the priore of that monasterie, requiring him for the honour of God, to beg his pardon of life of the kings maiestie.

The priore, which for the opinion that men had conceived of his vertue, was had in great estimation, pittieing the wretched state of that castife, came to the king, and shewed him of this Perkin, whose pardon he humbly craved, and had it as frelie granted. Incontinentlie after was Perkin brought to the court againe at Westminster, and was one day set fettered in a paire of stocks, before the doore of Westminsters hall, and there stood a whole day, not without innumerable reproches, mocks and scornings. And the next daie he was caried through London, and set vp on a like scaffold in Cheape by the standard, with like ginses and stocks as he occupied the daie before, and there stood all daie, and read openlie his owne confession, written with his owne hand, the verie copie thereof here insueth.

The confession of Perkin as it was written with his owne hand, which he read openlie vpon a scaffold by the standard in Cheape.

Perkin made an anatomy of his descent of his age.

It is first to be knowne, that I was borne in the towne of Turneie in Flanders, and my fathers name is John Osbecke, which said John Osbecke was controulloz of the said towne of Turneie, and my mothers name is Katharine de Faro. And one of my grandfathers vpon my fathers side was named Diricke Osbeck, which died. After whose death my grandmother was married vnto Peter Flamin, that was receiuer of the torenamed towne of Turneie, & deane of the botemen that row vpon the water of riuer called le Scheld. And my grandfater vpon my mothers side was Peter de Faro, which had in his keeping the keies of the gate of S. Johns within the same towne of Turneie. Also I had an uncle called maister John Stalin, dwelling in the parish of S. Dias within the same towne, which had married my fathers sister, whose name was Ione or Jane, with whome I dwelt a certeine season.

Perkins education of bringing by.

And after I was led by my mother to Antwerpe for to learne Flemish, in a house of a couline of mine, an officer of the said towne, called John Stienbecke, with whome I was the space of halfe a yeare. And after that I returned againe to Turneie, by reason of warres that were in Flanders. And within a yeare following I was sent with a merchant of the said towne of Turneie, named Berlo, to the mart of Antwerpe, where I fell sicke, which sicknesse continued vpon me five moneths. And the said Berlo set me to board in a skimmers house, that dwelled beside the house of the English nation. And by him I was from thence caried to Barow mart, and I lodged at the signe of the old man, where I abode for the space of two moneths.

After this, the said Berlo set me with a merchant of Middlebrow to seruite for to learne the language, whose name was John Strebo, with whome I dwelt from Christmasse to Easter, and then I went into Doringall in companie of sir Edward Bramptons wife, in a ship which was called the quens ship. And when I was come thither, then was I put in seruice to a knight that dwelled in Luthborne, which was called Peter Waz de Cogna, with whome I dwelled an whole yeare, which said knight had but one eie. And because I desired to see other countries, I took licence of him, and then I put my selfe in seruice with a Britan, called Regent Meno, which brought me with him into Ireland. Now when we were there arrived in the towne of Cork, they of the towne (because I was arraid with some cloths of silke of my said masters) came vnto me, & threatened vpon me that I should be the duke of Clarences sonne, that was before time at Dublin.

But forsomuch as I denied it, there was brought vnto me the holie euangelists, and the crosse, by the maiore of the towne, which was called John Leweline, and there in the presence of him and others, I took mine oth (as the truth was) that I was not the foresaid dukes sonne, nor none of his blood. And after this came vnto me an Englishman, whose name was Stephan Boitron, and one John Water, and laid to me in swearing great oths, that they knew well that I was king Richards bastard sonne: to whome I answered with like oths, that I was not. Then they aduised me not to be afearde, but that I should take it vpon me boldlie: and if I would so doo, they would aid and assist me with all their power against the king of England; & not onelie they, but they were well assured, that the earle of Desmond & Kildare should doo the same.

For they forced not what part they took, so that they might be reuenged on the king of England: and so against my will made me to learne English, and taught me what I should doo and saie. And after this they called me duke of Porke, second sonne to king Edward the fourth, because king Richards bastard sonne was in the hands of the king of England. And vpon this the said Water, Stephan Boitron, John Tiler, Hughbert Burgh, with manie others, as the foresaid earles, entered into this false quarell, and within short time others. The French K. sent an ambassador into Ireland, whose name was Loit Lucas, and maister Stephan Friham, to aduertise me to come into France. And then I went into France, and from thence into Flanders, & from Flanders into Ireland, and from Ireland into Scotland, & so into England.

The Irish would have Perkin take vpon him to be the duke of Clarences sonne.

They bring Perkin to the king Richards bastard.

They call him duke of York.

When the night of the same date (being the fifteenth of June) was come, after he had stood all that date in the face of the citie, he was committed to the Tower, there to remaine under safe keeping, least hapilie he might escones run awaie, and escape out of the land, to put the king and realme to some new trouble. For he had a wonderful bertittie and readinesse to circumvent, a heart full of overreaching imaginations, an aspiring mind, a head more wilie (I wisse) than witte; bold he was and presumptuous in his behaviour, as forward to be the instrument of a mischief, as anie deuiler of wickednesse would willy; a friend of the diuels owne forgoing, nursed and trained up in the studie of commotions, making offer to reach as high as he could loke; such was his inordinate ambition, wherewith he did swell as conuict to be a princes peere: much like the tode that would match the bull in drinking, but in the end the bull in peeces and neuer dranke more; as the poet telleth the tale (by the imitation of the fabler) saying:

In this yeare was an Augustine frier called Patrike in the parties of Suffolke, the which hauing a scholer named Rafe Willford (a thomakers sonne of London as Stow noteth) had so framed him to his purpose, that in hope to worke some great enterpryse, as to disappoint the king of his crowne and seat roiall, took upon him to be the earle of Warwike, insonuch that both the maister and scholer hauing counselled betwaine themselves of their enterpryse, they went into Kent, & there began the pong matu met to tell priuile to manie, that he was the vertie earle of Warwike, and latelie gotten out of the Tower, by the helpe of this frier Patrike. To which sayings when the frier perceiued some light credence to be giuen, he declared it openlie in the pulpit, and desired all men of helpe. But the danger of this seditions attempt was shortly remoued and taken awate, the maister and scholer being both apprehended and cast into prison and atteinted.

The scholer was hanged on Shrouetuesdaie at saint Thomas Waterings, and the frier condemned to perpetuall prison. For at that time so much reuerence was attributed to the holie orders, that to a preist (although he had committed high treason against his souereigne lord) his life was spared, in like case as to anie other offender in murder, rape, or theft, that had receiued anie of the three higher holie orders. The chiefe cause (saith Edward Hall) of this fauour was this, because bishops of a long time and season did not take knowledge, nor intermix themselves with the search & punishment of such heinous and detestable offenses: by reason whereof they did not disgrace and depriue from the holie orders such malefactours and wicked persons, which without that ceremonie by the canon lawes could not be put to death.

Furthermore, what should a man saie, it was also toled, that he that could but onelie read (yea although he vnderstood not what he read) how heinous or detestable a crime so euer he had committed (treason onelie excepted) should likewise as affines & allies to the holie orders be faued, and committed to the bishops prison. And to the intent that if they should escape, and be againe taken, committing like offense, that their liues be no more to them pardoned: it was ordeined that murderers should be burnt on the bawne of the left hand with an hot iron signed with this letter M. and thence in the same place with this letter T. So that if they, which were once signed with anie of these marks or tokens did reiterate like crime & offense againe, should suffer the paines and punishments which they had both merited and deser

ued. Which decre was enacted and established in a session of parlement kept in the time of this kings reigne, and taken (as I conteaure) of the French nation, which are wont, if they take anie such offender, to cut off one of his eares, as a sure token and marke hereafter of his euill doing.]

Perkin Warbecke (as before ye haue heard) being now in hold, by false persuasions and great promises corrupted his keepers, Strangith, Bletwet, Astwood, and long Roger, seruants to sir John Digbie lieutenant of the Tower. Insonuch that they (as it was at their arresignment openlie promised) intended to haue slaine their maister, and to haue set Perkin and the earle of Warwike at large. Which earle of Warwike had bene kept in prison within the Tower almost from his tender yeares, that is to saie, from the first yeare of the king, to this fiftieth yeare, out of all companie of men & sight of beastes, insonuch that he could not discerne a gosle from a capon, and therefore by common reason and open apparance could not of himselfe seeke his diuine death and destruction. But yet by the drift and offense of an other he was brought to his death and confusion.

For being made priuile of this enterpryse deuised by Perkin and his complices, therewith (as all naturall creatures loue libertie) he assented and agreed. But this craftie deuile and subtilt imagination being reuealed, forced to none effect, so that Perkin and John Awater sometime maior of Cozke in Ireland, one of his chiefe founders, and his sonne, were on the sixteenth daie of Nouember arresigned and condemned at Westminister. And on the thre and twentieth daie of the same moneth, Perkin and John Awater were drawne to Tiburie, where Perkin standing on a little scaffold, read his confession (as before he had done in Cheape side) taking it on his death to be true. And so he and John Awater asked the king forgiveness, and died patientlie.

This was the reward of the feined gosle and counterfeit comment of Perkin Warbecke, the which as by his false surmises in his life time had brought manie honourable personages to their deaths, and vndone manie an honest man: so now at his death he brought other of the same sort to their not altogether vnderferved punishment. And amongst others Edward Plantagenet the forenamed erle of Warwike, which (as the same went) consented to beake prison, and to depart out of the realme with Perkin (which in prisoners is high treason) was the one and twentieth daie of the said moneth arresigned at Westminister before the earle of Wrenford then high steward of England of the said treason, which (whether it were by intilement and persuation of other, or of his owne free will manie doubted, because of his innocencie) confessed the fact, and submitted himselfe to the kings mercie; and upon his confession had his iudgement, and according therunto the eight and twentieth daie of Nouember in the yeare 1499, was brought to the scaffold on the Tower hill, and there beheaded.

The same after his death spang abroad, that Ferdinando king of Spaine would make no full conclusion of the matrimonie to be had betwene prince Arthur and the ladie Katharine daughter to the said Ferdinando, nor send him into England as long as this earle liued. For he imagined that so long as anie earle of Warwike liued, England should neuer be purged of ciuill warre and priuie sedition, so much was the name of Warwike in other regions had in feare and gealoufie. The next yeare after there was a great plague, whereof men died in manie places be rie soze; but speciallie and most of all in the citie of London, where died in that yeare thirtie thousand. The king of England and the duke of Burgonie meet at saint Peters church without Calis. Abr. Fl. ex Edw. Hall. in Hen. 7. follij.

Anno Reg. 16.

A yeare of Jubile.

Pope Alexander maketh profit of his great pardon or heauenlie grace, as he termeth it.

yeare of this kings reigne his third son was christened and was named Edward. Also in this yeare was burned a place of the kings, called the manour of Shene situate nigh the Thames side, which he after builded againe sumptuously, and changed the name of Shene, and called it Richmond; because his father and he were earles of Richmond: or (as some note) for that so manie notable and rich iewels were there burnt. He also new builded Wainards castell in London, and repaired Cranelwich.]

The king, whether to auoid the danger of so great and perillous sicknesse, then raging, or to take occasion to comen with the duke of Burgonie, did personallie take his ship at Dover in the beginning of Maie, and sailed to Calis, whither the duke of Burgonie sent to him honourable personages in ambassage to welcome him into those parties, and to declare that the said duke would gladlie repaire personallie to his presence with such a number as the king should appoint, so that it were within no walled towne nor fortreffe. For hauing denied the French king to enter into anie of his fortresses to talke with him, he would be loth now to giue a present to him to desire the like meeting. The king intertaining the ambassadors, and thanking the duke of his courteous offer, appointed the place at saint Peters church without Calis.

Upon tuesdaie in Whitsunweke the archduke Philip came thither with a conuenient companie. The king and the queene with manie a lustie lord and ladye rode thither to welcome him. And when the king approached, the duke at his lighting offered to hold his stirrups, when the king in no wise would suffer to be done. When the king was descended from his horse, he and the archduke embraced each other with most princelie familiaritie, and then the queene and all the nobles saluted him. And after most louing interteinments, banquettings, mirth, and pastime thewed amongest them, there was communication of marriages, treating of further strengthening of leagues, requests of tolles in Flanders to be minished: with manie other things touching the commoditie and traffike of both their countries. And when all things were set in order, the two princes toke their leaue, and departed; the king to Calis, and the archduke to S. Amers. After his departing, there came as ambassadors from the French king, the lord Cronthouse gouernour of Picardie, and the lord Peruelliers bailiffe of Amiens, which declared to the king the getting of Millaine and taking of the duke. The king highlye feasted them, and rewarded them princelie at their departing.

Some after, when the death was slaked, the king returned againe into England about the end of Iune. Shortly after there came to him one Casper Pons a Spaniard, a man of excellent learning and most ciuill behauiour, sent from Alexander the bishop of Rome to distribute the heauenlie grace (as he termed it) to all such as (letted by anie forceable impediment) could not come to Rome that yeare to the Jubile, which was there celebrate, being the yeare after the birth of our Saviour, 1500. This beneuolent liberalitie was not altogether frailer giuen. For Alexander looking to the health of mens soules, thought to do somewhat for his owne priuat commoditie, & therefore he set a certeine price of that his grace and pardon. And to the end that the king should not hinder his purpose, he offered part of his gaires to the king.

And to colour the matter with some fauourable pretext, and to make men the better willing, & moze ready to giue frankie, he promised with that monie to make warre against the Turke. By this meanes the roie got a great masse of monie, which he had conueied ouer vnto him by such trustie messengers (doubt you not) as he had appointed; and yet nothing done against the Turks, which in the meane season did much hurt to the christians. [For it was no part of his meaning (what colourable helpe soeuer he made of tendering the succourlesse people) to impart anie portion thereof to so good a vse; but rather for the supportation of him and his swarme, who before they will bate an ace of their gorgeous gallantnesse, the whole world shalbe consumed. Such is the collusion of the pope, such be the shamelesse shifts of him and his cleargie for the maintenance of their owne courtlie bawerie, which is wicked banitie; farre passing the pompe of anie prince, were the same of neuer so rare magnificence; as he well noteth that said full trulie:

*immo princeps non visus in orbe est, Cui tanti fastus tantae pompa fuit.
Ingreditur quando misera Babylonis in urbes, Cernitur hic plusquam regia pompa comes.
Huic equus est humans ostrog infans & auro, Alisq; chinas sub pede terra ferunt.*

About this time died these bishops in England, John Hopton archbishop of Cantuarburie, Thomas Langton bishop of Winchester, and Thomas Rotherham archbishop of York. After him succeeded Thomas Sanage bishop of London, a man of great honour and worthinesse: in whose place succeeded William Warham, of whose before is made mention. And Heirric Deane bishop of Salisburie, was made archbishop of Cantuarburie, and Richard For was removed from Durham to the see of Winchester. Also this yeare two notable marriages were concluded, but not consummate till afterwarres, as you shall heare in place conuenient. For king Henrie granted his daughter ladie Margaret to James the fourth king of Scots. And Ferdinando king of Spaine gaue his daughter ladie Katharine to Arthur prince of Wales, sonne and heire apparent to the king of England.

Among other articles of the marriage concluded with the Scottis king this was one, that no English men should be receiued into Scotland without letters commendatorie of their soueraigne lord, or safe conduct of his warden of the marches; and the same prohibition was in like maner giuen to the Scots. This yeare the ladie Katharine of Spaine was sent by hir father king Ferdinando with a puissant nauie of ships into England, where she arrived in the haue of Wlmmouth the second daie of October then being saturday. Upon the twelfe of November she was conueied from Lambeth through London with all triumph and honour that might be deuised to the bishops palace, the streets being hanged, and pageants erected after the maner as is vied at a coronation: which solemnitie Edward Hall describeth with the sumptuous shewes then glistering in the beholders eyes.

I passe ouer (saith he) the wise deuises, the prudent speeches, the costlie works, the cunning portraiture, practised and set forth in seuen goodlie beautiful pageants, created and set by in diuerse places of the citie. I leaue also the goodlie ballades, the sweet harmonie, the muscalle instruments, which sounded with heauenlie noise on euerie side of the streets. I omit further, the costlie apparell both of goldsmiths worke and imbroderie, the rich iewels, the masse chaines, the stirring harnesses, the beautifull barbs and the glittering trappers, both with belles and spangels of gold. I pretermitt also the rich apparell of the prince, the strange fashion of the Spanissh nation, the beautie of the English ladies, the goodlie demaure of the yong damoels, the amorous countenance of the lustie bachelers. I passe ouer also the fine ingrained clothes, the costlie furs of the citizens, standing on scaffolds, raised from Gracechurch to Paules. What should I speake of the odoriferous scarlets, the fine veluets, the pleasant furrres, the masse chaines, which the maior of London with the senat, sitting on horsebacke at the little conduit in Cheape, ware on their bodies and about their neckes: I will not speake of the rich arras, the collicke tapestrie, the fine clothes both of gold and siluer, the curious veluets, the beautifull satteens, nor the pleasant silkes which did hang in euerie street where she passed, the wine that ran continuallie out of the conduits, and the graweling of the streets needeth not to be remembred.]

Whilest this ladie sojourned for her recreation in the bishops palace of London, being in the meane time visited of the king, the quene, and the kings mother, there was erected in the bodie of S. Paules church a long badge made of timber, extending from the west dore of the church to the step at the entring into the quere, which was six foot from the ground. On the said badge of stage, guen direalie before the confessorie of the church, was a place raised like a mount for eight persons to stand upon, compassed round about with steps to ascend and descend, which was covered with fine red woofed, and in likewise were all the railles of the said stage. On the north side of this mount was a place decked and trimmed for the king and quene, and such other as they appointed to haue. On the south side of the same mount stood the maior and the magistrates of the citie.

When all things were prepared and set in order, upon the foureteenth of Nouember then being Sundaye, the foresaid ladie was led to the said mount, and there prince Arthur openlie espoused her, both being clad in white, both lustie and amorous, he of the age of sixteen and more, and she of the age of eighteen or thereabouts, the king and quene standing priuily on their stage. After the matrimonie celebrated, the prince and his wife went by into the quere, and there heard a solemne masse song by the archbishop of Canturburie, associat with nineteen prelates mitred. And after the masse finished, the bzide was led homewards to the bishops palace by the duke of Yorke being then a godlie young prince, and the legat of Spaine. Pert after followed the ladie Cicilie sister to the quene, suppoiting the traine of the spoule.

But to speake of all the solemne pompe, noble companie of lords and ladies, and what a sumptuous feast and plentifull was kept, with dawning and disgulings, words might sooner faile than matter words of rehearfall. Whatbeit euerie daie endeth and night insuech, and so when night was come, the prince and his beautifull bzide were brought and ioined together in one bed, where they laie as man and wife all that night. Now when the morning appeared, the prince (as his familiar seruitors, which had then neither cause nor reward to lie or faime, openlie told the tale called for drinke, which he before times was not accustomed to do. At which thing one of his chamberlaines maruelling, asked the cause of his drouth. To whom the prince answered merilie, saying: I haue this night bene in the midst of Spaine, which is a hot region, and that iourne maketh me so drie: and if then haddest bene under that hot climat, thou wouldest haue bene drier than I.]

Shortlie after the king and the quene, with the new wedded spoules went from Baimards castell by water to Westminister, on whom the maior and communalte of London in barges gorgeously trimmed gaue their attendance. And there in the palace were such martiall feats, valiant iusts, vigorous turneis, and such fierce fight at the barriers, as before that time was of no man had in remembrance. Of this toiall triumph lord Edward duke of Buckingham was chiefe challenger, and lord Thomas Greie marquisse Dorset chiefe defender, which with their aids and companions bare themselves to balliantlie, that they got great praise and honour, both of the Spaniards, and of their owne countrymen. During the time of these iusts and triumphs, were receiued into London, an earle, a bishop, and diuerse noble personages sent from the king of Scots into England, for conclusion of the marriage betwene the ladie Margaret and him; which earle by prorie, in the name of king James his master, affied and contracted the said ladie. Which affiance was published at Paules crosse, the daie of the conuersion of saint Paule: in reioicing whereof Te Deum was song, and great fiers made through the citie of London.

These things being accomplished, the ambassadoys as well of Spaine as Scotland toke their leane of the king, and not without great rewards returned into their countries. When the ambassadoys were departed, he sent his sonne prince Arthur againe into Wales, to keepe that countrie in good order; appointing to him wise and expert counsellors, as sir Richard Pole his kinsman, which was his chiefe chamberleine, also sir Henrie Vernon, sir Richard Crofts, sir David Philip, sir William Udall, sir Thomas Englefield, sir Peter Pelton knights; John Malleson, Henrie Barton, & doctor William Smith, president of his counsell, and doctor Charles; of the which two doctors, the one was after bishop of Lincoln, and the other bishop of Hereford.

This yeare John Shaw (who was maior of London) caused his brethren the aldermen to ride from the Guildhall vnto the water side, when he went to Westminister to be presented in the exchequer. He also caused the kitchens and other houses of office to be builded at the Guildhall, where since that time the maiors feasts haue bene kept, which before had bene in the grocers or tallowers hall. About Easter, all the Greie friers in England changed their habit, for whereas of long time before they had used to weare browne russet of foure shillings, six shillings, and eight shillings the yard; now they were compelled to weare russet of two shillings the yard and not above, which was brought to passe by the friers of Cranelwich. This yeare, the dike called Carnemill broke, with all the course of flet dike, were so scoured downe to the Thames, that boates with fish and felwell were rowed by to Holborne bridge, as they of old time had bene accustomed: which was a great commoditie to all the inhabitants in that part of London. Also the tower nere to the Blacke friers was taken downe by the commandement of the maior. Also this yeare were brought vnto the king three men taken in the new found Islands, by Sebastian Gabato, before named in Anno 1468. These men were clothed in beasts skins, and eat raw flesh, but spake such a language as no man could vnderstand them, of the which three men, two of them were sene in the kings court at Westminister two yeares after, clothed like Englishmen, and could not be discerned from Englishmen.]

A few moneths before the marriage of prince Arthur, Edmund de la Pole earle of Suffolke, sonne to John duke of Suffolke, and ladie Elizabeth sister to king Edward the fourth, being bold and rash withall, was indicted of murder, for slaying of a meane person in his rage & furte. And although the king pardoned him whome he might iustlie haue put to death for that offense, yet bicause he was brought to the barre before the kings Bench, and arraigned (which fact he toke as a great blemish to his honour) shortlie after upon that displeasure he fled into Flanders vnto his aunt the ladie Margaret, the king not being ynnie to his going ouer. ther he was perswaded by his friends thereunto, whom the king had willed to deale with him therein; or whether upon trust of his innocencie: true it is that he returned againe, and excused himselfe to the king, so that he thought him to be guiltlesse of anie crime that might be objected against him.

The discontented mind of the earle of Suffolke.

But when the mariage betwixt the prince & the ladie Katharine of Spaine was kept at London, this erle either for that he had passed his compasse in excessive charges and sumptuousnesse at that great triumph and solemnitie, and by reason thereof was farre run into debt; either else through the procurement of his aunt the foresaid ladie Margaret; or picked with some private enuie, which could not patientlie with open eyes behold king Henrie (being of the aduerser faction to his linage) so long to reigne in wealth and felicitie: in conclusion with his brother Richard fled againe into Flanders. This departure of the earle so bereaved the king, doubting of some new trouble to issue thereof.

The kings
sworned patrons now asgaine practised.

But yet to vnderstand the full meaning of the said earle, the king bled his old feth: for immediatlie after the earle was fled, he appointed sir Robert Curson, whome he had aduanced to the order of knight-hood, and made capitaine of Hammes castell, a valiant man and a circumspect, to dissemble him selfe one of that conspiracie; who went into Flanders, to espie what was done there by the ladie Margaret, and his nephew the earle of Suffolke. After that the said sir Robert Curson was thus gone into Flanders, the king to put him out of all suspicion with the said ladie Margaret and the earle, caused the said earle, and sir Robert Curson, and five persons more to be accused at Paules crosse, the first Sunday of Nouember, as enemies to him and his realme.

To be briefe, the king by his meanes, and other such diligent inquisition as he made, trised out such as he suspected, partlie to be deualers of mischefe against him, and partlie to beare no sincere affection towards his person, so that he could reabilie name them: whereof a great part were within few daies apprehended and taken. And amongst them William lord Courtencie, sonne to the earle of Deuonshire, which married the ladie Katharine, daughter to king Edward the fourth; lord William de la Pole, brother to the foresaid earle of Suffolke, sir James Tirrell, & sir John Windam. Both the Williams were rather taken of suspicion, because they were so neere of kin to the conspirator, than for anie proued matter. But sir James Tirrell and John Windam, because they were traitors, and so attainted, the first daie of Maie after their apprehension, they were on the Tower hill beheaded.

Tirrell and windam beheaded.

When the earle of Suffolke heard what fortune thus happened to his friends, as one in bitter despaire to haue anie good successe in his pretended enterprise, wandered about all Germanie and France, to purchase some aid and succour, if by anie means he might. But when he perceived no stedfast ground to catch anchor-hold vpon, he submitted himselfe vnder the protection of Philip archduke of Austrich. But his brother Richard, being a politike man, so wiselie ordered himselfe in this stormie tempest, that he was not intrapped either with net or snare. The king not yet out of all doubt of ciuill sedition, because a great number of euill disposed persons partakers of this conspiracie, were fled into sundrie sanctuaries, deuised to haue all the gates of sanctuaries and places privileged shut and locked vp, so that none should issue out from thence to perturb and disquiet him.

And for that intent he wrote vnto pope Alexander, desiring him by his authoritie to adiudge all Englishmen, being fled to sanctuarie for the offense of treason as enemies to the christian faith, interdicting and prohibiting the refuge and priuilege of sanctuarie to all such, as once had enioied the libertie and protection of the same, and after that fled out, and estates returned againe. Which thing after that the pope had granted, turned to the great quietnesse of the king and his realme. For manie that had offended, for feare to fall into danger, returned to the due subiection of their prince; and other that were yet free from perill, durst not hazard themselves so boldlie as they durst haue done before, vpon hope of such starting holes.

When the king had thus settled things to his owne contentation and pleasure, there suddenlie happened to him a lamentable chance. For that noble prince Arthur, the kings first begotten sonne, after he had bene married to the ladie Katharine his wife, the space of five moneths, departed out of this transitorie life, in his castell of Ludlow, and with great funeral obsequie was buried in the cathedrall church of Worcester. His brother the duke of Yorke was deaied from the title of Prince by the space of a moneth, till to women it might appeare whether the ladie Katharine liued to the said prince Arthur was conceived with child or not. [It is reported that this ladie Katharine thought and feared such dolorous chance to come: for when she had embraced her father, and taken her leave of her noble and prudent mother, and sailed towards England, she was continually so tossed and tumbled hither and thither with boisterous winds, that what for the rage of the water, and contrarietie of the winds, her ship was prohibited diuerse times to approach the shore, and take land.]

In this eighteenth yeare, the twentieth fourth daie of Januarie, a quarter of an houre afore three of the clocke at after none of the same daie, the first stone of our ladie chapel within the monastrie of Westminster was laid, by the hands of John Skip abbat of the same monastrie, sir Reginald Bray knight of the garter, doctor Barnes maister of the rolles, doctor Wall chapleine to the kings maiestie, maister Hugh Oldham chapleine to the countesse of Darbie and Richmond the kings mother, sir Edward Stanhope knight, and diuerse others. Vpon the same stone was this scripture ingrauen: Illustrissimus Henricus septimus rex Anglia & Francie, & dominus Hibernie, posuit hanc petram in honore beatae virginis Mariae, 24. die Ianuarij, anno Domini 1502. Et anno dicti regis Henrici septimi, decimo octauo. The charges wherof amounted (as some report, vpon credible information as they saie) to foureteene thousand pounds.

Queene Elizabeth lieng within the Tower of London, was brought a bed of a faire daughter on Candlemasse daie, which was there christened and named Katharine; and the eleuenth of the same moneth the said queene there deceased, and was buried at Westminster, whose daughter also liued but a small season after her mother. [King Henrie the seauenth being himselfe a brother of the tailors company in London, as diuerse other his predecessors kings before him had bene (to wit Richard the third, Edward the fourth, Henrie the first, Henrie the fifth, Henrie the fourth, and Richard the second; also of dukes eleuen, earles eight and twentie, and lordes eight and fortie) he now gaue to them the name and title of merchant tailors, as a name of worship to indure for euer. This yeare, about the later end of March, the prioz of the Charterhouse of Shene was murdered in a cell of his owne house, by meanes of one Godwine, a monke of the same cloister, and his adherents artificers of London. A drie summer, hauing no notable raine from Whitson-tide to the later ladie daie in haruest.

face of Westminster created his onelie sonne Henrie prince of Wales, earle of Chester, &c: who afterward succeeded his father in possession of the regall crowne of this realme. Moreover, this yeare also, after the deceasse of that noble queene, for hir vertue commonlie called good queene Elizabeth, departed out of this world also sir Reginald Bate knight of the garter, a verie father of his countrie, for his high wisdom and singular loue to iustice well worthie to beare that title. If anie thing had bene done amiss contrarie to law and equitie, he would after an humble sort plainelie blame the king, and giue him good advertisement, that he should not onelie rejoyce the same, but also be more circumspect in anie other the like case. Of the same vertue and faithfull plainnesse was John Foxton archbishop of Canturburie, which died (as is shewed aboue) two yeares before.

So these two persons were restrainers of the kings vnbisheled libertie; whereas the common people (ignorant altogether of the truth in such matters) iudged and reported, that the counsell of those two worthie personages corrupted the kings cleane and immaculate conscience, contrarie to his princelie disposition and naturall inclination; such is euer the error of the common people. About this time died Henrie the archbishop of Canturburie, whose roome doctor William Warham bishop of London supplied. And to the see of London William Barnes was appointed, and after his death succeeded one Richard fitz James. This yeare also the lord Calmire marquisse of Brandenburg, accompanied with an earle, a bishop, and a great number of gentlemen well apparelled, came in ambassage from the emperor Maximilian, and were triumphantlie receiued into London, and lodged at Croftes place.

Their message was for thre causes, one to comfort the king in his tunc of heavinesse for the losse of his wife. The second for the renewing of amitie, and the old league. The third (which was not apparant) was to move the king to marie the emperours daughter, the ladie Margarete, duchesse Dowager of Savoy. The two first took effect: for the king upon Passen Sundaye rode to Paules in great triumph, the said marquisse riding on his left hand. And there the bishop made to the king an excellent consolatorie oration concerning the death of the queene. And there also the king openlie swore to keepe the new renewed league and amitie during their two liues. But the third request (whether the let was on the mans side, or on the womans) neuer soyled to anie conclusion.

The ladie Margarete the kings daughter, assied (as ye haue heard) to the king of Scots, was appointed to be conueied into Scotland, by the earle of Surrie: and the earle of Northumberland, as wariden of the marches, was commanded to deliuer hir at the confines of both the realmes. And so hereupon, after hir coming to Werwike, she was conueied to Lamberton kirke in Scotland, where the king of Scots, with the flower of all the nobles and gentlemen of Scotland, was readie to receiue hir: to whom the earle of Northumberland (according to his commission) deliuered hir. The said earle of Northumberland and that date, what for the riches of his coat being goldsmithes worke, garnished with pearle and stone, and what for the gallant apparell of his henchmen, and braue trappers of his horse, besides foure hundred tall men well hoysed and apparelled in his colours, was esteemed both of the Scots and Englishmen more like a prince than a subiect.

From Lamberton, the foresaid ladie was conueied to Edenburgh, and there the date after, King James the fourth, in the presence of all his nobilitie, esponed hir, and feasted the English lords, and shewed iusts and other pastimes verie honourable, after the fashion of that countrie. And after all things were finished according to their commission, the earle of Surrie with all the English lords and ladies returned into their countrie. In this yeare the king kept his high court of parlement, in the which diuerse acts esteemed necessarie for the preservation of the common-wealth were established: and amongst other, it was enacted, that thence and murderers duellie conuicted by the law to die, and yet saved by their books, should be committed to the bishops custody. After this, a subsidie was granted, both of the tempozaltie, and spiritualltie, and so that parlement ended.

But the king now drawing into age, and willing to fill his chests with abundance of treasure, was not satisficed with this onelie subsidie, but deuised an other meane how to enrich himselfe, as thus. He considered that the Englishmen little regarded the keeping of penall lawes, and pecuntall statutes, deuised for the good preservation of the common-wealth. Therefore he caused inquisition to be made of those that had transgressed anie of the same lawes, so that there were but few noble men, merchants, farmers, husbandmen, graffers, or occupiers, that could clearely proue themselves faultlesse, but had offended in some one or other of the same lawes. At the first, they that were found gilty were caslie fined. But after, there were appointed two maisters and suruisors of his forfeits, the one sir Richard Empson, and the other Edmund Dudley.

These two were learned in the lawes of the realme, who meaning to satisfie their princes pleasure, and to see their commission executed to the vttermost, seemed little to respect the perill that might insue. Whereupon they being furnished with a sort of accusers, commonlie called promoters, or (as they themselves will be named) informers, troubled manie a man, whereby they wan them great hatred, and the king (by such rigorous proceedings) lost the loue and fauour which the people before time had borne towards him; so that he for setting them a worke, and they for executing of it in such extream wise, ran into obloquie with the subjects of this realme.

On the thirtieth of Nouember was holden with in the palace of the archbishop of Canturburie, at Lambeth, the sergeants feast, where dined the king and all his nobles. And upon the same day, Thomas Granger, newlie chosen shriffe of London, was presented before the barons of the kings exchequer, there to take his oth, and after went with the maiors unto the same feast, which saued him monie in his purse; for if that day that feast had not bene kept, he must haue feasted the maiors, aldermen, and others, two shipfull of the citie. This feast was kept at the charge of ten learned men, newlie admitted to be sergeants to the kings law, whose names were, Robert Biddell, William Grenill, Thomas Harlow, George Edgoc, John More, John Cutler, Thomas Eliot, Lewis Pollard, Cnie Palmis, William Jafrekar. On the one and twentieth of Nouember at night, began a perillous fier at the signe of the painter upon London hydge, nere to saint Magnus church; where six tenements were burned per the same could be quenched. On the seventh of Ianuarie, were certeine houses consumed with fire against saint Butolphes church in Thames street. On the nine and twentieth of Ianuarie began a parlement at Westminster, of the which was chosen speaker for the commons, maister Edmund Dudley.

A new coine of sluer was ordeined of grotes and halfe grotes, which bare but halfe faces; and some peeces of the value of twelue pence were then stamped,

The king of Castile interdicted Spannaw.

to sir John Carew, and to sir Thomas Trenchard, that they should intertaine him in the most honorable sort they could devise, till he might come himselfe in person to welcome him. Beside this, he sent the earle of Arundell with manie lords and knights to attend upon him. Which earle (according to the kings letters) receiued him with three hundred horses, all by torchlight, to the great admiration of the strangers.

King Philip seeing no remedie but that he must needs tarie, would no longer gaze after king Henries coming, but took his iourne toward Wind-sore castell, where the king laie: and five miles from Windsore the prince of Wales, accompanied with five earles, and diuerse lords and knights, and other to the number of five hundred persons gorgeously apparelled, receiued him after the most honorable fashion. And within halfe a mile of Windsore, the king, accompanied with the duke of Buckingham, and a great part of the nobilitie of this realme, welcomed him, & so conueied him to the castell of Wind-sore, where he was made companion of the noble order of the garter. After him came to Windsore his wife quene Jane, sister to the princesse Dowager, late wife to prince Arthur.

After the two kings had renewed & confirmed the league and amitie betwixt them, king Henrie desired to haue Edmund de la Pole earle of Suffolke to be deliuered into his hands. To whom the king of Castile answered, that he herelic was not within his dominion: and therefore it laie not in him to de-liuer him. In deed he was loth to be the authour of his death that came to him for succour, and was re-ceiued under his protection: yet upon the earnest request and assured promise of king Henrie (that he would pardon him of all erecutions and paines of death he granted to king Henries desire; and so in-conueniently caused the said earle secretlie to be sent for. After this, to protract time till he were possessed of his priue, king Henrie conueied the king of Castile unto the citie of London, that he might see the head citie of his realme.

Then he led him from Baiwards castell by Cheape to Waring; and so returned by Watling street againe: during which time there was shot out of the Tower a wonderfull peale of ordinance. But he would not enter into the Tower, because as ye haue heard before he had aduised not to enter the fortresse of any foreign prince, in the which a garrison was maintained. From London the king brought him to Richmond, where manie notable feates of armes were panned both of tilt, turnie, and barriers.
In the meane season the erle of Suffolke, perceiuing what hope was to be had in foreign princes, and trusting that after his life to him once granted, king Henrie would graunte let him at his full libertie, was in manner contented to returne againe into his native countrey.

When all pacts and covenants betwixt the kings of England and Castile were appointed, concluded, and agreed, king Philip took his leave of king Henrie passing to him and his beautes thanks for his high dore and comely entertainment. And being accompanied with diuerse lords of England, he came to the citie of Oxford, and so to Southampton in Cornwall, and there taking ship sailed into Spaine, where he arrived after he was being thirtie yeares of age. The time of his iourne, of countenance amiable of his face most gentle, quick, welled, bold and brave. Somewhat the tempest that he suffered on the sea was long, and wonderfull also upon the land, in which he in the presence of the world was become an eagle of battle, being set to them on which part the world was, from a puerile to a place of honour and glorie.

and in the falling, the same eagle brake and battered an other eagle that was set up for a signe at a fauierne dore in Cheape-side.

Whereupon men that were given to gestic things that should happen by marking of strange tokens, deemed that the emperour Maximilian, which gaue the eagle, should suffer some great misfortune: as he did shortly after by the losse of his sonne, the said king Philip. And suerlie these prodigious accidents are not to be omitted as matter of course; for they haue their weight, and shew their truth in the issue.
Examples in this booke be diuerse, among which one is verie memorizable, mentioned in the thirtie & ninth yeare of Henrie the first. At what time the duke of Borke making an oration to the lords of the parliement, for the iustifying of his title to the crowne, it chanced that a crowne which hang in the middle of the nether house (to garnish a branch to set lights upon) without touch of man or blast of wind suddenlie fell downe. About which season also fell downe the crowne which stood on the top of Dover castell. Which things were construed to be signes that the crowne of the realme should some waie haue a fall; and so it came to passe.

And because the events of these foresaydes had their truth, as manie more of the like nature; it shall not be amisse here to ad (by waie of digression) what hath bene obserued in former ages by foreign writers in and about such foretokens. The content of the hear-uens and of men, pronounced to Italie their calamities to come; for that such as made profession to haue iudgement either by science or diuine inspiration in the things to come, assured with one voice that there were in preparing, both more great mutations and more strange and horrible accidents, than for manie worlds before had bene discerned in any part or circuit of the earth. There were scene in the night in Bouille three sons in the midst of the firmament, but manie clouds about them, with right fearefull thunders and lightnings. In the territorie of Aretze, were visible scene passing in the aire, infinite numbers of armed men upon mightie horses, with a terrible noise of drums and trumpets. The images & figures of saints did sweate in manie parts of Italie.

In euerie place of the countrey were brought forth manie monsters of men and other creatures, with manie other things against the order of nature con-curring all at one time, but in diuerse places: by means wherof the people were carried into incredible feares, being already amazed with the brute of the French powers & furie of that nation, with which according to the testimony of histories they had afore-time run ouer all Italie, sacked and made desolate with fire and sword the citie of Rome, and subuer-ted in Asia manie provinces; and generally no part of the world which had not felt the vertue of their armes. But albeit these iudgements are oftentimes fallible, and rather coniectures vncertaine, than effects happening: yet the accidents that were on, brought to them, in the spirits of fraile men, an absolute faith, credit, & religion. So that there is in force the way matter of moment together to be obserued, howeuer the world lieth asleep in the lap of secu-ritie us touched with no feare of change. But alas the Apostrophe could be the contrary, and therefore said:

CHANCE WILL FALL UPON THEE, O KING, THAT THOU SHALT SEE A STRANGE END OF THY REIGN, AND OF THY PEOPLE.

But to returne to our owne story. Shortly after the departing of king Philip, the king of England began to suspect sir George Bouchard lord of Bouchard newe, and sir Thomas Greue of Greues house, as partakers in the beginning of the conspiracy with the earle of Suffolke, and so upon that suspicion they were committed to the Towler. But shortly after, when they had bene tried and purged of that suspicion, he commanded them both to be set at libertie. But sir Thomas Grene fell sicke before, and remained in the Towler, in hope to be restored to his health as well as to his libertie, but by death he was prevented. [And here because it is good to see the consent of histories in the report of accidents, it shall not be amisse to repeat the entier relation of a late toizer stranger touching this casualltie which befell to king Philip, in such sort to be cast vpon the English coasts; as also the promise of the said king to deliver the duke of Suffolke into the hands of king Henrie, with the cause (as it is supposed) why the king desired to haue him within his owne reach.

Abr. Fl. ex Guic. pag. 355. King Philip saileth out of Flanders into Spaine.

King Philip was imbarked to saile out of Flanders into Spaine with a great armie by sea; and to reduce his going to a more facilitie and safetie (for he feared least his father in law by the aid of the French would hinder his passage) he practised the Spanish subtilties, and agreed with him to leaue vnto him the managing and policie of the most part of affaires, and that they shuld take in common the title of king of Spaine, according to the example in the quenes time: and lastlie, that the reuenues and tributes shoud be diuided in an order certeine & indifferent. By reason of which accord, his father in law, notwithstanding he was not assured of the obseruation, sent him into Flanders manie ships to furnish his voyage: with the which, hauing imbarked his wife, and Ferdinand his second sonne, he toke his course into Spaine with forward winds, which, within two daies turning cleane contrarie, after his nauie had runne a dangerous fortune, and made a wearie resistance against the furie of the sea, his ships were cast vpon sundrie coasts of England and Britaine; his owne person with two or three ships being driuen with manifest perill vpon England into the haven of South Hampton.

King Philip cast by casualltie of sea vpon the coasts of England.

Whereof Henrie the seventh then king of that nation being aduertised, sent to him with speed manie barons to do him honour, and desire him to come to his court, then at London: a request which Philip could not denie, the king of Englands demand bearing no lesse honourable, than his owne estate full of necessitie and nakednesse. He remained in the court of England, vntill all his nauie was reassembled, and shippes rigged, making in the meane while betwene them new capitulations: wherein albeit Philip in all other things held himselfe vsed as a king, yet in this one thing complained, that he was constrained as a prisoner, to consent to redeliver to his enemies hands the duke of Suffolke, whom he held prisoner within the castell of Hamur, and whom the king of England desired much to haue in his power, for that he quarrelled the title of the crowne, pretending the right of the kingdome to appertene to him: one lie the king of England assured Philip by the faith and word of a king, that he would not put him to death, which he did as iustlie performe, as he had honorable promised, keeping him in prison so long as he liued, and afterwards was beheaded vnder the reigne and commandement of his sonne.]

Philip promised to redeliver to king Henrie the duke of Suffolke.

Anno Reg. 22.

The sweating sicknesse returned.

This yeare the king began to be diseased of a certeine infirmitie, which thise euerie yeare, but specially in the springtime sore bered him. And because for the most part the harme that chanceth to the prince, is parted with his subiects, the sweating sicknesse, which (as ye haue heard) in the first yeare of the king first afflicted the people of this realme, now assailed them againe; howbeit by the remedie found at the beginning of it, nothing the like number died thereof now this second time, as did at the first time till the said remedie was inuented. But now the third plague equall to the pestilence ensued, by the working of the maisters of the forfeitures, and such informers as were appointed thereto. By whose meanes manie a rich & wealthe person by the extremitie of the lawes of the realme were condemned and brought to great losse and hunderance.

A great part of which their bndings proceeded by the inconuenience of such unconscionable officers, as by the abuse of exigents outlawed those that neuer heard, nor had knowledge of the lutes commensed against them, of which hard and sharpe dealing (the harme that thereof insueeth considered) if the occasion might be taken awaie by some other more reasonable forme and order of law deuised, whereby the parties might haue personall waiting, it would both preserve manie an innocent man from vnder serued beration, and danger of vnmerefull losse of goods; and also rebound highlie to the commendation of the prince, and such other as chanced to be reformers of that colourable law, where they be called onlie in the counties without other knowledge giuen to them or theirs at their dwelling houses.

But now to returne. Such maner of outlawries, old recognisances of the peace, and god abearings, escapes, riots, & innumerable statutes penall, were put in execution, and called vpon by Emplon and Dupleie; so that euerie man, both the spirituale and temporallie, hauing either lands or substance, were invited to that plucking banquet. For these two rauening wolues had a gard of false perjured persons appertaining to them, which were impanelled in euerie quest. Learned men in the law, when they were required of their aduise, would say; So agree is the best counsell that I can giue you. By this vniuersitians, these couetous persons filled the kings coffers, and enriched themselves. And at this vnrainable and extort doing, noble men grudged, meane men kicked, poore men lamented, preachers openlie at Donles crosse and other places exclaimed, rebuked, and detested. Howbeit the good king in his last daies conferred and pardoned his poore subiects of such vnrainable yokes and ponderous burdens as they were laden withall.

Ed. Hall in Hen. 7. fol. 19.

Sir Gilbert Talbot knight, and Richard Bere abbat of Glasfenburie, and doctor Robert Sherborne deane of Poules, were sent as ambassadoys from the King to Rome, to declare to Pius the third of that name newlie elected pope in place of Alexander the first deceased, what joy and gladnesse had entered the kings heart for his preferment. But he taried not the coming of those ambassadoys, for within a moneth after that he was installed, he rendered his debt to nature, and so had short pleasure of his promotion [not beguiling the hopes which the cardinals conceived of him at the time of his creation, the six & twentieth day after his election, which was in short time to die. This popes name was Francis Piccolomini cardinal of Sienna, in whom was no expectation of long life, both for his extreame age, and present sicknesse: a cardinall sure of vnspotted report, and for his other conditions not vnworthy that degree; who to renew the memorie of Pius secundus his vncle, toke vpon him the name of Pius the third.]

Pag. 356.

Pag. 357.

He succeeded Alexander the first, who went to supper in a vineyard nere the Vatican to reioise in the delight & pleasure of the fresh aire, & was suddenly carried for dead to the bishops palace; his sonne also communicating in the same accident, but with better fortune. For the day following, which was the eighteenth day of August, the dead corps of the pope (according to custome) was borne into the church of saint Peter, blacke, swolne, and most deformed; most manifest signes of poison. But Valentines, what by the vigour and strength of his youth, and reable helpe of strong strong medicines and counterpoisons, had his life saved, remaining notwithstanding oppressed with long and grievous sicknesse: it was assuredly believed that the accident proceeded of poison, the discourse whereof (according to common report) was in this sort.

The duke Valentinois, who was to be present at that supper, had determined to poison Adrian cardinal of Cornette, reserving that time and place to execute his bloudie resolution: for it is most certaine that in his father and him were naturall customes to use poison, not onelie to be reuenged of their enemies, or to be assured of suspicions; but also upon a wicked courtousnesse, to despoile rich men of their goods, whether they were cardinals or courtiers, although they had neuer done them wrong, as hapned to the cardinall saint Ange, who was verie rich. This manner of rage they would use also against their greivous friends & familiars, and such as had bin their most faithfull seruants, such as were the cardinals of Capua and Spodeno: a recompense vnto the merits of good men, and not disagreeable to the disposition of such a father and sonne, whereof the one made all things lawfull by vile dispensation; and both the other nothing was dishonest wherein was opportunitie to his purposes. The duke Valentinois sent before certaine flagons with wine infected with poison, which he gave to a seruant that knew nothing of the matter, commanding that no person should touch them.

A common indecent presubtill to his maister, as the ignorance of the seruant was the instrument in the euill that hapened both to the father and son. Such is the sufferance of God, who in the execution of his iudgements raiseth one murderer to kill another, & breaketh the bands of the fire upon the head of him that first kindled it: for the pope comming by aduenture somewhat before supper, and overcome with the brought and immoderate heat of the time, called for drinke. And because his owne pouison was not yet brought from the palace, he that had the infected wine in charge, thinking it to be recomended to his keeping for a wine most excellent, gaue the pope to drinke of the same wine which Valentinois had sent; who arriving while his father was drinking drinke also of the same wine, being but lust that they both should tast of the same cup which they had buyed for the destruction of others. All the towne of Rome ran with great gladnesse to saint Peters about the dead bodie of the pope, their eyes not satisfied to see dead and destroyed a serpent, who with his immoderate ambition and poisoned infidelitie, together with all the horrible examples of cruelty, lururie, and monstrous courtousnesse, selling without distinction both holie things and prophane things, had infected the whole world.

And yet was he accompanied with a most rare, & almost perpetuall prosperitie euen from his yong age, to the end of his life; desiring alwaies great things, and obtaining most often that he desired. An example of much importance, to confound the arrogancie of those men, who presuming to know and see perfectlie with humane eyes the depth of Gods iudgements do assure, that what happeneth either good or ill to mortall men, proceedeth either of their merits or faults: as though we saw not daillie manie good men vniuallie tormented, & wicked persons about their deservings live in ease and honour: wherein who makes an other interpretation, derogates the iustice and power of God, the greatnesse of which being not to be contained within any script or tearme present, knoweth how well and largely to discern in an other time and place the lust from the vniust, and that with rewards and eternall punishments. In the meane time he poureth out his vengeance vpon the imaginers of mischance in this life; so providing, as that they are caught in their owne snares, and overtaken with such destruction as they had prepared for others, according to that saying of the Psalmist:

Effudit puteum, foueamque eduxit ab imo,

Et miser in lacebras incidit ipse suas.

In verticem ipsius recurrit

Pernicies, reciduntque fraudes.]

At the same time died Giles lord Daubencie the kings chiefe chamberleine, whose office Charles, barbard sonne to Henrie last duke of Summerfet occupied and entoyed; a man of good wit, and great experience. Some after, the king caused Guidebald duke of Ardeine to be created knight of the order of the garter, in like maner as his father duke Frederike had bene before him, which was chosen and admitted into the order by king Edward the fourth. Sir Gilbert Talbot, and the other two ambassadores being appointed to keepe on their iourneie vnto pope Iulio the second, elected after the death of the said Iulio the third, bare the habit and collar also vnto the said duke Guidebald; which after he had received the same, sent sir Balthasar Castilio, knight, a Spaniard borne, as his orator vnto king Henrie, which was for him installed, according to the ordinances of the order.

This yeare that worthy prelate Thomas Savage archbishop of Poike departed this life at his castell of Calwood: a man beside the worthinesse of his birth highlie esteemed with his prince for his fast fidelitie and great wisdom. He bestowed great cost in repairing the castell of Calwood and the manor of Scrobie. His bodie was buried at Poike, but he appointed by his testament, that his hart should be buried at Spacelfield in Cheshire, where he was borne, in a chapell there of his foundation, joining to the south side of the church, meaning to haue founded a college there also, if his purpose had not bene preuented by death. After him succeeded doctor Benbidge in the archbishops se of Poike, being the fiftie and sixt archbishop that had sat in that se.

About this same time Liewes the French king, the twelke of that name (who succeeded Charles the eighth that died at Amboise the night before the eighth daie of Aprill, of a catarrhe, which the physicians call an apoplexie, the same rising in him with such abundance, as he beheld a match played at tennisse, that in few houres he ended at the same place his life: during the which, he had with greater importunitie than vertue troubled the whole world with great apparance of danger to kindle flames new fiers of inuocation and troubles) married his eldest daughter named Clare, vnto Francis de Valois Dolphin of Niennne, and duke of Angoulesme, which ladie was promised vnto Charles the king of Castile: whereupon by ambassadores sent to and fro betwixt king Henrie and the said king of Castile, a marriage was concluded betwixt the said king of Castile, and the ladie Marie, daughter to king Henrie, being about the age of ten yeares. For conclusion of which marriage, the lord of Barol, & other ambassadores were sent into England from the emperor Maximilian which with great rewards returned.

William Woloue mercer maior of London this yeare deceased, and forthwith sir Laurence Ailmer draper was chosen and sworn, and went home in a grate cloake, with the sword borne before him, on the eight and twentieth daie of March. Item he took his oth at the Towre, and kept no feast. William Capell was put in lute by the king for things by him done in his maiortie. Also Thomas Kneifworth that had bene maior of London, and his thirte, were sent to the kings Bench, till they were put to their their fines of soareteene hundred pounds. In the mo-neth of June, the citie of Notwich was sore perished, & nere consumed with fier, that began in a French mans houle named Peter Johnson, a surgian, in the parish of saint George.

Stephan Wenings merchant tailor, maior of London, founded a free grammar schole at Wol-frunchampton in Staffordshire, with conuenient lodgings for the maister and vsher, in the same place where he was borne. He gaue lands sufficient for the maintenance, leaving the oversight thereof to the merchant tailors in London, who haue hitherto iustlie dealt in that matter, and also augmented the building there. Maister Nichols, who married the onellie daughter and heire of the aforesaid Stephan Wenings, gaue lands to mainteine the pauements of that towne. Also, Robt Leneon esquier, about Anno 1556, gaue lands, whereof foure pounds should be dealt euerie yeare, on good Friday, to the poore people of Wolfrunchampton, and six and thientie shillings eight pence yecrelie, towards the reparatie on of the church there.

Moreover, about Anno 1566, sir John Lighton, which had serued in that church there, the space of threescore yeares, for five pounds, six shillings eight pence the yeare, without anie other augmentation of his living, who would neuer take anie benefice, or other preferment, gaue twentie pounds, to purchase twentie shillings the yeare lands, the same to be gi-uen yecrelie for euer to the poore of Wolfrunchampton upon good Friday; & twelue pounds thirtene shillings foure pence, to purchase a marke a yeare lands, the same to be giuen to the poore of Chisnall, in the countie of Salop, where the said Ligh was borne.
This man liued nigh one hundred yeares. He bestowed besides his owne labour which was great (in bearing of stones, &c.) about twentie pounds on the high waies about that towne of Wolfrunchampton.

This towne of Wolfrunchampton, is now corruptly called Wolmerhampton: for in Anno 996, in king Ethelreds time (who wrote himselfe rex An-glorum & princeps Northbrorum Olympide tercia regni sui, for so he wrote the count of his reigne then, which was the sixteenth yeare) it was then called Hampton, as appeareth by an old charter written by the notarie of the said king Ethelred, which charter I haue sene and read. And for that a noble woman named Wulfune a widow, sometime wife to Alhelme duke of Northampton, did obtaine of the said king to giue lands vnto the church there which she had founded, the said towne took the addition of the same Wulfune; for that charter so nameth hir Wulfune, and the towne Hampton.

In this yeare was finished the goodlie hospitall of the Sauoie nere vnto Charing crosse, which was a notable foundation for the poore, done by king Henrie the seauenth, vnto the which he purchased and gaue lands for the relieving of one hundred poore people. This was first named Sauoie place, by Peter earle of Sauoie, father to Boniface archbishop of Canturburie, about the nine and twentieth yeare of king Henrie the third, who made the said Peter erle of Richmond. This house belonged since to the duke of Lancastell, and at this time was conuerted to an hospitall, still retaining the first name of Sauoie.
King Henrie also builded three houses of Francis-cane friers, which are called obseruants, at Richmond, Grænewich, and Newarke; and three other of the familie of Franciscane friers which are called conuentuals, at Canturburie, Newcastell, and Southampton.]

This yeare was Thomas Rnthall made bishop of Durham by Henrie the seauenth, touching whose place of birth (being at Cirencester now Cicester) and himselfe, I will not refuse to set downe what Leland (about the yeare 1542) hath written; not being vnfit here to be recorded. Cirencester (saith he) in Latine called Corinium standeth on the river Churne.

There haue bene three parish churches, whereof saint Ciceles church is cleane downe, being of late but a chappell. Saint Laurence yet standeth, but it is no parish church. There be two poore houses women endued with land. There is now but one parish church in all Cirencester that is verie faire, the bodie of which church is all new worke, to the which Rnthall bishop of Durham, who ne and brought vp in Cirencester) promised much, but prevented by death, gaue nothing. One Anne Aueting aunt to doctor Rnthall by the mothers side, gaue one hundred markes to the building of that church. King Henrie the first made the hospitall of saint Johns at Cirencester. Thus saith Leland.

This man thus borne at Cirencester in Glocestershire, and made bishop of Durham, was after the death asking Henrie the seauenth, one of the pri-uis counsell to king Henrie the eighth; in whose court he was so continuallie attendant, that he could not steale anie time to attend the affaires of his bishop-ricke. But yet not altogether carelesse (though not so much as he ought to haue bene) of the place and cause from whence and for which he received so great reuenues, as came vnto his hands from that sex. He repaired the third part of Aine bridge next vnto the south, which he might well doe; for he was accepted the richest subject though the realme. To whom (remaining then at the court) the king gaue in charge to write a booke of the whole estate of the kingdome, because he was knowne to the king to be a man of sufficiencie for the discharge thereof, which he did accordinglie.

Afterwards, the king commanded cardinal Wolfeie to go to this bishop, and to bring the booke alwaie with him to deliuer to his maiestie. But see the mishap! that a man in all other things so promi-dent, should now be so negligent: and at that time most forget himselfe, when (as it after fell out) he had most need to haue remembred himselfe. For this bishop hauing written two bookes (the one to auouch the kings command, and the other intreating of his owne priuate affaires) did bind them both after one fozt in vellame, iust of one length, breadth, and thick-nesse, and in all points in such like proportion answering one an other, as the one could not by anie especiall note be discerned from the other: both which he also laid by together in one place of his studie.

Now when the cardinall came to demand the booke due to the king: the bishop vnadvisedlie commanded his seruant to bring him the booke bound in white vellame lieng in his studie in such a place. The seruant doing accordinglie, brought forth one of those bookes so bound, being the booke intreating of the state of the bishop, and deliuered the same vnto his maister, who receiuing it (without further consideration or looking on) gaue it to the cardinall to beare vnto the king. The cardinall hauing the booke, went from the bishop, and after (in his studie by himselfe) vnderstanding the contents thereof, he greatlie relolled, hauing now occasion (which he long sought for) offered vnto him to bring the bishop into the kings disgrace.

Wherefore he went forthwith to the king, deliue-red the booke into his hands, and briefelie informed the king of the contents thereof; putting further into the kings head, that if at anie time he were desir-tute of a masse of monie, he should not need to seeke further therefore than to the cofers of the bishop, who by the tenor of his owne booke had accepted his proper riches and substance to the value of a hundred thou-of all which when the bishop had intelligence what he had done, how the cardinal used him, what the king said, and what the world reported of him, he was stricken with such griefe of the same, that he shortly through extreme sorrow ended his life at London, in the yeare of Christ 1523. After whose death the cardinal, which had long before ga- ped after the said bishoppe, in singular hope to at- taine thereunto, had now his wish in effect: which he the more easilie compassed, for that he had his nets alwaies ready cast, as assuring himselfe to take a trout: following therein a prophane mans cautelous counsell, and putting the same in practise; who saith:

Cassus ubi; ualeat, semper tibi pendeat hamus, Quo minime credis gurgite piscis erit.

The sickness which held the king daile more and more increasing, he well perceiued that his end drew nere, and therefore meaning to do some high plea- sure to his people, granted of his free motion a gene- rall pardon to all men, for all offences done & com- mitted against anie his lawes or statutes; theues, murtherers, & certeine other were excepted. He paid also the fees of all prisoners in the gaoles in and about London, abiding there onelie for that dutie. He paid also the debts of all such persons as laie in the counters or Ludgate for fourtie shillings, & bur- der; and some he releued that were condemned in ten pounds. Verbyon were processions generallie v- sed euerie daie in euerie citie and parish, to praise to almightie God for his restoring to health and long continuance of the same. Whereupon he was so afflicted with his long maladie, that nature could no longer susteine his life, and so he departed out of this world the two and twentieth of Aprill, in his palace of Whitehall, in the yeare of our Lord 1509. His corpe was carried with all funerall pompe to West- minster, and there buried by the good queene his wife in a sumptuous chapell, which he not long before had caused to be builded.

He reigned three and twentie yeares, and more than seven moneths, and liued two and fiftie yeares. He had by his queene Elizabeth foure sonnes, and foure daughters, of the which three remained alieue behind him. Henrie his second son prince of Wales, which after him was king, Margaret queene of Scots, and the labie Marie promised to Charles king of Castile. He was a man of bodie but leane and spare, albeit mightie and strong therewith, of perso- nage and stature somewhat higher than the meane sort of men, of a wonderfull beautie and faire com- plexion, of countenance merie and smiling, especial- lie in his communication, his eyes graie, his teeth single, and haire thin, of wit in all things quicke and prompt, of a princelie stomach and haucie courage. In great perils, doubtfull affaires, and matters of im- portance, supernaturall and in manner diuine; for he ordered all his doings aduisedlie and with great de- liberation.

Besides this, he was sober, moderate, honest, cour- teous, bountious, and so much abhorring pride and arrogance, that he was euer sharpe and quicke to them that were noted with that fault. He was also an indifferent and bright iusticer, by the which one thing he allured to him the hearts of manie people, and yet to this severitie of his he ioined a certeine mercifull pitie, which he did extend to those that had offended the penall lawes, and were put to their fines by his iustices. He did vse his rigour onelie (as he said himselfe) to dant, bring low, and abate the blas- phemous and stout stomachs of the wealthie and wild people, nourished up in seditious factions and ciuill rebellions, rather than for the greedie desire of monie; although such as were scourged with aucter- nities cried out, and said it was rather for the respect of gaine, than for anie politike prouision. In- deed he left his coffers well stuffed, for he was no wastfull consumer of his riches by anie inordinat meanes.

To conclude, he had asmuch in him of gifts both of bodie, mind and fortune, as was possible for anie potentate or king to haue. His politike wisdom in gouernance was singular, his wit alwaie quicke and readie, his reason pitie and substantiall, his me- morie steele and holding, his experience notable, his counsels fortunate and taken by wise deliberation, his speech gracious in diuerse languages, his person (as before ye haue heard) right comelie, his naturall complexion of the purest mixture, leagues and con- federations he had with all christian princes. His mightie power was dread euerie where, not onelie within his realme but without. Also his people were to him in as humble subiection as euer they were to king; his land manie a daie in peace and tranquilli- tie, his prosperitie in battell against his enemies was marvellous, his dealing in time of perils and dangers was cold and sober, with great hardnesse. If anie treason were conspired against him, it came out wonderfullie. His buildings most goodlie, and af- ter the newest cast, all of pleasure.

And so this king liuing all his time in fortunes fauour, in high honour, wealth and glorie, for his no- ble acts and prudent policies is worthy to be regi- stred in the booke of fame, least time (the consumer of all worthy things) should blot out the memorie of his name here in earth, whose soule we trust liueth in heauen, enioyng the fruition of the godhead, & those pleasures prepared for the faithfull. [In memorie of whome, his manifold vertues, with the fortunat suc- cesse of his affaires, and the gracious descent of his loines, as they procured a famous report in nations farre and nere; so haue some at the contemplation of his princeliesse, and euerie waie crowned with felicitie, made memorials of his magnificence; to the immortallitie of his high praise and vnblemishable renowne: among whome (for the truth of the report iustifiable by the contents of this historie) one com- munitie to mind, which may well serue for an epitaph:

*Septimus Henricus factus est nomen adeptum Præclarum claris ventura in seculis fama:
Cuius ille fuit fuerat clarissimus, hostes Omnes iure ipsum metuebant: nuntius almi Religiosus erat cultor pietatis & aequi, Versutos hominesque malos vehementius odit.
Viginti totos charus trique amplius annos Regibus externis in summo vixit honore: Magnanimus, iustus rex, prudens atque modestus, Henrico heredi moriens sua regna reliquit, Diuitisque immensum argenti pondus & auri.*

The altar and sepulture of the same king Henrie the seuenth, wherein he now resteth, in his new chap- pell at Westminster, was made and finished in the yeare of our Lord 1519, by one Peter T. a painter of the citie of Florence, for the which he receiued one thousand pounds sterling for the whole stufte and workmanship, at the hands of the kings executors, Richard bishop of Winchester, Richard Fitz James bishop of London, Thomas bishop of Duresme, John bishop of Rochester, Thomas duke of Dorset folke treasurer of England, Edward earle of Wor- cester the king chamberleine, John ff. knight, chiefe iustice of the kings Bench, Robert ff. knight, chiefe iustice of the common pleas, &c.]

Of learned men that liued in this kings daies (as maister Bale noteth them) these are recorded. First George Kipeleie a Carmelite frier at Boston, scene in the mathematikes, he wrote diuerse treatises, and after his decease was accounted a nekromancer; John Erghom boyme in Worke, a blacke frier, a doctor of diuinitie professed in Orford, studious of prophesies, as by the title of the works which he wrote it may appeare; John Persuall a Chartreux monke; Thomas Wailloze a Welthman bozne, he wrote (I wrote not that) of king Arthur, and of the round table; John Kousse bozne in Warwicksheire, a diligent searcher of antiquities, wherupon few libraries were any where to be seene in England and Wales, where he made not search for the same, and wrote sundrie treatises of historிக்கal arguments. He deceased at Warwike the fourteenth of Ianuarie in the yeare 1491, and was buried in our ladie church there.

Thomas Scrope, otherwisse surnamed Bzadleie, descended of the noble familie of the Scrops, professed sundrie kinds of religions, as that of the order of saint Benet, and saint Dominike, and likewise he became a Carmelite, and last of all he fell to and preached the gospell in haire and sackcloth, till he understood himselfe to be in the displeasure of Wallden and other, that could not alwaie with such singulartie in him; other, founding (as they toke it) to the danger of bringing the doctrine of the Romish church in misliking with the people; for then he withdrew himselfe to his house againe, and there remained twentie yeares, leading an anchors life, but yet after that time he came abroad, and was aduanced to be a bishop in Ireland, and went to the Roades in ambassage, from whence being returned, he went barefooted by and downe in Norfolk, teaching in townes and in the countrie abroad the ten commandments, he liued till he came to be at the point of an hundred yeares old, & departed this life the fiftieth day of Ianuarie in the yeare of our Lord 1491, and was buried at Leltholfe in Suffolke.

John Donneis a diuine and an Augustine frier in Norwich, wrote certeine rules of grammar, and other things printed by Richard Binlon; Gefferie surnamed the Grammarian; John Alcocke bishop of Ely, changed a nunnrie at Cambridge into a college named Iesus college, about the yeare of Christ 1496. The chiefe cause of suppressing the nunnrie is noted to be, for that the abbesse and other of the conuent liued dissolute liues; Stephan Palwes a learned gentleman, and of such reputation, as he was admitted to be one of the priuie chamber to king Henrie the seuenth; William Bintree, so called of a towne in Norfolk where he was bozne, by profession a Carmelite frier in Burnham, a great diuine; William Gallion an Augustine frier in Lin, and at length became prouinciall of his order.

Robert Fabian a citizen and merchant of London, an historiographer, he was in his time in good estimation for his wisdom and wealth in the citie, so that he bare office and was shiriffe in the yeare 1493; William Telling, bozne beside Feuerham in Kent, a monke of Canturburie; Thomas Bourcier descended of the noble linage of the earles of Essex, was first bishop of Ely, and after removed from thence to Canturburie, succeeding John Kemp in that archbishops see, at length created by pope Paule the second a cardinall; Philip Bromier a Dominicke frier, a diuine; John Piles a doctor of both the lawes, ciuill and canon, he studied in Orenford in the college of Wzafen nose, noblie founded in the daies of this king Henrie the seuenth by William Smith bishop of Lincoln; Richard Shirborne bishop of Chichester, and imploied in ambassage to diuerse princes, as a man most meet thereto for his singular knowledge in learning and eloquence.

Robert Aldous vicar of Thakestead in Essex, and a prebendarie canon of Welles, an excellent poet; Peter Kenighall a Carmelit frier, but bozne of worshipfull linage in France, hauing an Englishman to his father, was student in Orenford, and became a notable preacher; John Pozton first bishop of Ely, and after archbishop of Canturburie the fiftie and fourth in number that ruled that see, he was aduanced to the dignitie of a cardinall, and by king Henrie the seuenth made lord chancelor, a worshipfull counsellor and a modest, he was bozne of worshipfull parents in Cheshire, & departed this life in the yeare of our Lord 1500; Henrie Medwall chapleine to the said Pozton; Edmund Dubleie bozne of noble parentage, studied the lawes of this land, and profited highlie in knowledge of the same, he wrote a booke intituled Arbor rei publice, the tree of the common wealth: of this man ye haue heard before in the life of this king, and more (God willing) shall be said in the beginning of the next king, as the occasion of the historie leadeth; John Wokingham an excellent scholcman; William Blackeneie a Carmelit frier, a doctor of diuinitie, and a nekromancer.

Thus farre Henrie the seuenth, sonne to Edmund earle of Richmond.

Henrie the eight, sonne and successor to Henrie the seuenth.

After the death of the noble prince Henrie the seauenth, his sonne Henrie the eight began his reigne the two and twentith daie of Aprill in the yeare of the world 5475, after the birth of our sauour 1509, and in the eighteenth yeare of his age, in the sixteenth yeare of Maximilian then being emperor, in the eleuenth yeare of Helues the twelfth that then reigned in France, and in the twentieth yeare of king James the fourth as then ruling ouer the Scots: Whose title was proclaimed by the sound of a trumpet in the citie of London, the thre and twentieth daie of the said moneth, with much gladnesse and reioysing of the people. And the same daie he departed from his ma-nour of Richmond, to the Tower of London, where he remained closelie and secret with his counsell, till the funerals of his father were finished.

Although this king now comming to the crowne, was but young (as before is said) yet hauing bene in his first yeares trained by in learning, did for respect of his owne snertie and god gouernement of his people, prudentlie (by the aduise of his grandmother the countesse of Richmond and Derby) elect & choise fourth of the most wise and graue personages to be of his priuie counsell, namelie such as he knew to be of his fathers right deere and familiar frends, whose names were as followeth. William Warham archbishop of Canturburie and chancelor of England, Richard For bishop of Winchester, Thomas Howard earle of Surrie, and treasurer of England, George Talbot earle of Shrewesburie, and lord treward of the kings household, Charles Summerset lord chamberleine, sir Thomas Louell, sir Henrie What, doctor Thomas Kuthall, and sir Edward Poynings.

These graue and wise counsellors, fearing least such abundance of riches and welth as the king was now possessed of, might moue his young yeares in-torious forgetting of himselfe (for unto no king at any time before, was left greater or the like riches, as well in readie coine, as in iewels and other monieables, as was left to him by his father) they therefore his said counsellors travelled in such pri-uent fort with him, that they got him to be present with them when they sat in counsell; so to acquaint him with matters pertaining to the politike gouerni-ment of the realme, that by little and little he might aplie himselfe to take vpon him the rule and admi-nistratioun of publicke affaires, with the which at the first he could not well indure to be much troubled, being rather inclined to followe such pleasant pastimes as his youthfull young yeares did more delite in, and therefore could be vertie well contented, that other graue personages should take paines therein.

The same daie also that the king came to the Tower, the lord Henrie Stafford brother to the duke of Buckingham was arrested, and committed to the Tower; and the same daie also doctor Kuthall was named bishop of Durham. The five and twentith daie of Aprill was proclaimed, that the kings grace satisfied all the pardons granted by his father, and also pardoned all such persons as were then in lute for any offence whatsoeuer it was; treason, murder, and felonie onelie excepted. And now, whereas the performance of the deceased kings will was thought right expedient with all speed to be performed, a proclamation was also set forth and published thorough the realme, that if any man could prooue himselfe to be hurt, and depriued of his goods wrongfullie by the commissioners of the forfeitures, he should come and present his plaint to the king, being readie to satisfie euerie one of all iniuries so incurred.

After this proclamation was notified abroad, all such as had bene constrained either by right or by wrong (as Polydor saith) to paie any thing for any forfeitures of lawes and customes by them transgressed, came flocking to the court, & there declared their griefs, in what sort they had wrongfullie bene compelled (as they surmised) to paie this or that summe. The counsell heard euerie mans complaint, and such as were found to haue paid any thing without plaine prooue of iust cause, they toke such order for them, that they had their monie againe. Which being once knowne, it was a strange thing to see how thick other came in; yea euen those that had bene wrongfullie fined & punished for their disorderlie transgressions, making earnest sute for restitution, setting and forging manie things to make their cause seeme good, and to stand with equitie.

And the better to be heard in their sute, they made friends as well with bribes and large gifts as otherwise, leauing no waies vnassailed to compass their desires. Which greedines in such multitude of suiters, brought the commissioners, and other that had bese in the forfeitures into danger, and did the miselues no good: for the counsell perceiuing that it was not possible to satisfie them all, refused to heare any further complaints or sutes for restitution: but thought it best to commit those to prison, by whom the complainants pretended the miselues to haue bene wronged.
And here vpon was sir Richard Empson knight, and Edmund Dudley esquier, great counsellors to the late king attached, and brought to the Tower, thereby to quiet mens minds, that made such importu-nate sute to haue their monie againe restored, which in the late kings daies they had bene compelled to pay.

disburse, thorough the rigorous proceedings, as they alleged, of the said two counsellors, and others.

Truile great exclamacion was made against them, as often happeneth; that where any thing is done contrarie to the liking of the people, those that be dealers under the prince, and by his commandement proceed in the execution thereof, run in hatred of the multitude. But how soever it was, their apprehension and committing to prison was thought by the wise to be procured by the malice of them that in the late kings daies were offended with their authority. Shortly after (as Edward Hall saith) were apprehended diuerse other persons, that were called promoters, as Canbie, Page, Smith, Werbie, Wright, Simson, and Stedon; of which the more part wore papers, and stood on the pillorie. [And (as an other saith, who termeth them ringleaders of false queets in London) they rode about the citie with their faces to the horses tails, and papers on their heads, and after they had bene set on the pillorie in Coznehill, they were brought againe to Peluigate, where they died all within fewen daies after for verie shame.]

Promoters punished.

I.S. pag. 893.

The funerall pompe and solemnitie of Henrie the seventh.

When all things were prepared ready for the funerall of the late king, his corps with all sumptuous pompe and solemne ceremonies, was conveyed from Richmond to saint Georges field, where the clergy of the citie met it: and at the bridge the maiors and his brethren with manie commoners all clothed in blacke likewise met it, and gaue their attendance on the same thorough the citie, to the cathedrall church of saint Paule, where was song a solemne dirige and masse, and a sermon made by the bishop of Rochester John Fisher. The next daie the corps was had to Westminster, and there the daie following, put into the earth with all due solemnities as appertained. [Notwithstanding this breafe remembrance of king Henries solemne funerall, might seeme sufficient in the iudgement of some, without further amplification; yet because it is good in others opinion (and those not of meanest wit) to set downe things of state at large, if conuenient helps thereto maie be had: therefore you shall haue the whole solemnitie of the said roiall funerall, as it is found recorded by Edward Hall.

Edw. Hall, in Hen. 8. fol. j.

After that all things (saith he) necessarie for the interment and funerall pompe of the late king, were sumptuously prepared and done: the corps of the said deceased king was brought out of his private chamber into the great chamber, where he rested three daies, and euerie daie had there dirige and masse song by a prelat mitred. From thence he was conveyed into the hall, where he was also three daies, and had like seruice there; and so three daies in the chappell. And in euerie of these three places, was a hearse of war garnished with baners, and nine mourners giuing their attendance all the seruice time: and euerie daie they offered, and euerie place hanged with blacke cloth. Upon Wednesday the ninth daie of Maie, the corps was put into a charriot, couered with blacke cloth of gold, besome with five great caruers all couered with blacke velvet, garnished with cushions of fine gold: and ouer the corps was an image or representation of the late king, laied on cushions of gold, and the said image was apparelled in the kings rich robes of estate, with a crowne on the head with ball and scepter in the hands: the charriot was garnished with baners and pencils of the armes of his dominions, titles and genealogies.

The corps put into a charriot sumptuously garnished.

The order of the pompe and mourners.

When the charriot was thus ordered, the kings chappell, and a great number of prelates set forward praieing. Then followed all the kings seruants in blacke, then followed the charriot: and after the charriot nine mourners, and on euerie side were caried long torches & next, to the number of six hundred, & in this order they came to saint Georges field, from Richmond. There met with them all the prelates and clerks and religious men within the citie & without, which went for most before the chappell. The maiors and his brethren with manie commoners all clothed in blacke, met with the corps at London bridge, and so gaue their attendance on the same thorough the citie. And in good order the companies passed thorough the citie, whereof the streets on euerie side were set with long torches, and on the flais stood yong children holding tapers; & so with great reuerence the charriot was brought to the cathedrall church of saint Paule, where the bodie was taken out and caried into the quire, and set vnder a goodlie hearse of war garnished with baners, pencils, and cushions, where was song a solemne dirige and a masse with a sermon made by the bishop of Rochester. During which time, the kings household and the mourners reposed them in the bishops palace.

The next daie the corps in like order was removed towards Westminster: first Edward Howard bearing the kings baner on a caroler trapped in the armes of the deceased king. In Westminster was a curious hearse, made of nine principals, all full of lights, which were lighted at the coming of the corps, which was taken out of the charriot by six lords and set vnder the hearse: the image or the representation lieng vpon the cushion on a large pall of gold. The hearse was double railed; within the first rales sat the mourners, and within the second rales stood knights bearing baners of saints, and without the same stood officers of armes. When the mourners were set, Cartier king at armes, cried: for the soules of the noble prince king Henrie the seventh late king of this realme: then the quire began Placido, and so song dirige: which being finished, the mourners departed into the palace, where they had a bold, and so reposed for that night. The next daie were three masses solemnelie song by bishops, and at the last masse was offered the kings baner and caroler, his coat of armes, his sword, his target, and his helme: and at the end of masse the mourners offered by rich palles of cloath of gold and bandekin: and when the quire sang, Libera me; the bodie was put into the earth.

Then the lord treasurer, lord steward, lord chamberleine, the treasurer and comptroller of the kings household, brake their staves and cast them into the graue. Then Cartier cried with a loud voice; Vive le roy Henrie le huitiesme, roy d'Angleterre, & de France, sire d'Irland. Then all the mourners, and all other that had giuen their attendance on this funerall obsequie, departed to the palace, where they had a great and a sumptuous feast. Wonder it were to write of the lamentation that was made for this prince amongst his seruants, and other of the wisest sort; and the soie that was made for his death by such as were troubled by rigour of his law: yet the toward hope which in all points appeared in the yong king did both repaire and comfort the beate hearts of them, which had lost so wise and sage a prince: and also did put out of the minds of such as were relaxed by the said kings death, all their old grudge and rancoz, and confirmed their new soie by the new grant of his pardon.

After that the funerals of the said late king were once ended, great preparation was made for the coronation of the new king; which was appointed on the summer daie next ensuing. During the time of which preparation, the king was aduised by some of his counsell to take to wife the ladie Katherine, late wife to his brother prince Arthur, least she hauing so great a dowrie as was appointed to hir, might mar-

Reg. 1.

ric out of the realme, which should be to his hinder rance. The king being hereto persuaded, espoused the said ladie Katharine the third daie of June, the which marriage was dispensed with by pope Iulie, at the sute of hir father king Ferdinand. On the ele uenth daie of this moneth of June, the king came from Grenewich to the Tower ouer London by bidge and so by Grace church, with whome came manie a gentleman richlie appareled, but speciallie the duke of Buckingham, which had a gobone all of gold: smiths worke, berie coslie.

On fridaie the two and twentieth day of June, the king with the quene being in the Tower of Lon don, made foure and twentie knights of the Bath.
And the morow following, being saturday the foure and twentieth of June, his grace with the quene de parted from the Tower through London, the streets being hanged with tapestrie and cloth of arras, be rie richlie; and a great part of the south side of Cheape with cloth of gold, & so was some part of Cornhill.
The streets were railed & barred on the one side, from ouer against Grace church to Bedstreet in Cheape side, where euerie occupation stood in their lincies in order, beginning with base and meane occupations, and so ascending to the worshipfull crafts. Highest and lastlie stood the maior with the aldermen. The goldsmiths stals unto the end of the Old change, be ing replenished with virgins in white, with branches of white war: the priests and clarkes in rich copes, with crosses and censers of silver, with censsing his grace and the quene also, as they passed. The features of his bodie, his goodlie personage, his amiable vi sage, princelie countenance, with the noble qualities of his roiall estate, to euerie man known, needeth no reherfall, considering that (for lacke of cunning) I cannot expresse the gifts of grace and of nature that God indued him with all.

Yet partlie to describe his apparell, it is to be no ted, his grace wore in his hypermost apparell, a robe of crimian velvet, furred with ermins, his iacket o coat of raised gold, the placard imbodered with dia monds, rubies, emerauds, great pearles, and other rich stones, a great banderike about his necke of great balasses. The trapper of his horse damaske gold, with a deepe purple of ermins. His knights and esquiers for his bodie in crimian velvet; and all the gentlemen, with other of his chappell, and all his offi cers and household servants were appareled in scar let. The barons of the five portes bare the canopie of cloth of estate. For to recite unto you the great estates by name, the order of their going, the number of the lords spirituall & tempozall, knights, esquiers, and gentlemen, and their coslie and rich apparell of seuerall deuises and fashions, who toke by his horse best, or who was richest besene; it would aske long time, and yet I should omit manie things, and faile of the number, for they were berie manie: therefore I passe ouer. But this I dare well saie, there was no lacke of scarfitie of cloth of tissue, cloth of gold, cloth of silver, boderie, or of goldsmiths worke: but in more plentie and abundance than hath bene seene or read of at anie time befoze, and thereto manie and great members of chaines of gold, & banderikes both masse and great.

Also befoze the kings highnesse rode two gentle men richlie appareled, and about their bodies ouer thwart, they bare two robes, the one of the duchie of Guien, and the other for the duchie of Normandie, with hats on their heads powdered with ermins, for the estate of the same. Next followed two persons of good estate, the one bearing his cloke, the other his bat, appareled both in goldsmiths worke and bode rie, their horses trapped in burned silver, & went o uer with copes of grene silke and gold, the edges and borders of their apparell being frettyed with gold of damaske. After them came sir Thomas Brandon master of the kings horse, clothed in tissue, bodered with roles of fine gold, and ouerthwart his bodie a great banderike of gold, great and masse; his horse trapped in gold, leading by a raine of silke; the kings spare horse trapped hard wise, with harnesse bodered with bullion gold, curioullie wrought by goldsmiths.

Then next followed the nine children of honor, upon great courcers, appareled on their bodies in blue vel uet, powdered with foure delices of gold, & chaines of goldsmiths worke, euerie one of their horses trap ped with a trapper of the kings title, as of England and France, Gascoigne, Guien, Normandie, An glou, Cornewall, Wales, Ireland, &c: wrought by on veluets, with imboderie, and goldsmiths worke.

Then next following in order, came the quenes retinue, as lordes, knights, esquiers, and gentlemen in their degrees, well mounted, and richlie appareled in tissue, cloth of gold, of silver, tinsels, and veluets imbodered, fresh and goodlie to behold. The quene then by name Katharine, sitting in hir litter borne by two white palfries, the litter covered and richlie apareled, and the palfries trapped in white cloth of gold; hir person appareled in white satin imbodered, hir haire hanging downe to hir backe of very great length, beautifull and goodlie to behold, & on hir head a coronall set with manie rich orient stones. Next af ter, sir honorable personages on white palfries all ap pareled in cloth of gold, and then a chariot covered, and the ladies therein all appareled in cloth of gold.
And another sort of ladies, and then another chariot, then the ladies next the chariot, and so in order, euerie one after their degrees in cloth of gold, cloth of silver, tinsels, and velvet, with imboderies. Euerie couple ment of the said chariots, and the draught harnesses were powdered with ermins mixt with cloth of gold: & so with much joy & honour they came to Westmin ster, where was high preparation made, aswell for the said coronation, as also for the solemne feasts and iusts thereupon to be had and done.

The morow following being sundaie, and also Whitsunmowe daie, this noble prince with his quene at time convenient, vnder their canopies borne by the barons of the five portes, went from the said pa lace to Westminster abbaye upon cloth, called bul garlie cloth of raie; the which cloth was cut and spo led by the rude and common people, immediatlie af ter their repaire into the abbaye; where, according to the sacred obseruance & ancient custome, his grace with the quene were annointed and crowned by the archbishop of Canturburie, with other prelates of the realme there present, and the nobilitie, with a great multitude of commons of the same. It was deman ded of the people, whether they would receiue, obte ine, and take the same most noble prince for their king: Who with great reuerence, loue, and desire, said and cried: Aea yea. After the which solemnitie and coro nation finished, the lords spirituall and tempozall did to him homage, and returned to Westminster hall with the quenes grace, euerie one vnder their cano pies; where, by the lord Sparshall & his tipped stanes was made ronne, and euerie lord, and other noble men, according to their tenures, befoze claimed and biewed, seene and allowed by the lords, and other of his graces counsell, entred into such ronne and office that daie, to execute their seruices accordinglie.

The kings estate on the right hand, & the quenes on the left hand, the cupbord of nine stages, their no ble personages being set: first, at the bringing of the first course, the trumpets sounded. And in came the duke of Buckingham, mounted upon a great con ser, richlie trapped and imbodered, and the lord se ward in likewise on an horse trapped in cloth of gold, riding before the seruice, which was sumptuous, with manie subtilties, strange deuises, with seuerall posers, and manie deintie dishes. At the kings feet vnder the table were certeine gentlemen; and in likewise with the queene, who there continued, during that long and roiall feast. What should I speake of wite of the sumptuous, fine, and delicate meats prepared for this high and honorable coronation, provided for aswell in the parties beyond the seas, as in manie and sundrie places within this realme, where God so abundantlie hath sent such plentie and foison? Of the honorable order of the seruices, the cleane handeling and breaking of meats, the ordering of the dishes, with the plentiful abundance: So that none of anie estate being there did lacke, nor no honorable or worshipfull person went vnfeste.

Sir Robert Dimmoche the kings champion.

The second course being serued: in at the hall doore entered a knight, armed at all points, his baces rich tissue embroidered, a great plume and a sumptuous of ostrich feathers on his helmet, sitting on a great courser, trapped in tissue, and embroidered with the armes of England, and of France, and an herald of armes before him. And passing through the hall, he presented himselfe with humble reuerence before the kings maiesty, to whom Cartier king of heralds cried and said with a loud voice; Sir knight from whence come you, and what is your pretense? This knights name was sir Robert Dimmoche, champion on to the king by tenure of his inheritance, who answered the said king of armes in effect after this manner: Sir, the place that I come from is not materiall, nor the cause of my repaire hither is not concerning anie matter of anie place or countrie, but onelie this: and therewithall commanded his herald to make an Oyes. Then said the knight to the king of armes; Now shall ye heare the cause of my coming and pretense. When he commanded his owne herald, by proclamation to saie; If there be anie person, of what estate or degree soeuer he be, that will saie or proue, that king Henrie the eight is not the rightfull inheritor and king of this realme, I sir Robert Dimmoche here his champion, offer my gloue, to fight in his quarell with any person to the utterance. Which proclamation was made in sundrie places of the hall: and at euerie time his gantlet cast downe, in the maintenance thereof.

The manner of the same knights tenure.

After these seuerall proclamations done, and offers made, the said knight or champion offones repaired to the kings presence, demanding drinke; to whom the kings grace sent a cup of gold with wine, whereof after this knight had drunke, he demanded the couer of the said cup, which to him also was deliuered: that done he departed out of the hall, with the said cup and couer as his owne. The manner of his tenure is this, that at the coronation of the king, he shall go to the armorie, and there take the kings best harness same one, the best and rich baces saving one, then of the plumes or other things for the garnishing of his creast or helme; and so to the stable, there taking the next courser or horse to the best, with like trappers, & so furnished, to enter (as afore) and his office done, to haue all these things with the cup of gold and couer to his owne vse. After the departure of the said champion, the king of armes with all the heralds and other officers of armes, made proclamations in seuerall places of the hall, crying loudly. Whiclike I passe ouer this high and long solemnitie of this honorable coronation and feast, more honorable than of the great Cesar, whom manie historiographers so highlie set out and magnifie.

Sir Stephen Genings mayor of London.

Now when the tables were voided, the waiters were brought. Then sir Stephen Genings that time mayor of London, whom the king before he sat downe to dinner had dubbed knight, which began the earles table that daie, arose from the place where he sat, to serue the king with hypocras in a cup of gold: which cup, after his grace had drunken thereof, was with the couer giuen vnto the said sir Stephen, like as other his predecessors, maiors of the said citie, were wont to haue at the coronation of the king. Then after the turnap laied, and that the kings grace and the queene had washed, euerie of them vnder their cloths of estate, the tables being auoided, went vnto their chambers. For the more honour and ennobling of this triumphant coronation, there were prepared both iusts and turneis to be done in the palace of Westminster, where, for the kings grace and the queene, was framed a faire house, covered with tapestrie, and hanged with rich clothes of arrais, and in the said palace was made a curious founteine and ouer it a castell, on the top thereof a great crovone imperiall, all the imbattelling with roses and pomegranats gilded.

Under and about the said castell, a curious vine, the leaues and grapes thereof gilded with fine gold, the walles of the same castell coloured white & greene losengis, and in euerie loseng either a rose or a pomegranat, and a sheafe of arrowes, or else a gilded with fine gold, with certeine arches and turrets gilded, to support the same castell. And the targets of the armes of the defendants, appointed for the said iusts, thereupon sumptuously set. And out at seuerall places of the same castell, aswell on the daie of the coronation, as on the said daies of the iusts & turneis, out of the mouthes of certeine beasts or gargels bid run red, white, and claret wine. The enterprisers of these iusts, was Thomas lord Howard, heire apparent to the earle of Surrie, sir Edward Howard admerall his brother, the lord Richard brother to the Marques Dorset, sir Edmund Howard, sir Thomas Kaneuet, and Charles Brandon squire. The trumpets blew to the field, the fresh yong gallants and noble men gorgeously apparelled, with curious deuises of cuts and of emboideries, as well in their coates as in trappers for their horses, some in gold, some in silver, some in tinsel, and diuerse other in goldsmithes worke, goodlie to behold.

These first entred the field, in taking vp & turning their horses, netlie and freshlie. Then followed a deuise (caried by strength of men and other prouision) framed like a castell, or a turret, wrought with fine cloth of gold: the top whereof was spred with roses and pomegranats, hanging downe on euerie side of the said deuise; wherein was a ladie, bearing a shield of chisell named Dallas. After whom the said lord Howard with his companions followed, armed at all points, their baces and bardes, or trappers, were of greene veluet, beaten with roses and pomegranats of gold, broidered with fringes of damaske gold. The said deuise or turret, being brought before the king, the ladie Dallas presented the said persons, whom she named hir scholars, to the kings highnes, beseeching the same to accept them as hir scholars, who were desirous to serue him, to the increase of their honours; which said scholars had about them on foot to the number of an hundred persons, freshlie apparelled, in beluets of sundrie colours, with hose & bonnets according to the same. And further, the said ladie desired the king, that it might please his grace, that hir said scholars might be defendants to all comers, which request was granted.

Then came in an other band of horsemen, freshlie and well appareled in cloth of gold, in silver, in goldsmithes worke, & broiderie, to the number of threescore, with trappers according to their garments, with great banderikes, collars, and chaines of gold about their necks and trauerse their bodies, euerie man with a coife of gold on his head, and a great plume plume of feathers thereupon, some of one colour and some of another, entering before into the field with drums and fises a great number, euerie man taking by his horse in his best manner, as well for their ladies, as also for laud or praise to be given them. After whome followed a good number of footmen, in velvet and other silkes, cut and embroidered, with hose to the same accordingle, and bonets and other furniture, after a fresh and lustie fashion. Pert to them came on horsebacke eight persons, whose names were, sir John Pechie, sir Edward Penell, sir Edward Guildford, sir John Carre, sir William Parre, sir Giles Capell, sir Griffith Dun, and sir Rowland, armed also at all points, with shields of their owne armes, with rich plumes, and other deuises on their head peeces, their bases and trapers of russe, cloth of gold, silver and velvet; and next before them, a gentleman on horsebacke, in a coat of blue velvet, embroidered with gold, and his horse trapped in the same sute, with a speare of gold on his thigh, and the same presented to the quene: saieing, that it was informed those knights of Pallas companie, how that dame Pallas had presented six of hir scholars to the king, but whether they came to learne, or to teach feats of armes they knew not.

He further declared, that his knights were come to do feats of armes, for the loue of ladies. Wherefore he besought hir grace, to licence those knights to proue themselves against dame Pallas scholars: and that in case hir scholars brake more speares on the said knights, by the view of the iudges, and the report of the heralds, than the same knights should do on them; then the said scholars of Pallas knights to haue the speare of gold for their prize. And if the knights brake more speares than dame Pallas scholars, the said knights to haue the christall shield. The which request to them granted, the iusts began, where euerie man did acquite himselfe well and valiantlie; but who had the prize of other, I know not. The night coming on, the iusts ended. The next daie approached the foresaid defenders, scholars to Pallas on horsebacke, armed a cape a pie, the one side of their bases and bards of their horses white velvet, embroidered with roses of gold and other embroideries; the other side greene velvet embroidered with pomegranats of gold, euerie one of them on his head pece had an heare of flat gold of damaske, and so presented themselves before the king readie to tourneie.

Then immediatlie on the other part came in the forenamed eight knights, readie armed, their bases and bards of their horses greene sattin, embroidered with fresh deuises of bzanble branches, of fine gold curiously wrought, powdered all over. And after than a great number of hoznes blowne, by men apperrelled in greene cloth, with caps and hosen of like sute, as foresters or keepers; & a pagent made like a parke, paled with pales of white and greene, wherein were certeine fallow deare, and in the same parke curious trees made by craft, with bushes, fernes, and other things in likewise wrought, goodlie to behold. The which parke or deuise, being brought before the quene, had certeine gates thereof opened, the deare ran out thereof into the palace, the greiehounds were let slip and killed the deare: the which deare so killed, were presented to the quene and the ladies by the foresaid knights.

Crochman, which the daie before brought in the speare of gold, there declared, that the same knights were seruants to Diana, and being in their pastime of hunting, newes were brought unto them, that dame Pallas knights were come into those parts, to do deeds of armes: wherefore they had left their hunting and chase, and repaired also thither, to encounter with the knights of Pallas, and so to fight with them for the loue of ladies, to the utterance: saieing, that if Pallas knights vanquished the other, or made them to leaue the field, then they to haue the deare killed, and the greiehounds that slue them. And in case Dianas knights ouercame the other, they to haue their swords, and none other thing more. Whereupon the quene and ladies sent to the king to haue his aduise and pleasure in this behalfe. His grace conceiuing that there was some grudge and displeasure betwene them, thinking if such request were to them granted some inconuenience might insue, would not thereto agree: so that for the appeasing thereof it was awarded, that both parties should tourneie together, giuing but some certeine strokes, which done they departed: and so these iusts brake vp, and the prizes giuen to euerie man after his deserts.]

The king pardoned the lord Henrie brother to the duke of Buckingham, committed to the Towre (as ye haue heard) upon suspicion of treason: but when nothing could be proued against him, he was set at libertie, and at the parlement after created earle of Wiltshire. Also this yeare the king ordeined fiftie gentlemen to be speares, euerie of them to haue an archer, a demilance, and a costrell; and euerie speare to haue three great hozses to be attendant on his person, of the which band the earle of Essex was lieutenant, and sir John Pechie capteine. This ordinance continued but a while, the charges was so great, for there were none of them, but they and their hozses were apparrelled and trapped in cloth of gold, silver & goldsmithes worke. This yeare also was a great pestilence in the towne of Calis, so that the king sent one sir John Pechie with three hundred men to tarrie there upon the defense of that towne till the sickness was ceased. Furthermore, this yeare the king summoned his parlement in the moneth of Nouember, to begin in the moneth of Ianuarie next ensuing: whereof sir Thomas Inglefield was chosen speaker.

At this parlement sir Richard Empson knight, and Edmund Dudley equier late counsellors vnto king Henrie the seauenth, were atteinted of high treason. They were charged with manie offenses committed in the late kings daies, as partlie before ye haue heard; who being brought before the counsell, as they were graue and wise personages, and both of them learned and skilfull in the lawes of the realme: so had they vterance verie trauertie thereby to deliuer the conceits of their minds with singular dexteritie, speciallie in a case of importance; in so much that when the said parties were conuented before the assemble of the lords, they alleged for themselves right constantlie (in their owne defenses) much good and sufficient matter, of whome Empson (being the elder in yeares) had these wordes.

Know (right honorable) that it is not vnknowne to you, how profitable and necessarie lawes are for the good preservation of mans life: without the which neither house, towne, nor citie can long continue or stand in safetie. mischaſe whereof dailie increaſing, Henrie the ſeauenth a moſt graue and prudent prince wiſhed to ſuppreſſe, and therefore appointed vs to ſee, that ſuch lawes as were yet in uſe might continue in their full force; and ſuch as were out of uſe might againe be reuiued and reſtozed to their former ſtate; & that alſo thoſe perſons which tranſgreſſed the ſame, might be puniſhed according to their demerits. Wherein we diſcharged our dueties in moſt faithfull wiſe, and beſt maner we could, to the great aduantage & commoditie (no doubt) of the whole commonwealth. Wherefore we moſt humble beſeech you in reſpect of your honours, courteſie, goodneſſe, humanitie, and iuſtice, not to decree any grieuous ſentence againſt vs, as though we were worſthie of puniſhment; but rather to appoint how with thankfull recompenſe our paines & trauell may be worſthie conſidered.

Wherof the counſell thought that he had ſpoken well, and ſo as ſhod with great reaſon: but yet the greater number (ſuppoſing that the reuiuing of thoſe lawes had proceeded rather of a couctous meaning in the king and them, than of anie zeale of iuſtice, and hauing alſo themſelues felt the ſmart lately befoze for their owne offences and tranſgreſſions) had conceiued ſuch malice towards the men, that they thought it reaſon, that ſuch as had bene dealers therein, were worſthie to loſe their heads, in like ſort as they had cauſed others to loſe their monie. Whereupon, their accuſors were mainteined, and manie od matters narrowlie fought out againſt them, as by two ſeueral indiements framed againſt ſir Richard Empſon (the copies whereof I haue ſene) it may well appeare.

In the one he is charged, that to win the fauour and credit of the late king, not weieing his honoz nor the proſperitie of him, or wealth of his realme, hee had (in ſubuerſion of the lawes of the land) procured diuerſe perſons to be indicted of diuerſe crimes and offences ſurniſhed againſt them, and thereupon to be committed to priſon, without due proces of law; who not ſuffered to come to their anſwers, were kept in durance, till they had compounded for their fines, to their great importable loſſes, and utter impoueriſhment. Alſo diuerſe untrue offices of intruſions and alienations, made by ſundrie the late kings liege people, into manors, lands, and tenements were found; it being untruelie alleged, that they held the ſame of the king In capite. And when ſuch perſons as were thus beſet, offered to traueſſe thoſe offices, they could not be admitted thereto, in ſuch due and lawfull forme as in ſuch caſes the law prouideth, till they had compounded to paie great fines and ranſomes.

Moreouer the kings wards, after they had accompliſhed their full age, could not be ſuffered to ſue their ſueries, till they had paid exceſſiue fines and ranſomes, vnto their great annoyance, loſſe, and diſquieting, and to no leſſe contempt of the ſaid king. And further, whereas diuerſe perſons had bene outlawed, as well at the ſute of their aduerſaries, as of the ſaid late king; they could not be allowed to purchaſe their charters of pardon out of the chancerie, according to the law of the realme, till they were dzen to anſwer halfe the iſſues and proſits of all their lands and tenements by the ſpace of two yeares, which the king receiued to his uſe, by the ſaid Richard Empſons procurement, who informed him that hee might lawfullie take the ſame, although he knew that it was contrarie to the lawes and cuſtomes of the realme. Whereupon the people, beſet and moleſted by ſuch hard dealings, ſoze grudged againſt the ſaid late king, to the great perill and danger of his perſon and realme, and ſubuerſion of the lawes and ancient cuſtomes thereof.

Alſo it was alleged againſt the ſaid Empſon, that he had ſent forth precepts directed vnto diuerſe perſons, commanding them, vpon great penalties, to appeare befoze him, and other his aſſociats, at certeine daies and times within his houſe in S. Wides pariſh, in a ward of London, called ſfarrington without: where they making their appearances, according to the ſame precepts, were impleaded afoze him and other his ſaid aſſociats, of diuerſe murders, felonies, outlawries, and of the articles in the ſtatute of prouidoz contained; alſo of willfull escapes of felonies, and ſuch like matters and articles appertaining to the ples of the crowne, and common lawes of the realme. And that done, the ſaid perſons were committed to diuerſe priſons, as the Fleet, the Tower, and other places, where they were detained, till they had fined at his pleaſure, as well for the comunoditie of the ſaid late king, as for the ſingular aduantage of the ſaid ſir Richard Empſon.

Moreouer, whereas the ſaid Empſon, being recorder of Countreie, and there ſate with the maiors and other iuſtices of the peace, vpon a ſpeciall gaole deliuerie within that citie, on the monday befoze the feaſt of ſaint Thomas the apoſtle, in the ſixteenth yeare of the late kings regnie; a priſoner that had bene indicted of felonie, for taking out of an houſe in that citie, certeine goods to the value of twentie ſhillings, was arreigned befoze them. And becauſe the iurie would not find the ſaid priſoner gilty, for want of ſufficient euidence (as they after alleged) the ſaid ſir Richard Empſon, ſuppoſing the ſame euidence to be ſufficient, cauſed them to be committed to ward, wherein they remained foure daies together, till they were contented to enter bond in forty pounds a pece, to appeare befoze the king and his counſell, the ſecond returne of the tearme then next enſuing, being Quindena Hilary. Whereupon they keeping their daie, and appearing befoze the ſaid ſir Richard Empſon, and other of the kings counſell, according to their bonds, were adiudged to paie exerie of them eight pounds for a fine, and accordingly he made payment thereof, as they were then thought well worſthie ſo to do. But now this matter ſo long paſt, was ſtill kept in memorie, and ſo earnest ſome were to inſorce it to the bittermoſt againſt the ſaid Empſon, that in a ſeſſions holden at Countreie now in this firſt yeare of this kings regnie, an indiement was framed againſt him for this matter, and thereof he was found gilty, as if therein he had committed ſome great and heinous offence againſt the kings peace, his crowne and dignitie.

Thus haue I thought good to ſhew what I find hereof, to the end ye may perceiue how glad men were to find ſome colour of ſufficient matter, to bring the ſaid ſir Richard Empſon, and maſter Edmund Dubleie, within danger of the lawes; whereby at length they were not onelie condemned by act of parlement, though malice of ſuch as might ſeeme to ſeake their deſtruction for priuat grudges; but in the end alſo, they were arreigned: as firſt the ſaid Edmund Dubleie in the Guildhall of London, the ſeuenteenth of Iulie; and ſir Richard Empſon at Northampton in October next enſuing: and being there condemned, was from thence brought backe againe to the Tower of London, where he remained till the time of his execution: as after ye ſhall heare.

This yere the plague was great, and reigned in diuerse parts of this realme. The king kept his Christmas at Richmond. The twelfe of Januarie, diuerse gentlemen prepared to iust, and the king and one of his priue chamber called William Com ton, secretly armed themselves in the little parke of Richmond, & so came into the iustes, unknowne to all persons. The king neuer ran openlie before, and did exceeding well. Gaiffier Compton chanced to be sore hurt by Edward Beuill esquier, brother to the lord of Aburgauennie, so that he was like to haue died. One person there was that knew the king, and cried; God saue the king: and with that, all the peo ple were astonied, and then the king discovered himselfe, to the great comfort of the people. The king some after came to Westminster, and there kept his shrouetide with great banquettings, dancings, and other iollie pastimes.

And on a time the king in person, accompanied with the earles of Essex, Wilshire and other noble men, to the number of twelue, came suddenlie in a morning into the queenes chamber, all apparelled in short coates of Kentish Kendall, with hodes on their heads & hosen of the same, euerie one of them his bow and arrowes, and a sword and a buckler, like outlawes, or Robin Hoods men: Whereat the queene, the ladies, and all other there were abashed, as well for the strange sight, as also for their sudden coming, and after certeine dances and pastime made, they departed. On Shrouesundae the same yeare, the king prepared a goodlie banquet in the pa rlement chamber at Westminster, for all the ambas sadors, which then were here out of diuerse realmes and countries. The banquet being readie, the king leading the queene, entered into the chamber, then the ladies, ambassadours, and other noble men fol lowed in order.

The king caused the queene to keepe the estate, and then late the ambassadours and ladies, as they were marshalled by the B. who would not sit, but walked from place to place, making cheare to the queene and the strangers: suddenlie the king was gone. And shortly after, his grace, with the earle of Essex, came in apparelled after the Turkie fashion, in long robes of handekin, powdered with gold, hats on their heads of crimsin veluet, with great rolles of gold, grided with two swordes called ciminteries, hanging by great bauderles of gold. Then next came the lord Henrie earle of Wilshire, and the lord Fitzwater, in two long gownes of yellow sattin, trauesed with white sattin, and in euerie hand of white was a band of crimsin sattin after the fashion of Russia or Rus land, with furred hats of grate on their heads, either of them hauing an hatchet in their hands, and boots with pikes turned vp.

And after them came sir Edward Howard then admerall, and with him sir Thomas Parre, in dub lets of crimsin veluet, voided low on the backe, and before the chanel bone, lased on the breasts with chaines of silver, and ouer that short cloakes of crimsin sattin, and on their heads hats after dan lers fashion, with feaslants feathers in them: they were apeared after the fashion of Russia or Spence.
The torchbearers were apparelled in crimsin sattin and greene, like spozeshoes, their faces blacke: and the king brought in a mummerie. After that the queene, the lords, & ladies (such as would) had played, the said mummers departed, and put off the same ap parell, and some after entered into the chamber in their vsuall apparell. And so the king made great cheere to the queene, ladies and ambassadours. The upper or banquet ended, and the tables voided, the king in communication with the ambassadours, the queene with the ladies toke their places in their degrees.

Then began the dancsing, and euerie man toke much heed to them that danced. The king perceiving that, withdrew himselfe suddenlie out of the place, with certeine other persons appointed for that pur pose. And within a litle while after there came in a dum and a life apparelled in white damaske & greene hagynets, and hosen of the same sute. Then certeine gentlemen followed with torches, apparelled in blue damaske, portelless with amts greis, fashioned like an albe, and hods on their heads, with robes and long tipets to the same of blue damaske, in bisards.
Then after them came a certeine number of gentle men, whereof the king was one, apparelled all in one sute of short garments, little beneath the points, of blue veluet and crimsin, with long sleeves, all cut and lined with cloth of gold. And the bitter part of the garments were powdered with castels and sheafes of arrowes of fine duckett gold; the wyper parts of their hosen of like sute and fashion, the nether parts were of skarlet, powdered with tymbels of fine gold, on their heads bonnets of damaske, with silver flat twomen in the skole, & thereupon wygouth with gold, and rich fetters in them, all with bisards.

After them entered sir ladies, whereof two were apparelled in crimsin sattin and purple, embzodered with gold, and by vinctels ran flour delices of gold, with marvellous rich & strange tiers on their heads.
Then two ladies in crimsin and purple, made like
